did further empower, authorize and require the said corporation, upon the first Monday in November, in all times thereafter, or in case any emergency should prevent their meeting on that day, then at the next quarterly meeting thereafter, to make a new election of persons to serve in the said offices, or to continue the former officers, as they should think most convenient; and that as often as it should happen that any of the officers of the said corporation, for the time being, should die or be removed for reasonable cause, as therein directed, or that any vacancy should occur of an officer or officers of the said corporation, it should and might be lawful for the said members of the said corporation, and they should be required within forty days, (ten days notice being given), to choose and elect into his or their place or places, some other person or persons of the said corporation in the manner therein mentioned, to continue in his or their office or offices till the first Monday in November next following, his or their election or elections, and until some other person or persons should be elected into his or their office or offices: We do hereby further direct and ordain, That all officers of the said society, save the president and vice president thereof, shall in future be elected in manner hereinafter mentioned and provided, and not otherwise: And we do hereby authorize and empower the said committee of fifteen, in Dublin, and the said lesser committees in their respective hospitals, whenever any of the offices of the said corporation in their said district respectively shall be vacant, to elect by plurality of voices into such offices, such persons as they shall think proper respectively, and also annually at their respective meetings, which shall first take place and be holden next after the first Monday in November in each year, to make new elections in their respective districts as aforesaid, of persons to serve in the said offices respectively, or to continue their former offices, or any of them, as they respectively shall think most convenient, each person so elected in any of the said cases, to remain in office until he shall be superseded by a new election as aforesaid, or till he shall die, resign, or be duly removed; and every such person so elected respectively as aforesaid, to be removable by the said committees respectively in their respective districts, when they shall judge it fit so to do: And we do also hereby further authorize, empower and require the president or vice president, or in their absence any two members of the said respective committees in their respective districts, to administer an oath or oaths to the said officers respectively, for the due and faithful execution of their respective offices; and we do hereby require every such officer to take the said oath accordingly: And we hereby further authorize and empower the said committee of fifteen, from time to time at their said meetings, which shall happen next after the first Monday in November in each year, to institute, direct and establish such new offices, and to abolish such old offices of the said corporation, not being established by the terms of any royal letters patent or charter, as they shall from time to time find it necessary or useful, to institute or establish: And we do also direct and ordain, that no member of any of the said committees, or of the said corporation, shall at any time be eligible to any office of the said corporation, to which any salary or emolument shall be annexed or shall belong: And whereas, we did in and by the said charter last mentioned, ordain that it should not be lawful for the said body corporate to diminish their capital stock, arising from the annual rent or income of any manors, lands, tenements, annuities, pensions, tythes or other hereditaments, whereof they should be at any time seised or possessed, but that they should confine their expenses yearly to such annual rent or income, and to such sum of money, goods and chattels, as should from year to year be subscribed or given to them, or the interest or profits thereof: Yet nevertheless, it is our will and pleasure that the said corporation should have the power of changing the nature of the property in manner here following: We do therefore, by these presents, further authorize and empower the said corporation, to sell or dispose of any lands, tenements, tythes or other hereditaments, whereof they now are, or at any time or times hereafter may be seised or possessed, and to vest the money or produce arising therefrom, in the Government funds of Ireland or of our United Kingdom, and from time to time to receive the interest and dividends thereon, for the use and support of the said society, anything in the letters patent aforesaid, or in any or either of them contained to the contrary thereof, in anywise notwithstanding: And lastly, our will and pleasure is, and we do hereby declare and ordain, that these our letters patent, and every clause, sentence and article therein contained, or the enrolment thereof, shall be in all things firm, good, valid, sufficient and effectual in the law unto the said corporation, according to the purport and tenor thereof, without any further grant, license or toleration from Us, our Heirs or Successors, to be had, procured or obtained: Provided always, That these our letters patent be enrolled in the rolls of our High Court of Chancery, in that part of our said United Kingdom called Ireland, within the space of six months from the date hereof, otherwise these our letters patent to be null and void, and of none effect, anything herein contained to the contrary in anywise notwithstanding. In witness whereof, we have caused these our letters to be made patent; Witness, our aforesaid Lieutenant General and General Governor of Ireland, at Dublin, the fifth day of December, in the fifty-ninth year of our reign.

Examination of Major George Spottiswoode; Tuesday, 29th November 1825.

Examination of Major
Geo. Spottiswoode,
29 November 1825.

WHAT situation do you hold in the Royal Hibernian Military School?—That of Commandant.

How long have you held that situation?—Five years.

Will you be so good as to describe your duties?—To have the general superintendence of every department of the Institution, to rectify every thing I see wrong, or, when beyond my own means, to represent it to the Governors; nothing can be ordered in for the use of the Institution, nor can it be paid for, without my sanction.

Describe in what way the instruction of the children falls under your notice?—I visit the School, as well as every other part of the Institution, frequently: when I observe any irregularity, or conceive any alteration would be beneficial, I communicate with the chaplain, and through him have it adjusted.

How often are you in the habit of visiting the school?—I have no particular times; I go in mostly every day, and sometimes several times a day; in regard to instruction, no children can be removed from a lower class to a higher one, without my being present with the chaplain, and examining them; at every examination that takes place, I am present.

How often do the examinations take place before you, as to the proficiency of the children?—As often as the masters of the classes represent they have children fit to be transferred to other classes, which may possibly be once a month; the chaplain and I examine them, to pass them or reject them. There are likewise half-yearly examinations, at which some of the Governors always attend, to ascertain the state of the general education of the superior classes; there is also an annual catechetical examination by the Society for discountenancing Vice.

Do you remember how many children obtained prizes at the last catechetical examination?—Probably about thirty; I do not recollect exactly; sometimes the examiners from the Society recommend children for premiums, in addition to what are given by the Society: they are given from our funds.

Does the execution of your duty bring you so frequently in communication with the children, that you know them respectively by name?—Many of them, but not the whole.

The masters of the School, we presume, know them all?—Certainly.

Have you any voice in the appointment of masters?—When a vacancy occurs, I look out for candidates; I inquire into their different qualifications as far as I can, and lay the whole of the applications before the Governors. I have no voice, further than giving my opinion of their relative merits, when asked. The successful candidate is then appointed on trial for one month; at the end of which, I hand to the committee a report from the chaplain relative to his ability to undertake the school duties, and at the same time either recommend that his appointment shall be confirmed, or not, as may appear to me most advisable, from the consideration of his general abilities and behaviour.

In case of misconduct in a master or mistress, have you any power of dismissal or suspension?—I have the power of suspension, till the pleasure of the Governors is known.

Have you ever had occasion to exercise that power?—Yes, on several occasions.

On what occasion did you last exercise that power?—Not for this last two years, I think.

For what offence was it; for incompetency, or fraud, or misbehaviour?—Some impropriety of conduct; I rather think it must have been for drinking.

Do you think it desirable to have old soldiers as masters?—I do not think they are the most capable masters that could be put over children for instruction, but they are highly essential to ensure their general regularity and cleanliness, and to superintend them effectually when out of the school; at the same time, I think there are old soldiers sufficiently educated to instruct the junior classes; I think others might be better adapted for it, if mere instruction be considered.

In addition to the instruction of the children, do you think it of importance to give them military habits, and ideas of regularity?—Not military habits, but habits of regularity.

Does not the school assume a military form; do not the children march from one place to the other?—Merely for the sake of regularity, in moving from one place to another; they are not taught to manœuvre.

Could not the children go through manœuvres; could not they form in column, and form in line?—Probably they could; they are taught to march, form in column, close and open, and wheel. It has been formerly the custom to march past the Lord Lieutenant on the King's birth-day.

Is the education the boys receive at all of a military character; are they taught the elementary principles upon which bodies of soldiers are managed?—No; none but those selected for the corps of sappers and miners are taught any thing solely with a view to military life.

Has that ever been thought desirable?—No; the Governors have never thought it desirable sirable to give them a decided military turn; many of them, from bodily health, might be unfit for it, and it might give them a dislike for any thing else.

Is it your duty to superintend the expenditure and management of the money?—No; great expenditure is undergone without the previous sanction of the Governors; the trifling occurrences of the day are all paid by me, under the Governors regulations.

Is not the institution chiefly supplied by contract?—Yes.

Is it any part of your duty to superintend the execution of the contracts; to see that the contractors furnish the goods according to the specification?—Yes, undoubtedly; and if provisions, there is a regulation, that the Surgeon, Quarter Master, and Adjutant, if on the spot, immediately make an examination, and a report in writing to me, whether of a sufficient quality or not; if clothing, it is examined by the officers in the same way, and every other article.

Does any of the money pass through your hands?—Yes; labourers wages and small payments go through my hands.

To what amount?—Probably to the amount of 60*l.* or 70*l.* per month.

In what way are you authorized to draw for that money?—I draw 30*l.* at a time, as I require it, from the acting Treasurer, who has a sum of money left in his hands for that purpose.

Does he draw it from the Bank?—It is drawn monthly, by an order given by the Governors.

Does any balance remain in your hands?—Never more than a few pounds, one way or the other.

By whom are the contractors actually paid?—By the acting Treasurer. The accounts are brought before the Governors quarterly; each account is examined by the Quarter Master, and he certifies he has received the articles; then by the Adjutant, to see that the articles are conformable to the contract in price and so forth, and agreeably to the orders previously signed by the Quarter Master, and countersigned by me; then I examine them, and confirm them with my signature, before they go to the acting Treasurer; he makes out the order, which is signed by the Chairman of the committee, and three of the Governors sign a check for the amount upon the Bank of Ireland. If it is a large sum, it is generally a draft for each contractor; if they are small sums, they are combined together, and the Treasurer pays them.

Is it part of your duty to inspect the accounts?—Yes; to see that every thing included therein has been previously authorized; and I also assist in the final examination of the accounts.

Do you examine the accounts as they are finally made up at the end of the year, before they are submitted to the Imprest Office?—I always assist in it, but the Governors go over every item in that account, previously to signing them.

We have understood from a person we have also had before us, that the shoes and the clothes are made by the boys, who are employed as tailors and shoemakers; and that the leather of which the shoes are made, and the cloth of which the jackets are made, are furnished by contract; and that persons are employed in each department to superintend the manufacture, do those persons receive any other emolument than their pay, do they live in the Institution?—They live in the Institution; they have a certain salary, rooms, coals, candles, and a suit of clothes; the whole of their allowances are detailed in the printed regulations of the Institution; but they have no perquisite or emolument in addition to what is therein stated.

If you were asked what it costs to clothe a child, and furnish him either with shoes or other clothing, you could not make out the exact estimate, from the difficulty of separating this mode of payment?—It could be easily done as to the other articles of clothing, but not as to shoes; we have only been for nine months acting under the present system.

Do you think that this system is more economical than the former?—Yes; and infinitely more beneficial to the children, in regard to their instruction in shoe-making.

Including all expenses of every kind, how much does it cost to furnish a child with shoes?—I should think about 15*s.*

And in that estimate, do you include the advantages that the shoemaker has in the Institution?—Every thing; our last contractor for shoes had 15*s.* a head, without any allowance excepting his rooms, fuel and candle, without clothing, and without salary of any kind.

Did he mend the shoes for that, as well as make them?—He did; he was a very respectable man; he was failing from old age, and the governors thought it preferable for the Instruction of the children, to take it into their own hands; he had always with it the work of the children.

Are there any officers who are borne upon the establishment of the Institution, upon retired allowances?—There are.

Will their names appear on any account that is rendered to us?—I do not think their names will; there are two schoolmistresses, these are the whole.

What superannuation do they receive?—One 25*l.* a year, and the other 30*l.*

Be so good as to state your own salary and emoluments?—My salary is 300*l.* a year, with 2*s.* a day for a horse; fuel, house partly furnished, candles and soap, and a plot of ground for a garden.

Do you provide your own food?—Yes.

And washing?—Yes; there is not an officer or assistant in the whole Establishment, that derives derives emolument from food, or the work of the children; a few servants have food in kind, but their meat is delivered separately by the butcher, and given out from the quarter master's store to them, distinct from and not mingled with, or taken from the meat of the children.

Is the salary you receive, the same as was received by your predecessor?—Yes.

And are your emoluments the same?—Yes.

Did you accept your situation upon any promise of retirement, in case of incapacity?—None whatever; it is but, as it were, an annual appointment; all the officers are elected annually; the general Board of Governors elect the Committee of Fifteen, on the first Monday in November, and the Committee of Fifteen at their next meeting re-elect the officers, or appoint others.

Are you satisfied with the regulations for the preservation of the health of the children?—I think they are very good.

Is their medical attendance sufficient?—It is.

You have a surgeon living in the hospital?—Not within the hospital, but within the walls of the Institution.

Are you satisfied with the manner in which he discharges his duties?—Yes; if I were not, I should complain to the Governors.

Is it often necessary to send children from the Institution, on account of the state of their health?—Every year; we have a house at Clontarf, to which we send whatever number the surgeon may think necessary, probably from fifty to sixty.

In what state are the children when there; how is their education attended to, and what superintendence are they under?—We have a person in charge there, with his wife, who cook and take care of the cleanliness of their persons, and their food and clothes, and there are generally some boys and girls who are monitors; they keep up the education. They are visited by myself and the Surgeon, and Chaplain occasionally.

Do you think they lose much ground in point of education during the time they are there; the question refers to such only as are well enough to receive instruction?—Undoubtedly they do lose there; we can never keep up the progress of their education equal to that of the children left in the school; their health is the chief thing for which they are sent.

Do you find in most cases they derive considerable benefit by being removed there?—Very great, particularly in scrofulous cases; many children, who probably never would have been fit for any thing, have returned, after being a few months by the sea side, to all appearance cured.

Are you at all able to ascertain, whether for the most part the children turn out well?—I have no positive means of ascertaining; we have had very favourable reports, we have had unfortunate ones likewise, but I think a great majority turn out well. One reason we have not any positive report is, that we do not give any premium at the end of the apprenticeship, therefore they have no interest in returning to the school at that period.

Have you any difficulty in providing for the children?—For girls we have, but not for boys.

Have you always more applications for boys than you are able to provide?—Yes, for months past we have refused to give boys for the army.

When they leave you, are they fit to undergo the hardships of a soldier's life?—They generally become drummers and musicians.

Do they ever embrace a maritime life from your Institution?—I have only heard of two or three instances, and that was not immediately from the school.

Do you give the preference to apprenticing the boys out, or sending them to the army?—The Governors give the children their option; but I cannot help thinking that the army is the best provision we can possibly make for the boys; it is more consistent with the mode in which they are brought up, in regard to being provided with food, clothes and other necessaries, which children brought up together cannot have the habit of seeking for themselves.

With respect to the girls, what applications have you for them?—We apprentice them as servants, and a few to milliners and other trades.

Do you give any apprentice fee with them?—None.

Do you make any inquiry into the character and circumstances of the persons who apply for apprentices?—Yes, the Governors require a certificate from the minister and churchwardens of the parish in which the applicant resides; and it is the duty of myself or the adjutant to make inquiry as to the eligibility of the person applying, and if necessary, report to the Governors, who themselves decide upon the matter; they generally see the individual who applies.

Have you any grown girls in the Institution now for whom you have a difficulty in providing?—We have a good many just now, whom we shall be very glad to provide for; the Governors consider the children eligible to go out at fourteen, and we have some that are sixteen and upwards.

What regulations have you for visiting the school on the part of the Governors?—One Governor is invited to visit the school each week.

Does that always take place?—Generally.

What course of inspection does that visitor make?—They generally visit all parts of the Institution.

Do they always go over the whole Institution?—Probably not every part of it, it is at their own discretion; sometimes they visit more than once in a week.

Do they go into the school?—Always.

Are they in the habit of examining the children so as to ascertain their proficiency?—It is

is not customary for the visiting Governors to attach much attention to the progress of the children at the time, but more to the regularity with which they are going on.

What time do they generally select?—Any time they please.

Do they generally visit the dormitories?—Generally.

Do they frequently see the children at dinner so as to see the food they have?—Yes, they do.

Do they examine the state of their clothing?—Often.

Do they make any entries in books of the opinion they form on their visit?—Yes, there is a book kept for that purpose.

[The book was produced.]

Upon examination of the book, it appears the Commander-in-chief is one of the visitors?—Yes.

And frequently visits?—Yes.

And Colonel Finch?—Yes.

Sir Colquhoun Grant?—Yes, he commands the garrison here.

Archdeacon Torrens and the Dean of St. Patrick?—Yes.

Those gentlemen are all of the Committee of Fifteen?—Yes.

And other gentlemen high in the command in the staff?—Yes.

Is there a book also kept in which the defaulters of the week are entered?—Yes, and it is submitted to the visiting Governor, and he puts his name to it.

For any offence committed by the children?—Yes.

[The book referred to was produced.]

The Commissioners see one entry of two boys who deserted in October; were those boys ever recovered?—Never.

Do you take any pains to follow them, generally?—We had no trace to ascertain where they might be found.

Can you give any reason why those boys should have deserted?—I attribute one of the boys going off to the bad advice received from an old fellow-servant; he had been acting as servant to one of the officers of the Institution, and a servant girl who had been in that family was seen talking to him in the Park the day before he went away; I attribute his departure to some bad advice of hers.

Besides those two, have you had frequent desertions in the course of the last year?—There were but three in the last year; the other was the brother of one of those two; I do not think we have had more than four desertions in the last three years.

We observe, in a minute made by a visiting Governor, the 26th of January 1823, that the senior children are stated not to bring prayer books with them to the Sunday service; has that been remedied?—It was remedied immediately; the practice is to lay that book before the next committee, and the suggestions there made are taken into the consideration of the Governors.

Does it occur to you that any alteration could be made in this Institution that would tend materially to improve it, either in the instruction of the children, or in the management of the Institution?—I think it would be an improvement, if no children, particularly girls, were received after the age of ten years; and I also think it would be highly beneficial, if some better mode could be found out for disposing of the senior girls, to remove them altogether from the school when they cease to be children; any other little matters of detail that occur to me I am in the habit of suggesting to the Governors.

Examination of Captain Martin Irving; Friday, 18th November, 1825.

DO you hold any situation connected with the Hibernian School, in the Phoenix Park?—I am Adjutant and Secretary.

How long have you held that situation?—Ten years and upwards.

By whom were you appointed?—By the Governors.

Do you reside in the building?—I reside in the Institution.

State the nature of the office you hold, and the duties you have to perform?—As Adjutant I have to attend to the general concerns of the Institution, the regulation of the children and the management of the under officers. As Secretary, I have to attend to the whole of the corresponding department of the Institution, to attend the Governors upon their Board days, and keep the minutes of the proceedings, to keep registers of the children admitted, and how disposed of after they leave the institution, and, in fact, to do every thing connected with my appointment that may be required of me.

Who is at the head of the institution?—The governors; there are upwards of eighty of them; the Lord Lieutenant is the President, and the Commander of the Forces for the time being is the Vice President. The Institution is managed by a committee of fifteen Governors, elected annually on the first Monday in November.

Do you recollect the names of the Committee?—Yes; the Vice President, Sir George Murray, is one of the committee; the next is Lieutenant General Fyers; the third, Mr. Gregory; the fourth, Colonel Shortall; the fifth is Archdeacon King; the sixth is the Dean of St. Patrick; the seventh is Major General Sir Colquhoun Grant; the eighth is the Archdeacon of Dublin; the ninth is Colonel O'Brien; the tenth is Colonel Owen; the eleventh is Colonel Gardner, the Deputy Adjutant General; the twelfth, Major General Young; the thirteenth, Mr. Luscombe, Commissary General; the fourteenth is Colonel Wedderburn, the Military Secretary; the fifteenth is Colonel Sir James Douglas, Deputy Quarter Master General.

How often does the committee meet?—On the first Tuesday in every month.

How many members make a committee?—Three.

Is there always a committee?—Yes, invariably; I never knew an instance when we were without a committee; the Governors at large meet as occasion may require; but according to the charter they meet four times in a year; the first meeting in the year is the first Monday in November, at which Board the committee of fifteen are elected for the ensuing year; then every three months afterwards the Governors assemble; but they meet generally for special purposes; such, for instance, whenever money is required, as the committee cannot of themselves, without authority from the Board, make use of the corporation seal, and the seal is necessary to every act of the Society at large.

When does the charter of the institution bear date?—The first charter, I think, is 1769; the second 1808; and we have had an amended charter since then, which was found necessary, in order to confide the election of the officers of the Establishment to the committee of fifteen, instead of the Society at large, and to enable the corporation to buy or sell lands, which they had not the power of doing before.

What number of boys are at present in the Institution?—Four hundred.

Is the number limited by the charter?—No, the Governors form their own Establishment; the present Establishment consists of six hundred; four hundred boys and two hundred girls.

At what age are they admitted?—Seven.

In what way are they disposed of?—The boys go as volunteers to the army, and to various trades and occupations as servants; the girls altogether as servants, with few exceptions, to trades, such as dress-makers and other female employments.

At what age do they leave you?—Generally from fourteen to sixteen.

Do you lose sight of them entirely after they leave you, or is there any examination into their fate?—The Governors are a party to the indentures for those that are apprenticed, and whatever the term of apprenticeship is, we have the power the indenture gives of communicating with the children, and they to communicate with us when necessary. No master can part with his servant without shewing cause, and he must give notice to the Governors, who are thereby enabled to have an officer to attend the magistrates on behalf of the apprentice, before the indentures can be cancelled.

Do you know whether in each case the boys apprenticed serve their time out?—Yes; and in many cases they remain with their masters afterwards, as well as many of the girls.

Do they in the majority of instances?—I cannot say as to the majority, because we do not know how the majority turn out, we do not give a bounty at the termination of the apprenticeship, as was formerly the practice.

Of those who are bound apprentices, are the greater number bound as servants, or to trades?—As servants, I think.

What premium do you give?—Not any, neither to trades nor as servants.

Has that been the practice of the Institution throughout since its commencement?—Ever since I have been in the Institution, and for some time before; our children are very much in demand; so much so, that at this moment we have not boys sufficient to supply the applications made to take them out as apprentices; we have a few girls, but not any boys.

What proportion of them are contented to go into the army?—If I was to give an opinion as to the ultimate entering into the army, after they get out of their apprenticeships, I should say nine-tenths; they are brought up with such military ideas that they never forget them.

What reason have you to think that?—From the information I have derived from time to time, particularly from seeing many of the individuals afterwards as soldiers, that had left us as apprentices; for excepting they get into some employment they consider superior, they prefer entering the army; there are many individuals I could name who are in very respectable employments, such as gentlemen's house stewards and as upper servants, and in situations of life quite superior to that of entering into the army; but those who have not been so fortunate as to meet with kind and considerate masters, have thought it better to resort to the army. There are many men at present, respectable citizens of Dublin, that I know, who were educated in our Institution; but notwithstanding, I am convinced that nine-tenths of the the boys (taking those that go to the army in the first instance, and those that volunteer afterwards), go there ultimately.

Have you any means of knowing what becomes of the girls?—Not so much so; the girls sometimes marry; and they frequently, after the expiration of their apprenticeship, come and shew themselves at the Institution; they appear well dressed, and in other respects respectable. There are many I know at this moment who were apprenticed out since I have been in the Institution, who are now in the same families; some as upper nurses, and some as upper servants.

Has it come to your knowledge that many have turned out ill?—Very few, and fewer than I could have supposed possible, from our vicinity to that sink of iniquity, Barrack-street, and their connections and friends being of a certain class.

What class of children are admissible to the Institution?—Children of soldiers of the regular army only.

According

According to what rule is the admission regulated?—They are classed; the orphan child is the first class, having no parents; the second class is, the child who has lost a father; the third class is, the child that has a father, but has lost a mother; the fourth class is divided into many grades; and there are children that have both parents living, but it is the circumstances of the parents in a great degree that cause the Governors to exercise their humanity in admitting; one great cause is, when a regiment, as in the case of the Royals, who are now under orders for the West Indies, a certain portion of the women are only allowed to accompany their husbands, and the rest are left without any means of support; there are no poor laws, and consequently, if without friends willing and able to support them, they are left to the bounty of the public; and the Governors have in such cases extended their preference to them.

Are illegitimate children admitted?—No; it is essential that the marriage certificate of the parents should accompany the application for the child's admission; the Governors are very particular upon that point.

You say seven years is the earliest at which they admit them?—In some cases, where an orphan is actually left in the street, the Governors have extended the limits a few months or a year; but that is the regular period at which they ought to be received.

How old is the latest?—Not beyond twelve.

Does the same rule, with respect to age, apply to boy and girl?—Yes; but the Governors are much more particular as to age, when they come to a certain period of life; if a child appears full twelve years of age, they hesitate to admit him; for we find that a child at that time of life brings into the school very bad habits; the worst children we have ever had have been that description of children; and the Governors have had it in contemplation to limit the age to an earlier period than twelve; but something or other caused them to adhere to the original regulations.

Are children admitted if unhealthy?—No, the surgeon attends the committee at every admission day; he not only certifies that they are free from any disease, but also that they are likely to do well; and he is attending the Board to answer any questions put to him.

When children are admitted, is the religion of their parents ever ascertained?—No, we never make any inquiry at all; it is fully explained to the parents, that whatever child is brought to us, must be brought up strictly according to the Establishment, and they know the terms upon which they make the application.

Can you state the number of admissions in each of the three last years, distinguishing between boys and girls?—I cannot state it from recollection, but I will furnish a return; the average may be taken at about 100 each year.

Does any considerable number of them die?—No, very few.

What is their average continuance with you?—I am not prepared to answer; I should conceive generally from three to six years.

Do many elope?—Very few, indeed; we have had three desertions lately, within the last three or four weeks, and we had not had a runaway for a long time before.

Are you forced to watch them very diligently to prevent it?—Not at all, by no means; two of those that ran away were brothers, and I attribute it entirely to the father, who is a police constable in the county of Cork; he had written to say, he would take the oldest boy, William M'Guire, out of the school at Midsummer last; he did not do it, and the boy, who was rather unwell, was sent to Clontarf to a small establishment we have for scrofulous children; while there, he heard that his brother had run away with another boy, and he ran away also.

Is there any disease now, or has there been at any late time particularly prevalent in the hospital?—The disease that formerly was most prevalent when I joined the Institution, was ophthalmia; at that time I joined the Institution it was the purulent Egyptian ophthalmia I had seen in the army; it has since worked itself out; we have still what may be called inflamed eyes, but nothing like that purulent ophthalmia.

Did it come periodically?—I think it did; and about the autumnal equinox is the time I most dread it. I attribute it in a great degree to the children being more exposed to the dust of the gravelled yard, and that kind of thing; but even independent of that, it is epidemic; children not at all exposed, get it from others.

Are children admitted in greater numbers into the hospital at any one period of the year than another?—During the winter we have the greatest number of applications, and when provisions are at a high price.

Are the children lodged, clothed and fed, as well as taught?—They are.

What clothing do they receive?—A suit of full clothing in a year; the clothing consists of a lined jacket in uniform, a pair of trowsers lined, woollen stockings, shoes, a woollen cap, shirts, and necessaries of all kinds; our general supply is about two shirts and two pair of stockings every year to each child.

Do they always wear their stockings?—Yes; our girls, in summer time, wear cotton stockings; the boys wear woollen stockings the year round.

In what manner is the clothing provided?—By contract for the materials, and we make every thing up ourselves; for instance, the clothing is provided in this way; an advertisement is put into the two general morning papers that are read in Dublin, calling for tenders for the supply of such woollen cloths, &c. as we stand in need of, and the tenders are received by the committee; and whatever pattern of cloth they think best worth the money, they take it, and the party furnishes the quantity required, which is inspected on delivery, and after being approved, it is lodged in the quarter master's store, from whence it is put into the hands of our tailor, and made up into garments. We have a master tailor kept constantly employed, and we generally employ a journeyman tailor six, eight or ten months in the year, according to the number of boys we have capable of work; we have, generally, sixty tailors among the boys; we consider it an essential part of their instruction, to make them able to mend their own clothing.

Are the contracts for the supply of cloth usually taken by the same people?—Oh no, various people.

Have you ever had reason to believe that the contracts have been taken by persons connected with any officers employed in the Institution?—No; the people that have taken the clothing contract, are a Mr. Howell, in Molesworth-street, he had it for two or three years; a man of the name of Lane, a Cork man, had it two or three years; and this year, a person of the name of Henderson, has it. The Governors will not bind themselves to say, that the tradesman who furnishes the red cloth shall furnish the others, unless the other articles are equally approved of.

According to what rule is the clothing delivered?—Our annual clothing is considered to be due the 5th of January, the commencement of the treasury year; we generally wear it only on Sundays till after the winter fires are put out, which is generally the 14th or 16th of April; then the new clothing is put upon the children, and it is worn for the remainder of the year. The best of the old clothing that has till this time been in wear, is selected for the use of the employed boys; for instance, we have sixty boys employed in the garden, for we raise all our own vegetables and potatoes; those boys wear the old clothes. The same thing attaches to the tailors, to the shoemakers, to the masons, carpenters, and all casually employed boys, such as pioneers, coal carriers, and all others employed on any kind of fatigue-duty which would destroy their better clothing. When the clothing is in that state that it is no longer fit to be worn, it is dismantled; the buttons are saved to be put upon other clothing, the old clothing is all cut up, and such parts as will answer to repair the other clothes is kept for that purpose, and such part as is useless for repair, is made up into mops, and distributed throughout the Institution to keep the floors clean. It has been a principle since I have been in the Institution, to endeavour to impress upon the minds of those young people, to be careful of every thing, and not to let any, the smallest article, go to waste.

According to what rule are the boys supplied with food?—By contracts; the contracts for food are taken at a very different part of the year; for the clothing, the contracts are taken in the Spring, generally the first Tuesday in May; but for the supply of provisions they are taken in September, never later than the first Tuesday in September, the contract is made for them to commence on the 17th of September, the Governors conceiving that is the cheapest and best time of the year to get their supply; the Governors require sealed tenders for these supplies.

Is the contract for one year?—Yes; the last year in consequence of the fluctuations in the markets, the governors have introduced a new condition into the contract bond, namely, that the contractor shall be at liberty to relinquish his contract at any period of the year, by giving two months notice, the Governors being at liberty to relinquish it by giving one month's notice; there were such constant applications for remuneration in consequence of the altered state of the market, that the Governors thought it better to adopt this condition.

Have they ever had recourse to it yet?—No, it was only introduced last September.

Will you describe the dietary of the children?—It is very simple; our breakfast the year round is stirabout and milk; the supper the year round is bread and milk, when there is a sufficiency of milk; when there is a deficiency of milk from our own cows, we give bread and gruel in its stead; we have three meat days in a week, the children receive half a pound of beef each, but it is divided according to the ages and sizes of the children; the large boys, with those employed out in the garden, and in the farm yard, get a larger share than the smaller children; indeed the smaller children could not eat a full share, they get half a pound all round each, and our general supply of potatoes is about six hundred weight, sometimes more and sometimes less, with a quantity of cabbage and greens, that is, three times a week, then upon the days immediately succeeding the beef days, the liquor in which the beef was boiled the previous day is made into soup by the addition of ox-heads, pot-herbs, and vegetables; this, with bread, forms the dinner for the three other days; formerly on Thursday the dinner used to be calecannon, a dish made of cabbage, potatoes, and butter, but the children made a decided objection to it, and the governors substituted pea soup instead of it; they were led to do that in consequence of our having established a piggery in the Institution, rather than to see the offal that went out from the childrens meals go upon the dunghill, by which means we have given them a dinner of pea soup upon Thursday, in addition to which, from the piggery, we have credited to the public from twenty to thirty or forty pounds a year by the sale of pigs.

How often have the children clean linen?—Sundays and Thursdays.

Do they sleep singly or together?—The greater part sleep in double beds, the beds that have latterly been introduced have been single beds.

Are the beds of wood or iron?—Wood, the double bedsteads, with very few exceptions, and the single bedsteads iron.

How often have they clean sheets?—Every three weeks, sometimes in summer every fortnight.

What facilities have the children to keep themselves clean?—Each sex has a distinct washing room; it is the first thing done in the morning after they have made up their beds and been to prayers; they come into those washing rooms; the upper troughs are so formed that they can wash their hands, faces, necks, and heads, and the soap water is then let down into into the lower troughs, where they wash their feet and legs, for in this respect we endeavour to impress upon the children economy of soap.

Are the vessels that are used for washing ever applied to any other purpose?—Never.

Have cutaneous diseases ever prevailed at any time to any extent in the Institution?—

We have had the itch to a considerable extent; when I came into the Institution it was in a very so so state in that respect, but it was very soon overcome, it only required a little correction; the Commissioners must be aware, that in any Institution like ours, where the parents have access to them, they will very soon communicate a disease of that description, but to prevent it we have frequent inspections, and particularly upon clean shirt days, when the children are in a state of nakedness; they are looked at by the surgeon, and any thing wrong is immediately taken to the Infirmary.

Under what rules or regulations is the communication between the parents and the children permitted?—On the Sunday they are allowed one hour immediately after the children come out from dinner: about half past two a bell rings, and under the inspection of two serjeants they are allowed to see them, and when the bell rings again they are obliged to leave them.

Do the parents generally visit them?—Yes; I think they do; there are some exceptions of worthless people, that do not visit them; it is our object to keep up the connection between the parent and the child as much as possible; if a parent was to present himself at the gate, and say he had come to see a child, and could not come on Sunday, the child would be called out immediately; and whenever a child is taken ill, we always endeavour to inform the parent that the child is unwell, and if dangerous, we endeavour to get the mother to come and nurse the child, and she is admitted into the infirmary.

Do you ever find, that attempts are made by Roman Catholic parents to instil into the minds of their children, Roman Catholic sentiments?—It is very rare; such a thing has been done; there was a very extraordinary circumstance of that kind occurred, Christmas twelve months; we are always in the habit of granting an indulgence to well behaved children at Christmas and Easter; it is this; if a parent or friend requires a child to be with them a certain number of days, that is, from Sunday generally to the following school day, Wednesday, Thursday or Friday, they bring a certificate signed either by a commissioned officer in the garrison or belonging to the army here, or if they are totally unconnected with the army, from the minister and churchwardens, stating that they reside in such a place, and two housekeepers give a pledge that the child shall be returned at the end of the pass, and generally we have 150 children go on those passes; among the rest of the papers given in to the gate porter, there were two from a woman, requesting her own children, I think, two children and a nephew, and another given in by a mother, requesting a boy; these children got their passes, under the guarantee, as we supposed, of those householders, the children not returning at the expiration of the pass, we made application to know who those householders were, and we found the certificates were wholly fictitious, or nearly so; this roused us a little, and we found that a society called the St. Beneventure, had been formed at a chapel on one of the quays, which society was formed for taking children belonging to Roman Catholic parents, out of Protestant schools; we were totally unaware of any thing of this kind, and if the parents had come forward and stated a request to get their children out, the Governors would have no doubt granted it, for at that moment there were hundreds who would have been glad to have availed themselves of the charity. The Governors felt themselves extremely hurt that this should have taken place, when they had acted so liberally upon every occasion; when it was found that this society had been formed, and was acting in this way, I applied to a person I was acquainted with, connected with our Establishment, to whom I mentioned the circumstance, and stated, that I was told that a Roman Catholic priest, of the name of Hayes, was connected with this society; this person said he was astonished that they should think of interfering in our Establishment, and he gave me particular information about this society; I learnt that a man of the name of Riley, a linen draper, in Pill-lane, was either at the head of this society, or that he was one of its most efficient members; I had Mr. Riley summoned before a magistrate, to give up the children. Mr. Riley had a counsel there, and defended himself, and said he would not answer any questions; the father of one of those children was in the country, and we wrote to him, to know whether it was by his advice or consent, the child had been withdrawn; he came up to Dublin immediately, and was very much enraged to find what had been the case; the mother was a Catholic, and the father a Protestant; he got hold of his own child, and brought her back to the school. We never got the other two girls or the boy back again; nor did we press the matter further before the magistrate; according to the rules of the Institution, no child can be apprenticed but to a Protestant, but it sometimes happens that where a relation of a child is a Roman Catholic, and a respectable tradesman is desirous, with the consent of parents, to take a child as an apprentice, the Governors will not apprentice the child to him, but they will give the child to the parents, so that the parents may dispose of the child as they think proper.

Have you reason to believe, that many children educated in your Institution, subsequently become Roman Catholics?—Indeed I think not; I am speaking of the children who remain with us the usual length of time. The Governors are in the constant habit of giving children to parents, if they shew they can educate them and maintain them in a proper way, and many children, after being two or three years with us, go into the country, and they are there bred Roman Catholics, I dare say, but those that remain in the school till fourteen, are, I expect, so well grounded in their religious principles, that it would not be an easy matter to shake them; I may observe, that the cause why some of the children apprenticed from us have turned out badly, I have traced to a difference in religion; almost all the domestics in this country are Roman Catholics; our children, being brought up to the establishment, are desirous of going to church on a Sunday. If the master or mistress, or both, are not particular in supporting the apprentice, the other servants will always endeavour to bring him round to go to chapel; if the child has strength of mind to resist, he is every thing that is bad; if he yields, he is every thing that is good; that is the way that the children are treated, if they have got into improper hands; I have also observed, that the lower in life that the person is you have to deal with, the more determined, and, if I might use the expression, the more bigoted they are to that kind of thing; it is not among the higher orders, professing the Roman Catholic religion, you meet with things of this kind.

We understand from you that the boys are partly employed in labour; in what way do you apportion their time between labour and instruction?—The garden boys are generally two days in the school, and one day in employment, and the tailors the same time; the shoemakers are alternately employed in school and shoemaking work. At this season of the year we consider we have the best schooling, because our evening school is the most efficient we have, all the children being present; it commences at five, and ends at seven o'clock, so that in fact the winter to us is better than summer, as far as education is concerned.

What hours do they work?—That depends upon the season of the year; the longest work they have is from about six in the morning till half past seven, from half past eight till half past twelve, and from two to six; that is the longest period of work; at present they work from about a quarter or twenty minutes past seven in the morning till half past eight; they go out again at half past nine, and remain out till half past twelve, they go out again at two, and remain out till about five, according to the daylight, perhaps three quarters past four.

What hours do they rise at different periods of the year?—The earliest we get up is half past five; the first drum beats at that time, and we decrease down to seven, and they are half an hour in the dormitories before they come out.

At what time do they go to bed?—According to the season of the year; in summer time about nine, in winter about eight, in the intermediate time it is decreased according to the length of the days.

What are their school hours on the alternate school days?—In summer time they go in at nine and remain till twelve, in the morning; in the afternoon they go in at half past two, and remain till six; those are the school hours; and as you cut off from the day school you increase the night school, so that in summer and winter we have nearly the same; in winter time bad weather interferes, particularly with the gardeners, and they cannot get out at all.

Who is the principal schoolmaster?—The chaplain is the superintendent of the school.

What attendance is he able to give in the school?—He gives generally two or three days in a week. Our serjeant major is considered the schoolmaster, who is immediately in the school, and answerable for it.

What assistants has he?—All our serjeants are called serjeants of instruction, but we only employ three in the school, two are kept for out duties; there is a serjeant major, a head serjeant, and two others; there is a head schoolmistress and two others under her, one for needle work and knitting, and the other for education,

Are the children long enough with you to attain any considerable proficiency in reading and writing?—The Governors are not desirous to take them too far; our schooling is generally reading and writing, and the four first rules in arithmetic; they generally read pretty well and write pretty well. It is not the Governors wish they should go beyond what is necessary to make them useful members of society; if a boy should shew any particular genius, his instructors may take him on to mathematics. All the boys intended for the corps of sappers and miners are taught a little practical geometry.

What books are used in the school?—I can scarcely tell you; we have a good many in our library and school.

In what way are the persons selected who are appointed schoolmasters or assistants?—Latterly they have been advertized for; they are men of the best character and abilities; army men in general have been preferred, excepting for the situation of head schoolmaster, and it has been found necessary to get men better acquainted with the system of education than non-commissioned officers generally are.

How long has the present head schoolmaster been there?—Upwards of twelve months, and he was the first introduced who had not been in the army.

Do you know where he was educated?—In the north, I believe at Belfast.

In what way is the produce of the children's industry applied, whatever it may be?—All for the benefit of the Institution; the tailors and shoemakers are employed in making up the clothes they wear themselves, and for the other children, and the girls make up all the linen; all the stockings are knit by them, and every thing that can be done in their department; the gardeners supply the vegetables and potatoes for the Institution, and we have always been able, for the last seven or eight years, to supply ourselves with potatoes, and sell a considerable quantity.

Are there any individuals in the Institution who derive any advantage, direct or indirect, from the profit of the labour?—None whatever; and it is one of the Governors regulations, that if any of the officers receive, directly or indirectly, any perquisite or fee beyond their pay and allowance, they would be immediately removed.

Do the children labour willingly, or is there much compulsion used?—No compulsion.

Did you ever know a child punished for not working?—No, not unless he had been guilty of any other offence, but not for his objection to work; we endeavour to give them rewards; rewards; we consider a deserving child is just as much entitled to reward as a disobedient child is to punishment. Our potatoe digging was finished on Wednesday, and we shall have our harvest home supper on Saturday week probably.

Is the division of the boys into squads for labour permanently kept?—Yes, they are, and generally the boy selects his own business. We have always candidates to supply any deficiency.

The tailors never work in the garden?—No, except on a very great emergency.

How often in the week do the children attend divine worship?—They attend every Sunday in the chapel, and the chaplain performs service in the schoolroom three times in the week, upon Wednesday and Friday mornings, and Sunday evening.

Are there daily prayers?—There are.

Have the goodness to state the funds that there are for the maintenance of the Institution?—The funds are derived from money in the funds, of our own, and some small estates in the country, and an annual parliamentary grant.

Are those the only sources?—Yes, except that you consider the labour of the children under that head. Whatever savings we can make; we sell every thing that we can, down to the bones that come out of the beef, and broken glass; the only things that come into our charge, are the things I have mentioned.

Do you receive any donations or bequests?—Yes; we receive bequests occasionally; but as to donations, I have not known of any, for since we have been considered a national institution, those donations have fallen off.

What was the amount of the annual grant voted to you in each of the three last years?—It is lower now than it ever was; our Governors have cut it down as much as they possibly could; at present it is about 8,000*l*. When I came into the Institution, it used to be about thirteen or fourteen thousand pounds a year; there were only 510 children when I joined, and there are now 600, and our grant has not only been cut down every year, but we have also, upon two separate occasions, re-credited to the public very considerable sums. I will not charge myself with how many thousand pounds we have given them back again.

By whom are your accounts annually inspected?—By the Commissioners at the Audit Office.

Are they not carefully inspected by the committee of fifteen?—Yes, invariably; the mode of transacting the pecuniary matters of the Institution is this: the committee of fifteen only can draw drafts upon the bank; three Governors of the committee are obliged to sign each draft; the basis for each bill is this; there is an order in print and writing, signed first by the quarter master, and either counter-signed by the commandant, or in his absence by myself, to state the quantity of the article wanted for the Institution. At the end of the quarter, these bills are all rendered, and those bills are inspected, first, by the quarter master, who signs his name, to certify that those articles came into his possession; and next they come to me, as secretary, and I go over all of them, to see that the charges are made according to the contract prices, and compare them with the orders, of which I have counterparts; the commandant confirms those by his signature; they are then sent to our acting treasurer, and he makes out orders, to be signed by the chairman of the committee; and when the bills are inspected, to be paid, he attends the committee, and every thing is called over; for instance, "Wm. Farrell, beef and ox heads," so much; the chairman looks over it, and says, "is this according to order?" yes; then he signs the order for payment; then upon that, a check is prepared, and three of the Governors sign this, and it is paid by the bank of Ireland.

Upon the inspection of the accounts by the Commissioners of the Audit Office, have you ever known any disallowances or any objections taken?—There have been sums objected to for explanation; one of the Governors, who signs the account attends; when the accounts are prepared annually, they are passed by the general board, and every Governor signs his name, and the seal of the corporation is fixed to them, and then they are given in to the Imprest Office for examination; then a Governor who signs the accounts, and the commandant and myself are summoned, and we are all examined upon oath as to those accounts; and when we have been present upon those occasions, they have asked us various questions as to certain expenditures, all of which have been satisfactorily explained, and I never knew a single shilling disallowed.

How much per head do you reckon the expense of each child?—Including every thing, between ten guineas and eleven pounds; I am speaking of British money, of course.

Are the buildings in good repair?—Yes, excellent; we have our own mason and our own carpenter; that used to be a source of great expenditure formerly, which has been very much curtailed.

Has the building always been repaired and maintained by the funds of the society, or have the board of works ever had any thing to do with it?—Never, as far as my recollection goes; the old records of the Institution are under my charge, and I think they never have.

Do the officers living in the building supply their own furniture?—A certain part they do; it is a very trifling part now supplied by the Institution; formerly the Institution supplied every thing; for the last four years, they have not, they only supply certain articles; it is a very trifling expense the Governors are at upon that account.

Is there any public examination of the children in the course of the year by the Governors?—Yes, twice a year; in April and in October.

To what does that examination go?—To their proficiency in general education; it is confined to the upper classes. There is also an examination that takes place by the gentlemen connected with the Society for discountenancing Vice; a catechetical examination.

Appendix, N° 5.

Examination of Captain
Martin Irving,
18 November 1825.

Do they attend that now?—Yes, and they are very liberal in granting premiums; we generally get four and five-and-twenty from them every year.

Have the majority of masters at present been soldiers, or have they been persons brought up more immediately connected with schools?—All have been soldiers except the head schoolmaster.

Has there been any alteration attempted lately in that respect in the last two years?—Yes, there was an alteration with respect to this head schoolmaster, and it has produced much good.

Has it ever been agitated before the Committee of Fifteen to introduce other persons as serjeants of instruction, who have been brought up as schoolmasters?—No, the feeling is, that they would be very desirous of employing army men; and if they could have met with an army man qualified, they would have employed him in preference to the present head-master.

Do you think that the present serjeants are qualified for the duties they have to discharge?—Yes, as far as we educate our children.

The school we collect is altogether of a military character?—Yes, they are formed into companies, and are put into motion by the beat of drum.

They have military terms?—Yes.

Have you a master of gymnastics?—Yes, that has very lately been introduced.

Do you find it beneficial to the children?—Yes, I think it increases their muscular strength; we have not had a single child it has disagreed with but one, and he was a boy of a very weakly habit of body before.

Are the girls at all subject to the discipline of the master of gymnastics?—Yes, they are; but they are attended by their own mistresses; that is a thing of very recent standing indeed; only the last four or five weeks; and I think it will do them quite as much good as the boys.

You think it likely to answer in that department of the school also?—I do.

In general, what are the modes of punishment adopted for misconduct?—We have very little punishment indeed; our most serious punishment is birching; and we do not resort to that, but in cases of a peculiar description; if a boy is guilty of theft we punish him very severely.

The punishments are not at all frequent?—No, I will be bound to say, there is not a boarding school in the country of twenty boys, that do not or ought not to punish more than we do.

Are they much addicted to lying?—Formerly they were much more so than now; we have got over it; but when a boy comes in of eight or nine years of age, it is impossible to get the truth out of him at first; of course there are some exceptions, where the morals of children have been better attended to by their parents.

In what manner have you got over that habit of telling falsehoods?—I would never forgive a falsehood; when a boy was coming forward to be punished, if he ingenuously told the truth, I never punished him; and in consequence of that, they get into the habit of telling the truth.

Is it optional with the parents to withdraw the children?—No, it is in the breast of the Governors.

Do you conceive, in point of fact, there is any large proportion of those children the offspring of Roman Catholic parents?—Yes, a large proportion.

Both father and mother?—Yes; when children are taken from us at a very early period of life, and go back to their parents, there is very little doubt of that child going to chapel.

Appendix, N° 6.

Examination of
Rev.
T. Philip Lefanu,
21 November 1825.

WHAT situation do you hold in connection with the Hibernian Military School?—That of chaplain and superintendent of morals.

How long have you held that office?—Since the middle of the year 1814.

Will you be good enough to state your salary and emoluments?—My salary is 250*l.* a year; the emoluments are a house, in a good measure furnished, a small portion of ground for a garden, ten tons of coals annually, a pound of soap and candles weekly, and ten loads of hay, provender for a cow.

Will you be so good as to describe generally the duties you have to perform?—The duties of my situation are, to perform divine service twice, and to preach at noon on Sundays and the great holidays of the church; to have the catechetical instruction of the children, and the general superintendence of the whole of their education; I read prayers twice a week also in the school, on Wednesdays and Fridays.

Is the catechetical instruction connected with the Society for discountenancing Vice?—Thus far; there is a public examination every year, about the month of August, at which I think generally a number, amounting to about one-third of the whole establishment of the children, which consists of six hundred, is examined, being divided into classes according to their proficiency. They are examined by clergymen of Dublin, belonging to the association, or sanctioned by it, and they get premiums of bibles and testaments and religious books, books, just as the association assists all other similar establishments, but in no other way, nor has that association any controul whatever over our establishment.

Then we understand that the weekly catechetical examinations are made by yourself, and the annual examination is made by clergymen on the part of the Society for the Suppression of Vice?—Yes; and at that examination all the governors of our own establishment are invited to be present, and some do come.

When was that system adopted?—I found the system of public examination in force when I was appointed; how long it may have been so before I do not know.

Have you the general superintendence of the children on the establishment; is it any part of your duty or practice to examine the dormitories or dietary, or to see them at dinner?—It is not any immediate part of my duty to examine as to the dietary; it comes under the medical department; but it is my duty to go into every part of the establishment occasionally to see that there is nothing amiss; and if there be any thing amiss, I am to report it to the commandant; I am to visit every part of the establishment at uncertain times.

Have you any immediate superintendence of the schoolmasters?—Yes, I am to see that they bring on the children properly, that they perform the details of instruction in reading, writing and arithmetic; and I cause them to prepare the children in a certain portion of the Scriptures and catechism, in which I examine them myself every week, according to their classes.

By whom are the schoolmasters appointed?—The schoolmasters are appointed by the committee of fifteen, I having first reported on their capability.

On examination?—Yes; they are for a month upon trial, then I must report upon their capability, not only as to their being able to teach, but their method of teaching also; in the first instance, the candidate makes his application to the committee of fifteen, and then he is sent down to the school, and I report within a month, and he is either established or dismissed.

What number of schoolmasters are there?—There are five Serjeants of Instruction, as they are called (our's being a military establishment), but three only of those are employed permanently in teaching in the school; the other two have the charge of the children out of school, or what is called the orderly duty; but they must be men qualified to go into the school, and do the school duty, should any of those attending there be unwell, or otherwise taken off, that the school business may not be interrupted. There are but three actually employed in the school. The Serjeant Major has the general superintendence in the school, but he has various other duties, and is not permanently in the school; he is over those three men, and under me, as far as relates to school duties.

Is the system of mutual instruction adopted in the school?—Yes, chiefly upon Bell's plan.

Has it been found to succeed?—Yes, it answers very well.

Do you also superintend the education of the girls?—Yes.

Are the mistresses chosen according to the same rules as the masters?—Yes; it was just upon my appointment that the instruction upon Bell's plan was acted upon; previously to my appointment, there had been six Serjeants of Instruction in the boys school, and there were ninety boys less on the establishment.

Are the schoolmasters always chosen from among men who have been soldiers?—Yes, always, until last year, when the Governors, wishing to give the two senior classes a better manner of reading, and a freer method of writing, have appointed a person of rather better education; he has the charge of those two classes; he ranks, as to pay, as a serjeant, but does not wear a uniform, and is exempted from other duties, not immediately connected with the school, which a serjeant has to perform.

Has the expected benefit resulted from that appointment?—Yes, I think so; the children read better; they read formerly well, but with a tone; they have got rid of that in good measure, and write more freely and quicker. We exercise them a great deal in writing from dictation, which is a thing that will make them useful in the army. I introduced this plan myself.

Do you think it would be better to choose schoolmasters from the general population, and not to confine it solely to the class of persons who have been soldiers; would you not be likely to get much better schoolmasters?—I do not think such a change desirable, as we are circumstanced; I think there are always persons to be found in the army fit to instruct the junior classes of children; and I think it is desirable that there should be an encouragement held out to deserving persons in the army to fill such situations, as you are thus providing for meritorious soldiers.

Is there much of military instruction in the school?—A good deal, as far as relates to military exercises, marching, and evolutions; and our Governors have introduced lately a system of gymnastics.

Is the military discipline practised by the boys such as to produce much influence upon their character; are they more orderly than those educated in the general way?—I think it must.

Are they taught the manual exercise?—No; they have nothing in the way of arms at all.

Are they taught to march?—Yes, and to perform various evolutions; and that makes them more orderly in every thing respecting the school duties.

By evolutions, do you mean military movements?—They march, and form into companies; they are able to go through what is usual at a review; they generally come out on the King's birth-day, and march before the Lord Lieutenant. A certain number of them are taught the fife and drum, who form a little band; the boys march to the chapel to the fife and drum; the boys also act as sentries, that the children may not absent themselves from school improperly, and for other purposes.

T. Philip Lefanu,
21 November 1825.

We have been informed the boys do a great deal of work upon the farm and garden, and in making clothes, working as tailors and shoemakers; do you think the hours of work and study are properly divided, or do you think that the work interferes materially with their instruction?—We have found a difficulty in this matter; and I have at times been obliged to represent, that a little more time would be necessary for study; but as it is at present arranged, I think a child who is not remarkably dull, taking his share of each mode of employment, can get competent education for the rank of life he is intended to fill.

In working according to the rules of the establishment, how many years would it take a boy of ordinary capacity to read fluently, to write a current hand, and become acquainted with the first four rules of arithmetic, and also to learn the catechism, and go through his catechetical examinations with credit?—I think four years; a boy indeed will read an easy book in about fourteen months. The children are not in general put to trades when they first come to the school; they have time to learn to read tolerably before they are put to the trades; but to get all the benefit that the school is intended to afford, it would take them at least about four years, or perhaps from four to five.

What may be the average continuance of the boys in the school?—I think it takes a boy, one way and another, near four years to get up to the head class; and then they remain a year, or a year and a half, seldom two years, after getting to that class, before they go out; that makes about six years.

At what age would you consider a boy superannuated?—There is a strict regulation upon that point; we put the boys upon the apprentice list at fourteen, and at that age also they are eligible to go into the army; we dispose of them then as fast as we can, when once they attain the age of fourteen.

Is the course of instruction, upon the whole, such as to satisfy you?—Indeed it is; I think they get a competent education for their rank in life. There was one branch of knowledge which I wished to be introduced into the school, and which I still hope may be so hereafter, I think it would be an improvement, that is Pestalozzi's system of arithmetic.

Have you seen that practised in schools in this country?—Yes, I have seen it practised with very great effect in a school in this neighbourhood, the Kildare-place school. I knew something of the system before. In the first place, it gives the child a reason for the operations and rules he makes use of, and therefore makes him know arithmetic thoroughly, and not merely mechanically; but another and more important use is, that it exercises the powers of thinking of the child, and makes him able to apply those powers to other things.

Have you had any opportunity of observing whether the children are contented and satisfied at the school?—I never saw in any institution more cheerful or more free-hearted children; and when the Commissioners come so see them, I think they will see it in their countenances.

Are you much teased with complaints by the children?—Very little; and we have very little punishment.

Do they live in a state of very great terror or apprehension of the masters?—I think there is no terror at all, and that degree of fear only which produces subordination; for they have immediate redress, if any of the inferior masters should go beyond the rules; they have only to come to me, or to the commandant, and they would have immediate redress. The corporal punishment that is used (I mean whipping,) of which there is but a little, is never inflicted but in the presence of myself, if it is for any offence connected with their school business; or if it is for other things, in the presence of the commandant or of the adjutant. The inferior officers have no power to flog a child; they are not allowed to give more than two pandies, without reporting the child, for any one offence.

Have you any difficulty in disposing of the children?—There is none at all; the disposing of the boys for the army would take more from us than we can furnish. We do not put them into the army but with their own consent, and most of them wish to go; the army would, I believe, take all. We have some little difficulty with the girls, because they, in almost all instances, go to service, as we give no apprentice fee to such as might go to trades.

Have you many of the age of fourteen?—We have some of fourteen, and some older; there will always be some, because, though put on the apprentice list at that age, they cannot always be immediately provided for. There are, I think, four or five cases on our books of children of upwards of twenty, but they are diseased children that we pension out; they are in the county of Wicklow, and are not within the walls.

Do you keep persons of that description within the walls of the institution?—No; there is a trifle allowed to some person in the county of Wicklow where they go, when they are quite destitute; there was a girl subject to epileptic fits, we could never provide for her; she is at a farm house, and occasionally teaches the children there; she is a remarkably well behaved girl, and is very useful to those with whom she lives.

Have you any returns that will shew what proportion of the children go to services, what number go as apprentices, and what number go to the army?—Yes, that information can be furnished.

Are you acquainted with what becomes of the children after they leave you, so as to know whether they turn out well or ill?—I think there is no regular mode of coming at that knowledge; to procure and preserve authentic documents on the subject is a thing I think ought to be done, it would be highly desirable; I am sure such returns would be found creditable to the establishment; and at all events very satisfactory, as showing how it works; there may be such returns, but I do not think there are.

What opinion have you formed upon the subject, as to their turning out well or ill?—
From

From all the inquiries I have made, and it is a thing I have been anxious about, they turn out well in the main.

Do any of the girls fall into unfortunate courses?—I believe such occurrences are very rare.

Do the children for the most part preserve their connection with their friends and relations, supposing the question to apply to such children as have parents?—They do; the parents are allowed to come and see them every Sunday; there is a particular hour after dinner on Sunday, from half past two to four, when any of the parents may come and see their children at the establishment; and if there are parents or relatives who come from the country, and call on a week day, they are never refused admission.

Do you make any distinction on the ground of religion, as to the permission given to the parents to see the children?—Oh, dear no; there is no distinction of religion as to the admission of the children into the establishment, and never any objection on that score to their seeing their friends; the only ground of objection made to the children being seen by their parents is, when a child has the misfortune to have very ill-conducted immoral parents.

Have you any reason to think that the parents of the children who are Roman Catholics, have any desire to see them, to instil Roman Catholic principles into their minds?—No, I think not in general; we have had indeed instances of a child being taken by its parents on the Sunday to mass, which we do not allow (considering it to be unfair conduct), as the parents know, when they apply for the admission of their children that they are to be brought up Protestants; and in consequence of such instances, there was a regulation made that the children should not go out to their friends on Sundays; they may go out on the week days, and the parents may see them at the institution on Sunday.

Have you any reason to know what happens to the children with respect to religion after they quit you, do they continue Protestants or do many turn Roman Catholics?—I have not much opportunity of knowing, for they go to all parts of the world; but in some instances the mothers try to get them out of good places for the purpose of bringing them over to their own persuasion; an instance of this kind occurred some years ago; there were three fine boys of the name of Fitzpatrick in the school, and I had been instrumental in procuring for them places as servants in different parts of the kingdom, all very eligible; the mother went after them and got two to go away, and was going to take away the third, but his master found it out and prevented it; he remained in his place and turned out well; what became of the others I do not know, but the mother had no means of providing for them; I met a boy some years ago, who I found some time after his leaving the school had become a sailor; upon my inquiring the cause, he told me he had been tormented very much when he went home to become a Roman Catholic, of which persuasion one of his parents was, and that at last he was made so unhappy, because he could not conscientiously change his religion, that he went to sea on that account.

Is the religious instruction the children obtain during the course of their education such as to make a permanent impression upon their minds?—I should hope so; it is my endeavour always to bring it home to their hearts as a matter of conscience, and to apply it to the practical details of life; to show them there is no religion unless that religion shows itself by producing a holy and moral life; I should hope that the religious instruction they receive has a permanent effect; in some instances the children are but for a short time in the school; some come in not very young, and have been brought up in another persuasion; I cannot expect in such instances that much impression will be made; but I have every reason to believe, in many instances, that children reared in the establishment from eight or nine years old, have imbibed steady principles of religion, and have not in after life swerved from them.

Is the health of the children for the most part good?—Yes, very good in general; they have been plagued with tinea capitis, or some sort of sore head, but not of a bad kind; there has been a difficulty in getting it out of the school, it has been frequently cured, but it breaks out again.

Has typhus fever ever prevailed in the school?—Never; all the time during which the dreadful typhus prevailed in Dublin, we had no instance of it, except what there might be in the ordinary run in a school. We have an exceedingly well conducted hospital, entirely cut off from communication with the school, and a very clever medical man resident; when any thing is the matter with them, the children are sent there, and not sent back again to the school till they are cured.

What may be the average number of persons in the hospital?—I cannot say.

What number have you at present?—I do not suppose we have above five or six and twenty; there are very often, times when there are not above eight or ten children; there may be at some times, for a few days, a great many in the hospital for chilblains. The surgeon has found it advantageous to keep such children in bed for a few days, he found it cured them.

Are you much troubled with ophthalmia?—We have always some, but we have not been much troubled with it of late; some years ago, we were dreadfully annoyed with it; there are not, I believe, any bad cases at present.

What books are used in the school?—We have the Kildare-street lending library, and many other books for lending which we had before; a little lending library was established previous to 1814; we use in the school Mrs. Trimmer's Selections from the Old Testament, and the New Testament, Dr. Bell's Selections from the New Testament, Mrs. Trimmer's Explanation of the Old Testament, and Cotter's Paraphrase on the New Testament. We have found the latter a very useful book; we use with the senior classes Lewis's Catechism, because it is one that gives Scripture proofs; and in the junior classes we use Crossman's which is simple, and contains a good deal of useful matter as to the facts and feasts of the church, with explanations of some difficult words which children are likely to meet in religious books, in sermons, or in the service of the church. We use with some of the senior boys and girls, Murray's Reader, an Abridgement of Murray's Grammar, and Guy's Geography; and with the junior classes, we read a very good book indeed, called "Lessons in Humble Life;" it is an anonymous work, published in York, and contains a good deal of useful matter; we use the Dublin Spelling Book, all the parts of it, and the Dublin Reading Book, both from Kildare-street; and to vary the reading in the senior classes, they use a small History of England, and a History of Ireland. We introduce in the junior classes two or three of the little books published in Kildare-street; for we find, if we continue too long the use of any one book, the children get it by heart, and also read it with a tone. We use Darling's, Taylor's, and Thomson's Arithmetic; with a few of the senior boys, likely to go to the Sappers and Miners, we use Colonel Pasley's Introduction to Practical Geometry.

How often in the week is the Testament read?—The Scriptures are read by the two senior classes for about an hour and a half daily, but only by half the boys in those classes; in the winter they are all in the school in the evening; but for the rest of the year all the senior boys are out at trades, or gardening alternate days, during all the school hours.

Then they take it in succession?—Yes; but we have only five school days in the week, (on Saturday there are other duties), and all those at trades have only five school days in a fortnight.

Will you describe the course of scriptural instruction you give the children?—When we put them into the Scriptures, I generally make them begin with the selections from the Old Testament, as the New Testament contains frequent references to it, which the children could not otherwise understand. They get about a chapter or two in the course of a week, and being well prepared in that portion by reading it carefully, and having Mrs. Trimmer's explanation read out to them by the monitor of the class, once in the week, I examine that class and give them such exposition as I think beneficial; they are generally able to answer me in the very words of Scripture; I in general only desire them to give me the meaning. When they have read the book of Genesis, I make them read St. Matthew's Gospel; it is in those two books that class are examined publicly at the end of the year. The senior class in addition read St. Luke and St. John's Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, and the remainder of Mrs. Trimmer's selections; I make the children read a little of the Old Testament first, because the New is unintelligible without it; they must be prepared to give me a reasonable account of what they have read, and my method is partly catechising and partly lecturing.

Are they required to get portions of Scripture by memory?—I do not require them to get it straight forward, but they generally remember the words; in the junior classes I have made them get some psalms by heart, especially those that relate to God's providential government of the world; but I do not require them to say the Scriptures straight forward by heart.

In your experience, have you been led to form an opinion that comment and explanation upon the subject of the Scriptures they read are necessary to make the children understand the meaning of what they read?—I think they are quite indispensable.

If they were left to read straight forward, without any comment or observation, do you think they would receive any serious or permanent impression?—I think not; children scarcely ever benefit by any thing they read, unless they are made to give an account of it; some portion of the Scriptures might however perhaps be thus laid up in the memory, and at a subsequent period be brought to bear on the conscience. I always make it a rule, when the children get on a little in the Scriptures, to make their scriptural knowledge bear upon the service of the church, to let them see that what they hear on the Sunday is borne out by the Scriptures; to show them that they should have their hearts and minds in their public worship, when they see how the church service and the Scriptures tally.

A particular part of the examination by the Association for Discountenancing Vice requires that?—There is but a small portion of the Liturgy that is absolutely required by it, the general confession, and a few of the collects; but with respect to any part of the service that strikes me, I endeavour to get the children to make the comment for themselves.

Do the masters make it a rule, or do you require them to give any explanation of the books that are read as to the meaning of the words, so that the children may understand what they read?—As fully and as much as I can—our elder classes are improving, but I have found some difficulty as to the junior. Whenever I hear the children myself, I endeavour to make them accountable in this way.

Upon referring to the Report of the Commissioners of 1809, it appears at that time there was a deficient supply of water in the institution; has that been remedied?—In a very great degree, almost entirely; in the time of our late commandant, Colonel Blackwell, he applied to the proper authorities, and got a higher reservoir in the park made, which communicates with the former one; so that when one is dry we have got water from the other, and in general the supply is good; there had been a deficiency formerly.

Is the water that is brought from this reservoir used for drinking?—Yes, it is used for all purposes; we have likewise a pump in the farm yard for the cattle; that, in the course of the summer, is sometimes dry, although the establishment was at great expense in sinking it; it is sunk near one hundred feet, and partly through rock; but as to the supply of water, the commandant can inform you better than I.

Do

Do you think the gymnastic exercises of use to the children?—I think that since they have used them they look much better, and walk better; they seem to use their limbs more freely; for those who become soldiers, I think they will be particularly useful.

What means are taken to ascertain the character and circumstances of the persons to whom the female children are apprenticed; is it the duty of any person in the institution to make inquiries?—There is a printed paper that must be signed by the minister of the parish, on any person applying for an apprentice, stating that such person is a protestant, and does not keep a public house, and some other conditions; I do not know what other steps are taken; but the persons applying must appear at the Board, and the Governors may determine whether they will give the child to them or not.

Dinner :

SUNDAY - { Beef boiled, eight ounces, potatoes one pound and a half, with cabbage or greens.

MONDAY - { Ox-head soup, one quart to the largest children, and a pint to the smallest, with one pound and a half of potatoes to each.

Dinner :

TUESDAY - The same as for Sunday.

Dinner :

WEDNESDAY - The same as for Monday.

Dinner :

THURSDAY - { Calecannon, one pound and a half to the largest children, and one pound to the smallest, with half a pint of milk (or small beer) to each.

Dinner :

FRIDAY - The same as for Sunday and Tuesday.

Dinner :

SATURDAY - The same as for Monday and Wednesday.

Four ounces of oatmeal to be issued for each child's breakfast, which will give the allowance of stirabout as above specified.

Pure milk should not at any time be reduced more than by the addition of one-third of water, and if scarcity of that article of food should at any time occur, oatmeal-gruel, well prepared and boiled (with a proportion of one-fifth of pure milk,) and a sparing quantity of salt, will be found a wholesome substitute for the childrens supper.

The beef is estimated including bone; the parts of the beef contracted for should be laps, haunches and sticking pieces.

The small and delicate children may probably require only five or six ounces of meat, therefore the overplus arising from that circumstance may be given to those children who from quick growth shall appear to require a greater quantity of food; this, however, serjeants of companies should report to the commanding officer at the hour of dinner, who will cause the food to be carefully divided.

The soup is to be made from the liquor in which the beef has been boiled, with the addition of three ox-heads (most strictly washed, and soaked over night in water,) and the bones of the meat issued the previous day, together with oatmeal, leeks, and salt. The quantity of oatmeal for soup for each child to be half an ounce.

The calecannon is composed of an equal quantity of potatoes and greens, and to every four pounds required, three ounces of butter and a pint of milk, to be seasoned with leeks and salt.

Sir,

IN reply to your letter of the 8th instant, I have the honour to inform you, that the Will of William Downes, late of the city of Waterford, D. D. was dated 2d January 1791, and probate thereof was on the 16th of May 1794, granted to Robert Dobbin, Esq. the surviving executor, by which the Testator states "He had lately purchased from Henry Hayden, Esq. of Snowhill, in the county of Kilkenny, a rent-charge of £.320 a year, issuing out of the lands of Castleavany otherwise Newcastle, otherwise Castlebarry, otherwise Castlebarmaugh, Rosbertragh otherwise Rossboultry otherwise Knockacre, in the barony of Knocktopher, county of Kilkenny." The Testator bequeathed said rent-charge to the Bishop of Waterford and Lismore, and his successors, and to the Dean and Chapter of Waterford, and their successors for ever, upon the trusts therein mentioned, (and amongst others, to the following:) "I further direct and appoint the said trustees, and their successors, that they do yearly and every year for ever, after the decease of my said wife, pay unto the Governors of the Hibernian Society, the sum of Forty Pounds, to be by them and their successors applied for ever towards the maintenance, education, and apprenticing the Orphans and Children of Soldiers in Ireland, and for no other use, intent or purpose whatsoever."

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your very obedient Servant,

CHARTER OF THE HIBERNIAN MARINE SOCIETY, DUBLIN.

Printed in the Year of our Lord, 1789.

Appendix, N^o 20.

Charter of the Hibernian Marine Society, Dublin.

GEORGE the Third, by the grace of God, of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, and so forth: To all unto whom these presents shall come, greeting: Whereas we are informed by the humble Petition of Henry Hart, Lord Mayor of our city of Dublin, John, Lord Archbishop of Dublin, Brinsley, Earl of Lanesborough, Thomas, Lord Baron Dartrey, Redmond Morres, Esquire, Member of Parliament for our city of Dublin, David Latouche the younger, George Simpson, Luke Mercer, William Lyndon, David Burleigh, Theophilus Thompson, William Barton, Thomas Barton, and Alexander Schomberg, Esquires, in behalf of themselves and divers others, members of the Marine Society in Dublin, associated for the support, education, and fitting for the sea, the orphans and children of seafaring men only: That in the late war several gentlemen of the city of Dublin associated, in order, by voluntary subscriptions, to encourage many men and boys, who had before been idle and rather burthensome on the public, to enter into His Majesty's fleet, and that they were thereby enabled to clothe and fit out a considerable number, which they sent on board His Majesty's ships of war; but that the peace, which soon afterwards took place, having rendered this scheme no longer necessary, they still wishing to continue useful as well as loyal subjects, formed a plan of a more extensive and permanent use, that of establishing a nursery and school for the maintenance and instruction of the orphans and children of those seamen who had perished, or become disabled, by age or infirmity, of being of further use, either in His Majesty's or the merchants service, where they were to be lodged, fed, clothed, educated in the Protestant religion, and instructed so as to fit them for the sea service, in order to their being apprenticed to seafaring men; pursuant to which scheme several sums of money were subscribed, by which, and by voluntary benefactions, they were enabled to receive a number of children, who have been properly taken care of, agreeably to the spirit of that institution, and provided for:

That the said Society have been enabled, by the bounty of the Parliament, to build an house in the city of Dublin, near the sea, capable of receiving two hundred children, and upwards, whenever their funds shall admit of rendering the relief so extensive; and that they humbly hope this national and charitable institution would fall within our favour and protection; and that we would be graciously pleased to grant to the said Society our Royal Charter of Incorporation, the better and the more effectually to enable them to carry into execution this useful undertaking: And the said Petitioners, by their Petition, having prayed that we would be graciously pleased, by Letters Patent under our Great Seal of our said kingdom of Ireland, to incorporate the said Petitioners and other Subscribers to the said charitable Institution: And we being graciously pleased to approve of the said institution, and desirous that the same should be conducted with such economy and regularity, as may render it a real and lasting benefit to the marine and commercial service:

Know ye therefore, that we, of our special grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion, by and with the advice and consent of our right trusty and right well-beloved Cousin and Counsellor Simon, Earl Harcourt, our Lieutenant General and General Governor of our said kingdom of Ireland, and according to the tenor and effect of our Letters, under our privy signet and sign manual, bearing date at our court at St. James's, the twentieth day of June, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five, in the fifteenth year of our reign, and now enrolled in the rolls of our High Court of Chancery, in our said kingdom of Ireland, have granted, ordained, constituted and appointed, and by these presents, for Us, our Heirs and Successors, we do grant, ordain, constitute and appoint, our said right trusty and right well-beloved Cousin and Counsellor Simon, Earl Harcourt, our Lieutenant General and General Governor of our said kingdom of Ireland, and other Chief Governor or Chief Governors of our said kingdom for the time being, the Archbishop of Armagh, Primate of all Ireland, the Lord Chancellor or Keeper of the Great Seal of Ireland, the Archbishop of Dublin, the Speaker of the House of Commons of Ireland, the Members of Parliament for the city of Dublin, the Lord Mayor of the city of Dublin, the Senior Master of the Guild of Merchants in the city of Dublin, and the Archdeacon of Dublin, all for the time being; William, Duke of Leinster, Francis, Earl of Hertford, Brinsley, Earl of Lanesborough, Edward, Lord Baron Longford, Thomas, Lord Baron Dartrey, Redmond Morres, David Latouche the younger, George Simpson, Luke Mercer, William Lyndon, David Burleigh, Theophilus Thompson, William Barton, Thomas Barton, and Alexander Schomberg, Esquires, and such others as shall from time to time be elected, in the manner hereinafter directed, to be one body politic and corporate, in deed and in name, by the name of "The Hibernian Marine Society in Dublin, for maintaining, educating, and apprenticing the Orphans and Children of decayed Seamen in our Royal Navy, and Merchants Service, for ever;" and by the same name to have perpetual successions; and also by the same name to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, answer and be answered unto, defend and be defended, in all the courts and places whatsoever of Us, our Heirs and Successors, in all suits, complaints, and demands whatsoever, in the same manner and form, and as amply as any of our subjects, bodies politic or corporate, within our realm of Ireland, may or can do.

And further, we have given and granted, and by these presents, for Us, our Heirs and Successors, we do give and grant unto the said Society, and their successors, that they and their successors may have and use such common seal as they shall think proper; and that it may be lawful for them and their successors, to change, break, alter, and make new the same, from time to time, as they shall think fit.

And further, we have given and granted, and by these presents, for Us, our Heirs and Successors, we do give and grant unto the said Society, and their successors, that it may be lawful for them and their successors, by that name to purchase, have, take, receive and enjoy, to them and their successors, in fee and in perpetuity, any manors, lands, tenements, rents, annuities, pensions, tithes, or other hereditaments, not exceeding in the whole the clear yearly value of Two thousand pounds; and to take and receive any sum or sums of money, and also, all manner of goods or chattels, of what value or nature soever; and therewith and thereout to erect, maintain, and support, in all places of our said kingdom of Ireland, where they shall judge the same to be necessary and convenient, such and so many nurseries and schools as they shall think proper.

And we do, for Us, our heirs and successors, hereby direct, that the said body corporate shall have four stated general quarterly meetings of the members thereof yearly, in Dublin, at such place or places as they shall think proper, (to wit) the first Monday in the months of November, February, May, and August, in all times coming, and as many other general meetings at such places in the city of Dublin, as the said Society, or any five or more of them, shall appoint: And that the said body corporate, or any five of them, at such meetings, shall be able and capable to do and transact all matters and things relating to the affairs of the said corporation.

And we do for us, our heirs and successors, hereby also direct, that the first general meeting of the said body corporate shall be on the first of the said quarterly days that shall be thirty days next after the date of these our letters patent; intimation whereof the Lord Chancellor or Keeper of the Great Seal of Ireland, the Lord Mayor of the city of Dublin, the Members of Parliament for the said city, and the Master of the Guild of Merchants in the city of Dublin, all for the time being, or any two of them, are hereby impowered and required to give to the Members of the said Corporation, by a notice for that purpose to be published in the Dublin Gazette, six days before the holding of such general meeting.

And we do for us, our heirs and successors, give and grant full power and authority to the said body corporate, when they shall be so assembled, to elect from amongst themselves by plurality of voices, a president, seven vice presidents, two secretaries, a treasurer, a register, and such other officers as they shall find needful to continue in office, till the first Monday in November, next thereafter, and until others shall be chosen to succeed them.

And we do hereby for us, our heirs and successors, give and grant full power and authority to the said president or vice presidents, or in case of the absence of the said president or vice presidents, any two members of the said corporate body to administer an oath or oaths to the said register and other officers, which they shall be required to take for the due and faithful execution of their respective offices.

And we do hereby for us, our heirs and successors, further give and grant full power and authority to the said corporation, upon the first Monday in November, annually, in all time coming, or in case of any emergency, preventing their meeting on that day, then at the next meeting of said society thereafter, five members at least being present, to make a new election of persons to serve in the said offices, or to continue the former officers, as they shall think most convenient.

And we do hereby for us, our heirs and successors, further give and grant full power and authority to the said body corporate, at their first general meeting, to nominate and appoint fifteen of the said body to be a committee, to meet in Dublin, the first Monday in every month, or oftener as need shall require, in such place or places as shall be agreed upon by the said corporation, which committee, or any three of them, are hereby authorized and empowered to carry into execution such orders, rules and directions, as shall from time to time be made by the said corporation, and which committee shall continue till the first Monday in November next following the first general meeting, at which time, and afterwards on every first Monday in November, yearly, the said corporation shall nominate fifteen of their members to be a committee for one year, for the purposes aforesaid.

No governor shall hereafter take, accept of, hold, possess or enjoy any lucrative or beneficial contract with or under the Society, nor enter into any such, nor hold, take, possess or enjoy, or be elected into any office, place or employment under the society, or in the trust or service thereof, unto which any salary, fee, compensation, reward, allowance or pecuniary gratification shall be annexed, voted, or in any sort allowed out of the funds of the society, the register only excepted. And any governor accepting of such office, trust, place, contract, employment or appointment, or holding the same with any such salary, fee, compensation, reward, allowance, pecuniary gratification or other valuable consideration whatsoever, annexed or granted with or unto the same, or upon trust for it, shall from thenceforth absolutely forfeit his seat as a governor, and be incapable of re-election while in such office, trust, or employment—the present chaplain the Rev. Dr. Adamson, the present physician, Dr. William Gray†, and the present surgeon, Francis L'Estrange, Esq. only excepted; as having been elected unto those employments before this present bye-law was enacted.

Governors not to hold offices.

XXXI. No bye-law shall be repealed, rescinded, or in any particular abrogated or altered, but at a general quarterly meeting, and after such proposed repeal, refusion, abrogation, or alteration, shall have been fully specified at the next preceding quarterly meeting, and entered upon or among the proceedings thereof—nor unless notice of such shall be expressed fully in the summons for such subsequent quarterly meeting, nor unless two-thirds of the members at such subsequent quarterly meeting shall vote in favour thereof, such votes to be collected by ballot, and not otherwise.

XXXII. All former bye-laws are hereby declared to be absolutely null, void, and of none effect.

Former Bye Laws repealed.

* This bye law was amended on 4th November 1822, by adding thereto, "A power to the secretaries to permit such of the boys as have completed six years in the school, and are of sufficient size, strength and education, and who have attained the age of sixteen years, and have been one year in the respective trades of tailoring or shoemaking, to volunteer to the sea service, and to seafaring persons only."

Examination of J. B. Alloway, Esq.; Tuesday, 22d November 1825.

Appendix, N° 21.

Examination of
J. B. Alloway, Esq.
22 November 1825.

WHAT situation do you hold in connexion with the Hibernian Marine School?—I am one of the governors, and I am an honorary secretary. Our registrar, Mr. Worthington, does all the money business.

How many governors are there?—Very few now; I do not know exactly.

How often do they meet?—They generally meet the first Monday in the month.

Have you been able lately to attend the meetings?—I have not attended the last two or three meetings, I was so ill.

Before your illness were you in the habit of regular attendance?—Regularly; I seldom missed.

How many governors constitute a board?—Five.

Have you always had a board?—Sometimes we have not.

Has that happened frequently?—No.

How many times in the course of a year has a board not been made do you think?—Very seldom; the governors are all men of business, and if they cannot go away in half an hour, they will not stay longer. It is very seldom we want a board; some people come in to make up a sufficient number.

Will you be good enough to name the governors in the habit of attending most regularly?—Mr. Crossthwaite attends the general meetings; also the Archbishop and Archdeacon of Dublin, Mr. Ralph Shaw, &c. &c.; I do not exactly remember the others.

Is the attendance entered in a book?—Yes it is.

In what way are the governors appointed?—By ballot.

Do the governors themselves elect persons to fill up vacancies as they occur?—I do not think they are limited in number.

Was the Charter by which this Society exists granted in the year 1775?—No, I think in 1766, but I may be wrong.

Has there been but one Charter?—I think but one; it was taken up first by half a dozen individuals (merchants in Dublin); they took the idle boys off the quays and supported them. My father was one, and that is how I became acquainted with it.

What do you now understand to be the precise object of the Society?—The object was to provide men for the navy and merchant service, for we cannot by Charter take any in except those that are the sons of seamen.

Is it for maintaining, educating, and apprenticing the sons of decayed seamen?—Yes, deceased and decayed seamen.

In the Royal Navy?—Yes, and the merchant service.

At what age are the boys admitted?—We ought not to admit them under eight years, but where we see a case of great distress,—some poor widows come to us and apply; if we find they have six or seven children, we take them in younger, so that they can dress and undress themselves and do not require a nurse.

What is the latest time that you take them in?—Not above twelve or thirteen; they get bad habits and poison the minds of the other boys.

How long do they continue at the School?—Some of them too long—some of them till fifteen or sixteen.

At what age do you wish to get rid of them?—The very moment they have learnt the rules of navigation we endeavour to dispose of them.

How do you dispose of them?—We send them to the merchant service, unless when Admiral Rowley had the station at Cork he sent revenue cruisers for them.

Is there any difficulty in the disposal of them?—At one time there was, some years ago, not lately.

How do you account for the difficulty that existed at that time?—We would not send them out unless they were apprenticed, and the masters of ships did not like that, and we do not do that now; it is optional to take them as volunteers or apprentices. We give them two suits of clothes and send them on board.

Is the condition, when the boys are admitted, that they shall go to sea?—Yes, certainly; we would not take them without it. They all go to church, and of course become Protestants so long as they are in the School.

What number is annually admitted?—It differs very much; sometimes more and sometimes less.

Who is the schoolmaster?—Mr. Baker; he was an officer in the army, and he knows more of the business than all of us together; he is always on the spot.

Is the state and management of the School such as to be satisfactory to the governors?—It is; I do not suppose in the world there are boys in their line of life better taken care of.

Are there any private subscriptions towards the maintenance of the Institution?—The governors pay two guineas a year.

Are there any other subscriptions than what arise from the governors?—No, we have property of our own, and we get a certain sum of money from Government; we had formerly about 3,000*l.* per annum, then 2,200*l.* a year, and we now only get 1,600*l.*

Is there any thing upon the subject of the School which you are yourself desirous of communicating to the Commissioners?—No.

Appendix, N° 22.

Examination of Alexander Worthington, Esq.; Wednesday, 23d November 1825.

YOU are registrar of the Marine Society?—I am, and also a governor.

Have you had any fresh Charter since the Charter of 1775?—No, I have brought a copy of it with me; it is dated the 1st of August and enrolled the 2d.

Have you any Bye Laws made lately in addition to those first framed?—No, there have been no others printed; those have been altered at different times.

Have they been entirely revised or only partially corrected?—They have never been revised; when it became necessary to alter any bye law notice thereof was given at a general quarterly meeting, and confirmed at a subsequent meeting.

Is there any fundamental alteration in the bye laws?—Yes, all the original salaries and allowances of the early time were established by bye laws, but those bye laws have been altered since.

In accordance with the alteration of the times?—Yes.

Has there been besides the alteration of the salaries any fundamental alteration in the bye laws since those were published?—No other material alteration that I can recollect.

What is the duty of the registrar?—To attend all the meetings of the committee of fifteen and of the Society, and to take down the minutes, check the bills, and draw drafts on the Bank previous to the meetings, to receive the subscriptions of the several governors and such other sums of money as he shall be directed or empowered to receive, and to pay the same as often as they arise to 50*l.* unto the treasurer, to make up the accounts for the Imprest office; in fact, every thing in the writing way concerning the Institution.

What is the salary you receive?—£.100 a year.

Any allowances?—Five per cent for collecting the subscriptions, which have not amounted in the last two years to 36*l.* per annum.

In whose hands are the balances?—In the Bank of Ireland.

What is the amount of the stock belonging to the Marine Society?—£.8,600 bank stock.

Producing a dividend of how much?—£.860 a year, 3½ Stock; 3,846*l.* 10*s.* 5*d.* producing 134*l.* 12*s.* 7*d.*; 105*l.* in the 4 per cent stock, 4*l.* 4*s.*; rent of lands in the county of Carlow, 15*l.* 2*s.* 10½*d.* per annum; ground on Rogerson's Quay, 144*l.* 16*s.* per annum; ground at the rear of the nursery, 8*l.* per annum; an annuity bequeathed by the late Mr. Cranfield of 5*l.* per annum; and there is a bond of 407*l.* 8*s.* 7*d.* of the late William Burton, Esq. and the late Lord Ponsonby, which ought to produce an interest of 24*l.* 9*s.* Lord Ponsonby's property has been in the court of Chancery many years; we have proved our debt in the cause, but it has not come to our turn to be paid yet, nor do I know when we shall be, but I am obliged to return it as part of our income.

Is that all the property belonging to the Society?—Yes.

State how that bond of Lord Ponsonby's arose?—It appears from the minutes of the Society, that Mr. Burton was indebted by bond in the sum of 1,200*l.* to Mr. Waddell, of the county of Carlow, and a large arrear of interest accrued on the same, amounting to 1,407*l.* 8*s.* 7*d.* for which the Society accepted his (Mr. Burton's) and Lord Ponsonby's, (then the Right honourable William Brabazon Ponsonby) joint bond, all of which have been since paid off, except the bond in question for 407*l.* 8*s.* 7*d.* upon which the Society have entered judgement.

How many years have you not received interest upon it?—I think about twelve years.

Have you any expectation that the matter will soon be settled?—No; for no later than this term there was an allocation of 24,000*l.* which has been in the bank to the credit of the cause, and there are nine or ten thousand pounds, I find, on looking at the master's Report, to be paid prior to the date of the Society's judgment.

Do you expect ultimately the funds will be supplied?—I hear so. I recollect that there was one bond of Mr. Burton's, part of the property bequeathed by Mr. Waddell, paid off many years ago.

Do you know the date of Mr. Waddell's death?—No, I do not; I suppose it was near forty years ago or thereabouts.

Have you any copy of his will?—I think we have.

[The Witness was directed to furnish a copy of that part of the will relating to this bequest.]

You state that the lands in the county of Carlow, you derive by the bequest of the same gentleman?—Yes.

What do they consist of?—It was left between the Hibernian Society for the care of Soldiers' Children, and the Hibernian Marine Society, and consists of farms; there are five tenants. The lands are subject to two head rents amounting to 19*l.* a year.

Is it an improveable property?—I cannot say; for I believe the tenants' leases are for long terms or for lives renewable.

Upon fines?—No, I do not think they are.

Renewable for ever without fines?—I do not know.

Who has the management of that property?—We find a great difficulty in getting an agent to receive such small rents in the country, as it is not usual to give more than five per cent for collecting rents. Captain Irving who is connected with the Hibernian School in the Park, undertook it, and recovered considerable arrears; some of them were in arrear nine years.

Appendix, N^o 22.Examination of
A. Worthington,
Esq.

Can you speak with any certainty, whether the property is likely to produce a greater rental?—No, I cannot; I will inquire.

Do you know the extent of the land at all?—No.

Who is the person in your Society that knows any thing about that property?—I do not know, unless I were to consult the late registrar; I do not think any of the governors ever saw the land.

The sum has always been the same?—Yes, I believe so; I never recollect any more being received except in the shape of arrears.

Is the bequest, then, of the nature of a rent charge?—The two Societies hold the property under leases for lives renewable for ever.

[The Witness was directed to produce the leases granted relating to the property belonging to the Society, in the county of Carlow.]

Are there any arrears at present due upon that property?—Yes.

How many years?—I cannot tell, because they are different arrears from different tenants. Some are not in arrear at all; some have paid up to the last gale day.

Do you not enter on your receipt, "received from A. B.," so much rent?—The last rental would shew that. Captain Irving settles with me.

Will you state the circumstances under which you came into possession of the ground on Rogerson's Quay?—The Society took a large square piece of ground for which they pay 90*l.* a year.

To whom?—To Mr. Courtenay; he is the head landlord.

Is that a lease for ever?—A lease for lives, renewable for ever, with a peppercorn fine.

Upon part of that land the house was built?—Yes, and the remaining part they let off at 144*l.* 16*s.* by auction, at so much a foot; and Charles Pentland, Esq. was declared the tenant at that rent.

What is the extent of the lease?—For 99 years.

Have buildings been erected upon that part of the ground?—Yes, buildings that produce to the tenant more than he pays; the ground at the rear of the Nursery, is ground that never has been let except to a tenant at will, at 8*l.* per annum.

Was it once let at 16*l.* a year?—Yes.

How comes it to be reduced in value?—It was let to a gentleman on the Quay, who gave more than any body else would; the next tenant got it for 12*l.* and the next for 8*l.*

Who is the holder of it now?—Mr. Baker, the master of the school.

Does he hold it for less than others would give?—No; a Mr. Cardiffe had it before him, and he paid 8*l.*

Was Mr. Cardiffe unconnected with the Society?—Yes.

Is that the fair value?—I think it is; for when he sent in his proposal at 8*l.* the Commissary General sent in one at 6*l.* per annum; which of course was rejected.

How much does it consist of?—Half an acre or three roods, I believe.

Can you state the sources from which the stock was derived, you now possess?—The original capital of the Society was composed of numerous benefactions and legacies, with part of which they subscribed to the National Bank, to the amount of 4,000*l.* stock, and the remaining 300*l.* stock was added afterwards. I forget how many years ago the Bank increased their capital, and allowed all holders of Bank stock to subscribe one-third or two-thirds of their original stock at 125*l.* per cent, and the Marine Society sold out their five per cents to increase their Bank stock, which increased it to 7,166*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*; and about four years ago, the Bank gave a bonus to all proprietors of Bank stock of 20*l.* per cent, which added 1,432*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* more; now they are possessed of 8,600*l.*

Do you know how the 3½ per cent stock came to the Society?—I cannot answer as to the whole amount; but part of it was purchased with the amount of a legacy of 1,000*l.* left to the Society, by Mr. Connor, an old gentleman. And another part, with the amount of a bond debt of 1,200*l.* paid off by the late Mr. Burton. The Society have only used the interest of the stock. The 105*l.* was 100*l.* five per cent stock, left by an old lady in this city to the Society.

In addition to that, you have been usually assisted by a grant from Government?—Yes, to make up our charge, we first of all make an estimate of our expenditure, and add to our actual income so much to meet it.

For the last two or three years what has been the amount of that?—£. 1,600 British.

What has been the average amount of your subscriptions for the last two or three years?—Not more than 40*l.* a year at the utmost.

Is the building now in good and substantial repair?—In very good repair; but it requires occasionally painting and pointing, and various necessary repairs.

Is it at present in good repair?—Yes, I think it is; the school room was new boarded last year.

Is it likely there will be any great expense incurred in repairs in the course of a few years?—No; I think not.

Is your attendance of governors on the monthly meetings in general sufficient to discharge the business?—Yes, it is; we require only three at a committee meeting, and five at a general meeting.

Have you ever known in the last twelve months, a meeting adjourn for want of a sufficient number of governors attending?—I believe it has occurred three or four times.

[The Witness was directed to furnish the number of adjourned committee and monthly meetings, for want of a sufficient number of governors.]

Do you take any oath on entering office?—Every year.

There is a fresh election?—Yes; the first Monday in November, and I am then sworn into office.

Is the oath administered to any other officer?—No other but myself.

In what manner is the cloth supplied for the children's clothes?—By any merchant that offers. The last cloth was furnished by Messrs. Gilpin, Howell & Co., and they were paid as soon as the cloth was sent in.

You accept that which is best in price and quality?—Yes.

Have you any chaplain resident in the establishment?—No.

How often does the gentleman who performs the duty of chaplain attend in the hospital?—The present chaplain does not attend; he has a gentleman who takes the duty for him.

Mr. Wright is acting for Mr. Gamble?—Yes.

How often does Mr. Wright attend?—He generally attends on Sundays at Divine Service, and occasionally, as I understand, to catechise the boys. He, or some other clergyman, catechises them every Sunday, either before or after the service.

At what other times does he attend?—I cannot exactly say. Mr. Baker could give that information better than I can.

Mr. Gamble is quite incapacitated?—He is; it is a matter the Society have considered very often, but they have no power of superannuating. They have been quite at a loss to know what to do. He had a small living in the country, and I have heard that he was allowed to give that up by the Archbishop, to enable him to take the chaplaincy.

In what year were you appointed?—In 1821.

Who preceded you?—Mr. Norman.

Has Mr. Gamble ever been able to attend to his duty since you have been there?—Yes; it was only in the last two years that he has been unable to attend.

How often did he attend when he was able?—He attended very regularly.

What do you call regularly?—He attended so well, that the boys were able to obtain ten or eleven premiums from the Society for discountenancing Vice, at their annual examinations. He was considered one of the best examiners in the town.

For the last two years, the boys have not been sent to the examination?—No; the examination is not so simple as it was; it is more strict.

Does Mr. Gamble receive the salary now?—Yes, he does; Mr. Wright does not receive any thing.

Has the condition of Mr. Gamble ever become the subject of the consideration of the board?—Yes, indeed it has.

Have any steps been taken in consequence of it?—No; they never made any application to the Government.

Are any minutes recorded in the book upon the subject?—No.

It has been the subject of conversation only?—That is all.

Is the chaplain elected annually, as well as the registrar?—Yes, and the surgeon also.

As the chaplain is elected annually, is there not an opportunity afforded of remedying this inconvenience?—Yes, but they take it in the same light as a clergyman holding a benefice, and they considered that it would be a hardship.

What is the use of electing annually then?—The charter obliges them to do it.

If it has been often under the consideration of the committee to consider the inconvenience which arises from Mr. Gamble's situation, are you not of opinion that the children have suffered by the circumstances under which Mr. Gamble is now placed, and not been so well attended as they would otherwise have been?—Indeed I believe the governors have not the same controul over the present assistant as they would have over one regularly appointed.

Does not the fact of the children having been withdrawn from the public examinations, shew they are not so fit for it as they formerly were?—Indeed it appears so.

Do you ever inspect the management of the school at all yourself?—No, except occasionally going and seeing them at dinner.

Do you suppose that the master has sufficient strength in ushers to conduct the school?—In my opinion he certainly has not. He has an assistant of his own appointment, whom he pays out of his own pocket.

In consequence, the establishment supplied by the Society is not sufficient?—No; but the master appoints monitors, and such boys as are properly qualified. He puts them at the head of divisions.

Has it ever been a subject of discussion at the board, as to whether the master had sufficient assistance to conduct the school?—No; the governors thought the boys were getting on very well.

Are the governors satisfied with Mr. Baker?—Yes, indeed they are.

Are your accounts annually passed before the Imprest office?—Yes; and when certified by them, we get a parchment roll, a transcript of the account, signed by the Commissioners, which is an acquittal in the common form.

Have you had any disallowances?—I have been very fortunate; in my last four years I have not had a single disallowance. There is, however, a sum of 13*l.* 4*s.* 11*d.* which I find by the accounts was disallowed in 1784, and it has been carried on from that year, and still remains on the face of the accounts as a disallowance.

Do you pass the expenditure of your private funds, as well as the public?—Yes, every thing.

Have you had any new subscribers within the last four years that you have been registrar?—There have been four new subscribers.

Appendix, N^o 22.

Examination of
A. Worthington,

23 November 1825.

Were those annual subscribers, or for life?—Annual subscribers of two guineas each ; and there is another on the books to be ballotted for, at the next quarterly meeting.

No new members are elected without ballot?—No.

How many members must be present at such ballot?—Five at a quarterly meeting. They must be proposed at a general meeting, one month at least previous to the quarterly meeting.

Do you know how far the applications for admission exceed the number admitted?—No, I do not.

Is there any account kept of the applications for admission?—No.

What is the form of the application?—The parents or friends get one of the printed forms, and they must be signed by masters of ships, and three reputable persons ; one of those must attend, and make affidavit that the father of the boy seeking for admission was a seaman, or that he is the son of a decayed or deceased seaman.

Is that previous to every application being presented?—Yes.

After they get the certificate, the party attends?—Yes.

Is it then the practice that the applications should be considered and enquired into, and those selected that the governors think most deserving or the best objects of charity?—Yes ; and orphans are always preferred.

What becomes of the unsuccessful applicants?—They go away, with their friends that brought them there.

Do they come the next admission day?—Sometimes they do ; perhaps they may not come till the next year. When they are objected to as being too small, they come again at some distant period.

Under the old form of application, or a new one?—Sometimes under the old form, and otherwise.

Is any account kept of the number of unsuccessful applicants?—No.

What is your opinion of the number of applications compared with the vacancies?—I dare say there may be eighteen or twenty applicants when there are only two vacancies ; there may be more against the next board day. Some boys may have been apprenticed, and then others may be admitted. We have only 170 at present in the school ; our number is 180, which we have been obliged to reduce, on account of the funds being diminished.

Suppose there were ten vacancies at the next quarterly meeting, how many applicants do you think you would have to fill up those?—Perhaps not five ; perhaps fifteen or twenty.

If five applied, would you fill up?—Yes, if the boys were large enough.

Suppose your hospital was extended, could you embrace a larger number of children?—Yes, certainly.

How many do you think the wants of the country could supply you with?—I think, if the house was larger, we should have sufficient applications for an establishment of 200 and upwards.

Do you think that would be as many as the demand of the country would supply of the orphan children of seamen?—No, I dare say not ; for people applying and not finding a vacancy sometimes do not apply again.

If you had a larger space, do you think you would have applications for a greater number than 200?—Yes, I dare say there would.

Do you know at this moment how many applications there are outstanding that cannot be let in?—I think the last day there were applications for about forty who could not get in.

How many were admitted?—Four were admitted as supernumeraries, to be admitted on vacancies, in the case of boys being apprenticed this month.

How many actual vacancies were there at that time?—No vacancies that the governors would admit a child on.

They put four on as supernumeraries to supply the first vacancies that occurred?—Yes.

Besides these, were there as many as forty others that were not put on?—Yes.

Is it usual to have so many sent back in proportion to the number admitted?—No, I do not. think the average is usually so great, but the governors never take notice of those inattendants ; they get up the boys and make a selection.

Are all the children who are now in the Institution children of deceased or decayed sailors?—Yes, all of them I do believe.

Were you concerned in the Society before you became registrar?—Yes, a good many years ; I assisted Mr. Norman, the late registrar.

Do you know, generally, how the children educated in this Establishment turn out after they leave you?—I believe very well in general ; I have heard so.

Do you hear of them often leaving the persons to whom they are apprenticed?—I have heard that several have run away from ships on the river.

What becomes of them in that case ; do they ever come to you?—No, not at all ; I do not know what becomes of them.

Appendix, N° 23.

Examination of
A. Worthington,
21 January 1826.

WE wish to ask you whether any alteration has taken place with respect to the situation of the chaplain in the Marine Society since you were examined by the Board in the month of November last?—No, nothing has been done yet; there was a special meeting of the Society summoned this month to take the matter into consideration, and after a good deal of discussion, they postponed the further consideration thereof until the quarterly meeting in February, which will be held on the first Monday in the month.

By whom at present is the duty performed?—Mr. Wright, recommended by Mr. Gamble, has hitherto performed the duty, but he does not mean to continue to do so any longer.

Has he given up his situation?—He has.

By a formal resignation of it, or in what manner?—By a notification to me, stating that he would give it up this week to Mr. Gamble. The Society have no control over him; he is not an officer of the Society's at all.

Then it is a voluntary discontinuance on his part?—Entirely so.

Is any provision made at present for the temporary discharge of the duty?—Some of the governors have temporarily provided for the performance of the duty till the meeting of the Society, to make such arrangements as they think necessary.

Did any person attend to perform the duties last week?—A week has not elapsed since the communication was made. Mr. Wright did duty last Sunday. I only received his letter this week, and in consequence some of the governors have provided for the performance of the duty in his place on Sundays. They have taken it upon themselves as a temporary measure, because there will be a general meeting next month, and it was not thought worth while summoning the governors merely to supply a person in the meantime.

On what day will the general extraordinary meeting be held?—On the first Monday in February; the meeting held the other day was an extraordinary general meeting, but the consideration of the chaplain's situation was then postponed until the quarterly meeting.

Was there any notice taken in the minutes of the subject at the last meeting?—Yes, I have the resolution with me.

Will you have the goodness to produce it?—It is generally by an order of the Society that I extract minutes; but in a case of this kind, I see no objection to produce it. There was a good deal of debate on the subject, which does not appear; it is as follows:—“Extraordinary General Meeting.—Hibernian Marine School, Monday, 9th January 1826. Present, his Grace the Archbishop of Dublin, V.P. in the chair.—The Society having proceeded to take into consideration the represented state of the chaplain's health, and resolved that the further consideration thereof be postponed until next quarterly meeting, and that notwithstanding the particular attention of the Rev. G. N. Wright to the performance of the duties in the chapel, but not having sufficient time to attend to the weekly instruction of the boys, that each governor in the meantime do endeavour to find out a proper person to act as an assistant to the chaplain to perform the entire duties attendant on the situation.”

Is it not the duty of the chaplain to officiate in the chapel on Sundays, as well as to instruct the boys in the catechisms?—Undoubtedly.

Does not the chapel in fact, supply very much the purposes of a parish church or a place of Protestant worship for a miscellaneous congregation?—It was built, I suppose, for the purpose of the Institution; but any number of persons, as far as it will accommodate, may go into it.

We observed there were several pews in it fitted up in a respectable manner, by whom are they occupied?—The boys sit in the gallery, and excepting one or two pews below, which are occupied by them in consequence of the want of accommodation above stairs, the rest are open to any strangers who may attend divine service.

Are any of them appropriated to particular persons?—None, excepting one which is called the governor's pew.

We observe that the chapel is situated on the midst of a quay, do sailors resort to it?—I have seen some at it, but very few; there is a floating chapel to which the sailors go; it is at the dock.

You think they go there in preference?—I suppose so.

Previous to its existence, which has not been more than two or three years, did the sailors resort to the chapel on the Quay?—Very few; it was open to them, a bell rings for divine service at the usual hour, and any persons come in who chuse. I have seen some sailors there.

Do they resort in great numbers to the floating chapel?—I believe so.

What is the greatest number of sailors you have seen in the Hibernian Marine chapel, prior to the establishment of the floating chapel?—Not more than four, five or six at a time.

Do you ever see any there now?—Sunday before last I was there, and I do not think there was one there.

Have you any well founded impression upon your mind of the numbers that attend the floating chapel?—I never was in the floating chapel.

Appendix, N^o 23.

Examination of
A. Worthington,

21 January 1826.

The Commissioners in visiting the Marine School lately, observed considerable appearances of damp, are you aware of any mode of remedying that, or what is the cause?—I have heard that a great number of years ago, the south wall gave way, near which the building is situated, and that part was inundated by the river; the consequence was that the lower part of the Marine School was obliged to be filled up, and was afterwards reopened; but I have not heard of any particular complaint of damp, further than what might be expected to appear in houses built in similar situations, at this season of the year.

It has not been attended with any injury to the health of the children?—No; they have been considered very healthy.

Some smell from damp or something of that kind, was observed in one of the dormitories, can you in any way account for it?—It might have been from a closet on the top of the stairs, from which the smell came; but otherwise I am ignorant of the cause.

In what manner do you conceive that any person who may be appointed at the next meeting assistant chaplain, will be remunerated?—As there is no provision for such an emergency, an assistant, I conceive, can be only elected upon an understanding that he is to allow the present chaplain a specified portion of the salary attached to the situation.

Examination of Mr. John Baker; Tuesday, 22d November 1825.

Appendix, N^o 24.

Examination of
Mr. John Baker,
22 November 1825.

WHAT situation do you hold in connection with the Hibernian Marine School?—I am master and de facto superintendent; the name is master, but I am the head resident officer.

Who was your predecessor?—A person of the name of Rogan, who was afterwards a charter schoolmaster.

Do you know how many years he filled the office?—I believe only three.

Was he dismissed?—No, he preferred a charter school to the situation I now hold.

Were the duties performed by the last master similar to those entrusted to you?—Not entirely; there has been considerably more of the internal economy of the house put on me, or at least I put it on myself; I keep a copy in fact of every bill I send in and sign, which was not done by others; I found a great difficulty from not having copies of such bills, as memory does not always serve; I usually compare the copy of the preceding bill with that under audit, before I sign and send it to the registrar.

We understand you to say, on your appointment you first understood you were only to discharge the duties of schoolmaster?—I can hardly say what I expected, for I had not been a schoolmaster before, and I was determined to do whatever I was directed, which I have done.

What situation were you in before you were appointed to the situation?—I was an officer in His Majesty's service in the militia, line, and yeomanry for many years.

What salary have you as master?—£. 150 a year.

What other emoluments have you?—Apartments and some furniture; not sufficient for my family, but with which I am satisfied; eight tons of coals, a hundred pounds of soap, and seventy-eight pounds of candles annually.

Have you any other emoluments than those?—None.

What is the value of the furniture annually supplied to you?—The furniture may come to about 12 l. a year.

Do you provide your own food?—Yes.

How many boys are there in the school?—One hundred and sixty-eight, this day, and to-morrow there will be 170; our establishment is 180, but there was a very great rise on provisions this year, above what we estimated, and the Society reduced the number by ten, only for the present.

The number of admissions you mean were reduced?—Yes.

How old do you suppose the oldest boy at present in the school to be?—Seventeen, I believe.

How many boys have you above the age of fourteen?—Not many; there may be about twenty. The school runs peculiarly small now to what it has hitherto; there has been a great demand for children for the sea service.

What clothes are the boys supplied with in the course of the year?—One jacket, two pair of trowsers, one vest, two shirts, two pair of shoes and those repaired in each year, and three leather caps and five pairs of stockings in two years.

According to what regulations are those clothes delivered to the children?—When the clothes are wanted, they are made in the house, and we make the shoes in the house; we contract with a person for the shoes at 1 l. 1 s. 8 d. per head; he is bound to shoe and repair them to the satisfaction of the Society; he is bound to give two pair of new shoes, and as many more as may be necessary; then in return, we give him the work of eleven boys; he teaches them and finds every material whatever, and he has the work for the teaching; previous to that, for a course of years, the shoeing and repairing came to 1 l. 14 s. 6 d. We were allowed four pair by the board previous to this regulation, and the shoes were of such a description that six would not have kept them decent.

Is the quality of the shoes the boys now have sufficiently good?—It is the interest of the contractor that they should be, for if they do not last the time, he must give them others.

Has it often happened that a boy has had a third pair of shoes?—No, it has not; the boys boys wear the new shoes for half the year on Sundays only, and then wear the same shoes daily for the rest of the year, which are kept in good repair by the contractor.

Whose duty is it to see that the boys' shoes are good and kept in repair?—Mine.

Have you much difficulty in making the man do his duty?—I cannot say there is; it requires a good deal of attention, but he is a most excellent contractor, and a very honest man.

Although the sum now given is much less than that formerly expended upon this object, do you not think it is greater than is absolutely necessary?—On that subject, I must beg leave to refer to the Hibernian School in the Park; it was on their system this was established; they had a great number of boys there, and they paid 18 s. a-head, and allowed the master shoemaker 40 l. a year, dietary and apartments. We made a calculation at what that would have been, taking those allowances along with the 18 s. a-head, and it came to what I state.

How long is this contract to last?—The contract is renewed every year, but the present contractor has held it for the last five years.

Do you expect you shall be able to make another contract on more advantageous terms?—No.

Was there competition upon this contract?—There was; I took a good deal of pains.

How many boys does he teach to make shoes?—Eleven this week are at work; these will be at school next week, and eleven others at work in their place; there are twenty-two in the course of instruction; there may be rather less sometimes. I may not have boys sufficiently educated to give up their time, and some come in at nine, or ten, or eleven, without knowing a letter, and it requires time to get them ready to go into a trade.

Is there a common stock, or has each boy his own shoes?—Each boy has his own shoes, and they are marked. The lieutenant of division has the care of the Sunday shoes, as also of the other Sunday clothes. Each boy takes care of his own weekly shoes and clothes.

In what way are the stockings supplied to the boys?—From Corn market, on competition always. A Mr. Gavin, of Corn market, supplies them now.

Are they worsted or cotton?—Blue worsted.

How many pair have they in a year?—Two and a half pair each boy.

What is the cost per head for supplying each boy with stockings?—Twelve-pence half-penny per pair.

In what way is the rest of the clothing supplied?—The clothing is ordered by the board, from whoever they think sends in the most advantageous proposal, and it is made up in the school. There is an estimate, that is, so much for each suit, that is an average of a trial I made. I made twenty suits, and as near a division as I could, so as to average the large and small; I made the experiment, before we commenced the tailoring establishment at all, of what quantity of cloth, and lining, and buttons and trimmings, and so forth, it would take. The master tailor cuts it out in my office, and he takes them down when they are cut out, and they are made in the tailor's shop.

Has the same person supplied the cloth for several years?—No; Messrs. Gilpin and Howard supplied it for two years, and before that we got it from the Foundling Hospital, which was extremely bad; they have given up the manufacture.

Taking the clothing altogether, how much per head does it cost for each boy?—If calculated on only 180 boys, less than 3 l. per head, including every thing; but if the clothing furnished for thirty boys, outfitted as apprentices or volunteers to the sea service (being the average number disposed of each year) be subtracted, the clothing of each resident boy in the school will be about 2 l. 11 s. 6 d. per head per annum.

How often are they supplied with shirts and stockings?—Once every week.

Regularly?—Yes.

Do the boys wash their own stockings?—No, they do not, but they mend them. Since this tailoring and shoemaking establishment has taken place, I have been able to take a pound a-head off the estimate for clothes; it was 4 l. a head, and for some years before I came to the school, it was 5 l. 18 s. The working of the boys has reduced it from 4 l. to 3 l.

What food are the children supplied with?—With meat three days a week; meat, potatoes and greens; the days following they get soup with bread, and on the seventh day they get bread and milk for dinner.

Is the food supplied by contract?—Every article of it; open, fair, and candid contracts, as any in Ireland, I believe.

Are the different articles supplied by different persons, or is there one for the whole?—No; the butcher alone supplies meat, and the baker bread; but new milk, butter milk, greens, potatoes and oatmeal, are supplied by one person, and we give the preference to any individual who will supply the greater number of these things.

Have you ever known an instance of any contract having been taken by a person connected in any way, either in relationship or in any other manner, with any of the subordinate officers of the Institution?—Never.

Did you ever know any attempt of the kind?—Never; I have heard such things were done before I came in, but I have never heard of any such things since.

What do the children have for breakfast?—Stirabout, six days in the week, and bread and milk upon the Sunday morning; three of the servants going to their duty on that morning, they would not be able to get the stirabout ready.

Have they any supper?—They get bread and milk every night in the week for supper.

How much meat per head is allowed on the week days?—Nine ounces of raw meat without bone for each boy, that produces six ounces; and that is graduated in three divisions;

Appendix, N° 24.

Examination of
Mr. John Baker,
22 November 1825.

the first division has seven ounces, the next six, the next five; the nine ounces of raw meat supplies that six ounces, and each boy's allowance is weighed when it is put on his trencher.

Is it weighed after it is dressed?—Yes.

Can you state what the cost of feeding the boys per head has been for the current year?—It is something higher than our estimate. We estimated it at 6*l.* 10*s.; but there was a very great rise in bread, and in consequence of a rise in meat also, the butcher would not sign the contract, and a new agreement was entered into at a considerably higher price. I think the diet of the boys this year, from those causes, will be about 7*l.* per head; I had it down as low as 5*l.* 15*s.* when bread was very cheap.

In what way are the dormitories arranged; how many boys sleep in any one room?—There are three dormitories; in one there are single beds for the large boys; that was a suggestion of the Archdeacon of Ossory and several other gentlemen, about three or four years ago. Thirty-seven of the largest boys sleep in single beds; in the other rooms, they sleep in double beds.

Are they iron bedsteads or wooden?—The frames are cast iron, the sides and slats are of wood.

What bedding is allowed to each boy?—A tick with clean straw, a pair of blankets, a pair of sheets, and a quilt.

How often are they supplied with clean sheets?—Once a month.

What medical attendance is there for the boys?—We have a surgeon who does both duties; we had a surgeon and physician when Mr. Grant was secretary. He suggested that the attendance of one medical gentleman would be sufficient; and the physician who had been in attendance was dismissed, and Mr. L'Estrange was retained, who had been employed there thirty years.

Have you any prevailing disease in the school?—No, we are extraordinarily healthy.

Have you had any prevalent disease in the Institution at any time?—The only prevalent disease since I have been there was sore eyes, but that is greatly got under. When children come in they frequently get sore eyes for a few days, though no disease of the kind be in the school at the time; whether this arises from change of air, diet or other cause, is not known.

Have you many cases of ophthalmia now?—I do not think there is one.

Did you ever know any boy lose his eyes with that complaint?—No, never.

Have you ever had any typhus fever?—During the dreadful typhus fever some years ago, we had not one instance of it except my own son; and I did not know that he had the typhus fever, or I would have sent him out of the house; the physician did not let me know it.

What number of boys are in the Infirmary?—Only one: he had a low bilious fever; the surgeon put him down nearly well yesterday.

What is the greatest number you have ever known in the Infirmary?—I think, of the measles we had twenty-two.

Is it the practice to vaccinate the children?—Yes; we send each child to Mr. L'Estrange, to be examined previous to admitting him; and if they have not had it naturally, or been vaccinated, he vaccinates them immediately.

Have you ever had the small-pox in the school?—We have very little; I do not think we have had a case of natural small-pox in the school for eight or nine years; we have one child at nurse at Swords, in a decline. He had the small-pox there, though it was said he had been previously vaccinated; but the disease was very light.

To whom do the persons present their applications for the admission of children?—There is a printed paper, filled up by me or assistants, that is laid on the Board-room table; and the persons are called up, and examined on oath.

Do you now get any security upon the admission of a child?—Yes; but it is a mere nominal thing. We had a 10*l.* penalty, and one person was prosecuted for the money, and it cost us 70*l.* The person went into prison, and came out an insolvent; they have left it to me now to get the best security I can.

In what shape is the security given?—It is a bond.

On a stamp?—No; there is a clause of the Stamp Act that exempts us; we had ten shillings to pay at first.

Is it usual for the friend or parent of a child, when admitted, to enter into a bond for 10*l.*?—Yes; the father, if he is alive, and some other person; the mother, if the father is not alive.

What is the condition of the bond?—Simply, that they shall not elope, and that they shall sign the indentures when they are apprenticed.

After the children are admitted, do you permit them to communicate freely with their friends and relatives?—Not generally so; their friends are admitted the first Monday of every month, from two o'clock to four. I have the privilege of letting out three children a day, without any order from the Board.

What makes it necessary to restrain the visits of the parents of children to once a month?—The commencement of that was the typhus fever; they were prohibited a long time, and I applied that they should be admitted on a Board day; I am a good deal occupied in attending the Board; it takes up less of my time then than it would at other times.

Are

* The diet of seven under servants is included in this estimate.

Are many of the children orphans?—Yes; but I cannot state the number. We admit orphans; first, those without both parents; next, those without one parent; next, those whose fathers are at sea, and who do not give any support to the mother; and next, if we have any room, those whose fathers and mothers are decayed, and cannot support them.

What number of applications for admission have you in the course of a year?—I cannot say; I think I have fifty admission papers in the house, we have not disposed of yet.

Have you many more applications for admission than you could grant?—Yes, decidedly; if we had room for 300 children, there would never be a vacancy.

Do you examine strictly into the qualifications, so as to know that they are children of seamen, either in the navy or merchant service?—Most strictly; they must swear to it.

Have you had many attempts to deceive you upon that head?—Yes, many; and that was the reason the oath was so strictly required.

Can you state, from recollection, the number of admissions in each of the three last years?—One hundred and seventy-eight in five years; on an average, about thirty-six: we have renewed the school in five years, and admitted ten less than we sent out; there may be some trivial error in the number, but it is substantially correct.

Do you lose many by death?—I believe from a half to one, on the average of the last fifteen years, in a year; I believe it is one of the healthiest schools in Ireland.

Do many of the boys elope from you?—Not now; before I got the management of the house there were very numerous elopements; I will say as high as twenty in a year; I cannot state what the average has been since, but it is very low, not more than two, or two and a half per annum.

To what do you attribute the change; is it that you are more vigilant, or that the children are less disposed to elope?—I believe it is something of both; they have got over the wall in pursuit of birds, and come back again; I have two captains each week, whose duty it is to mind the play ground and look after the others; if they do their business well, they get a walk on Sunday after church.

What number have you apprenticed in the last three years?—They are allowed to volunteer to the Revenue cruisers without indentures; and if they are sixteen years old, and have been six years in the school, and one year in a trade, they are allowed to volunteer to masters of vessels without indentures; but unless those three things occur together, they are not allowed to go without indentures; I think I have apprenticed and volunteered at least thirty per annum, or more than that for the last three years; I forgot to mention that the year before last there were five children died, the greatest number that ever died in any one year since I have been there; they died of various complaints, two of a bilious disease, another of something in the ear; the head was opened, and it was found that the brain was affected from the ear.

Will you be so good as to state in what way you divide the time of the boys?—In summer they get up at six o'clock; they are then washed under the care of the usher and monitors; they then go to prayers in the school room; then to school business from seven to eight o'clock; breakfast at half-past eight, play and change their clothes; at school business from ten o'clock to one; dine at one; play, or combing, from one to two; they are combed three times a week by the female servants; from two to four at school business; supper and play the rest of the evening; in winter they go to school business from five to six in the evening, in lieu of the hour in the morning; before breakfast in summer.

How soon after their admission are the boys taught trades?—That depends upon the state of education they have when they come in; if they are very small children they are not put there for many years; if they come in large children, but very deficient, they do not go till they have some learning; it depends upon those two things, whether they are sufficiently advanced, and of a proper size.

What do you consider sufficiently advanced?—To read well and write well, and know the first four rules of arithmetic; that is, to be able to commence the rule of three; I have been lately obliged, from the great demand for children, to trench a little upon that, not much.

What assistants have you in the school?—I have one usher allowed by the Society, and from ill health, some years ago, upon the introduction of Bell's system, which is a very noisy one, the Society permitted me to pay another myself.

Are you in the habit of attending the school yourself?—I am.

Daily?—I examine the classes to see that all things are going right; our system is to teach by monitors, except navigation; indeed, I teach navigation by monitors, too.

Are you in the school every day?—I am every day in my life, unless I am ill.

As you delegate the teaching of the children to others, do you permit any person, except yourself, to inflict bodily punishment on the boys?—I do; the usher under certain circumstances, if he sees a thing committed under his own eyes, otherwise I stand by myself, and do it or see it done.

What is the common punishment in the school?—From three to a dozen stripes with a cat with three tails.

Are corporal punishments frequent?—We have very few; the greater part of them are for wetting the bed, a habit they learn before they come in; or for boxing.

Is it from a relaxed system, or from a dirty habit, they wet the bed?—It has taken up a good deal of the attention of the board, and I think there is a great deal of both; I have had children who could not break themselves of it.

How long does it take, in general, to teach a boy to read and write?—I probably do not say a child reads when others would; I do not say a child can read till he can read any book

Appendix, N^o 24.

Examination of
Mr. John Baker,
22 November 1825.

put into his hand; I know there have been statements made by some teachers of very short periods, and others very long; I think it would take a year and a quarter to teach a child to read as I would wish him; so that he can read any book. We teach them every word in the most voluminous collection I can get; they can spell every one of them, and pronounce every word at sight.

You make them read words before they read sentences?—Yes.

Do you think that practice answers?—Yes; I think it prevents hesitation; almost all the persons I have heard read, who hesitate, do so by not knowing the words at sight. The eye not going a little before the tongue.

How long does it take you to teach them to write?—That is a more difficult question; some have a great talent for writing, and others cannot write at all; in a year we can make them write a tolerably good large hand.

Do you pass them further in arithmetic than the first four rules?—There is no limitation; they are taught, as far as their abilities and time in the house will allow, double rule of three, practice, fractions, &c.

Do they receive any instruction to qualify them for their maritime life?—Yes; geometry, trigonometry, and the various sailings in navigation; there is no limitation in this branch more than the former, except want of capacity or time in the house; boys of talent would be taught lunar observations.

What are the different trades you teach them?—Tailoring and shoemaking.

Do they attain a considerable degree of proficiency in those trades?—Yes, wonderfully so.

Do you think it likely they will be of use to them?—Yes, the greatest; I sent a boy to a revenue cruizer, he fell off the yard arm upon a gun, and hurt his knee; the Society took him in, and after great pains, Mr. L'Estrange recovered him, though it was considered a hopeless case. I felt very much for this child; I thought it would be a great thing if they learnt a trade that would be of use to them in case of accident.

Have you any ship connected with the Institution?—No; the Lords of the Admiralty made us a present of a vessel at one time, and the Society applied for an increased grant; we intended to increase the school to 300; they were refused the grant, and returned the vessel.

Why was it necessary to return the vessel, because the grant was refused?—It was an expense their funds would not have afforded without an increased grant.

Do you not think the possession of such a vessel would be very advantageous to the Institution?—Indeed it would; and it was on a memorial of mine stating the advantages, that the Society were induced to accept it.

Would it not be very desirable that the boys should occasionally go out in the bay, and sail about?—Yes, and that has been very often suggested.

What would be the expense of such a vessel?—I cannot tell.

Was any estimate made of the probable expense of maintaining that vessel before she was sent away?—Yes; there was 1,000*l.* additional per annum wanting, that was connected with the increase of the school.

Then was that 1,000*l.* a year intended to cover the additional number of boys?—Not entirely; but we had a much larger grant then than now.

Considering merely the additional expense which the maintenance of such a vessel would cause, can you give any opinion upon the subject?—It would depend upon the description of vessel, and to what purpose it was to be appropriated; if it was to be merely used for sailing in the bay, the one returned was a great deal too large; it was a twelve-gun vessel: it was intended as a sort of school; that a portion of boys should live on board, and a portion in the house; and that those who lived on board should be taught to man the yards, and certain other things which I do not understand; there must have been another person got for that purpose.

After the boys have left you, have you any means of knowing what becomes of them?—A great many come back constantly to see me.

Do the most of them continue in the naval service do you think?—I think latterly they have; much more so than formerly.

Were they in the habit of abandoning the ships after they were put into them?—Very frequently they staid away from the vessel, and some do so now, but not many.

What becomes of them after they elope?—Some of them are pig drivers, others pot boys and blackguards upon the face of the earth; I have known a woman steal her child's clothes in the transit from the Marine School to the vessel, and pawn the whole stock of them.

What became of the boy?—I recovered the clothes; I take care now to give the clothes to nobody but the master of the vessel or his mate, and I give a list of them.

Do the parents make objection to their children going to sea?—Yes, sometimes they do; but those are cases where the children were improper objects of the charity; I think the children of sailors, or even their parents, do not object to it; we have got rid of those impositions generally.

Is it your opinion that the majority of boys turn out well or ill?—I think they turn out well; there are many of them I know have turned out very well; there are some who have become lieutenants in the navy, and have come back again and visited the school; many are masters of vessels and some are mates.

Do you always know the religion of the parents when the children are admitted?—Never; we never ask.

It

It is known to the parents that the children are to be educated Protestants?—Yes, I always state it, and that the child must go to sea.

Have you reason to think many become Roman Catholics after they quit you?—I believe so.

What do you know upon the subject?—I have no absolute authority upon the subject, but I believe if their fathers and mothers are living, and they live with them, in general they go with them; if they are apprenticed to a long voyage or continue with the vessel and do not come home to Ireland, they generally continue in the religion they have been taught. I know many instances of children that would not go to mass with their parents, but some do.

During the time that the boys are with you, do you find that the parents interfere with them upon the subject of religion?—I know they do, and bring them tracts and Roman Catholic prayer books, and I think that was one reason why many of our Governors wished to curtail the intercourse.

To whom is the religious instruction of the boys committed?—What is to be committed to memory is done in the school; we have a chaplain, and he lectures them.

Does he reside in the Institution?—No.

Who is the chaplain?—The Reverend Mr. Gamble, but he has lost his intellects from some domestic misfortune; he has lost his memory entirely; Mr. Wright, of Rutland-square, is his assistant, he takes his duty now.

What attendance does he give?—There is service every Sunday, Christmas day, and Good Friday, and he comes generally half an hour before service, and brings a young gentleman with him, either Mr. Robert J. Ball, A. B. or the Reverend J. Burnet, curate of Clontarf, and they hear two or three classes during that time, and what has been prepared in the week.

Are you always present upon those occasions?—Generally.

Will you describe the course of examination?—There is the Church Catechism, Mann's Catechism, Dr. Bell's Selections from the Old and New Testament, Mrs. Trimmer's Selections from the Old Testament, and the New Testament itself.

Have they time to go through the whole of those books you have described?—No, there is a portion for each week.

Does the examination last only half an hour?—Sometimes more; if it happens to be a very wet day, perhaps he is not so early as at other times.

Have you catechetical examinations established by the Society for discountenancing Vice?—We have had, but not since Mr. Gamble lost his intellect.

Do you mean that Mr. Wright appropriates only half an hour to the 160 boys?—There is only a certain portion, the rest are taught in the school.

What number may be examined in the half hour?—From twenty to thirty-six; they are the head classes, and we are bound to have them well prepared for him.

Do you conceive that about a minute for each boy is sufficient?—No, it would not; but they are lectured in class; Mr. Wright is doing the duty at present without fee or reward. When Mr. Gamble was competent to it, he came twice in the week.

Is it to oblige Mr. Gamble or any other person?—It is I believe to oblige the Archbishop of Dublin.

Mr. Wright is an extremely competent man?—Yes, he is.

What is Mr. Gamble's salary?—One hundred pounds a year.

What is his age?—Near eighty, I believe; I may be wrong.

Has Mr. Gamble been long in the office?—Mr. Gamble and I were elected the same day, twelve or thirteen years ago; the chaplain formerly lived in the house, and superintended the institution.

What duties are performed by the registrar?—He is obliged to attend all the Boards; to keep the records and books belonging to the Society, and to enter minutes of the transactions, to prepare receipts, to calculate and audit the accounts before they are passed, and initial them, and draw the checks upon the bank, and draw the receipts for them, and to prepare the accounts for the commissioners.

Have you any knowledge of the accounts?—Yes; I have the last year's account here.

Have you ever read the Tenth Report of the Commissioners of the Education Inquiry in 1809?—Yes, I think I have.

Do you recollect, that it drew a most unfavourable picture of the then state of the Institution?—I do.

Do you consider, that the state it exhibits at present is a strong contrast to what it was then?—Yes, I think so, indeed.

Can you state in what year the improvement commenced?—When I went there, there were but 112 boys, and the estimate for 170 was spent upon 112; they were badly clothed, badly fed, and badly taught.

Then we must collect, from that answer, that there were improper gains resulting to some persons from such a state of facts?—Yes, there were; because, shortly after I became master, I was obliged to bring the housekeeper, who was, in fact, the head officer of the house, before the Board, and she was dismissed on charges of very gross peculation indeed.

Have you reason to believe, that her successor has been perfectly pure in that respect?—Yes; the dominion is in my hands, not in hers.

How often does the Board of Managers meet?—The first Monday in every month; and there are adjourned meetings.

What number generally attend the meetings on the first Monday in the month?—Five

Appendix, N^o 24.

Examination of
Mr. John Baker.
22 November 1825.

or six generally, and sometimes twelve or thirteen. We very seldom have an adjourned Board now; for this reason, that the Registrar is a Governor now, and the Surgeon is a Governor.

Will you describe the occasion when so many attend as twelve or thirteen?—Elections, or contracts.

How many attend on other occasions, generally?—Five or six.

Are you aware of a complaint made by the Commissioners, in the Tenth Report before alluded to, that the Committee of Fifteen frequently adjourned their monthly meetings, because they had not a sufficient number to make a Board?—I heard of it.

Is that frequently the case now?—No, it is not, indeed; very seldom, unless it is a very wet day.

Who is the Surgeon?—Mr. L'Estrange; he was for twenty-seven years, without any salary; the registrar has the right of acting as a governor, and he has taken that right; but his predecessor never did.

He is a salaried officer?—Yes, he is.

Does the registrar collect the annual subscriptions?—He does; it is his business to do so; but they are very small.

Have you at any time had occasion to report or complain of immoral practices among the boys?—No, except one rebellion among the boys, when nine were dismissed.

Do you find the boys much addicted to falsehood?—No, very much the reverse; when they are a little time in the house; that is a crime I never forgive.

When they first come to the house, do you find them addicted to it?—Yes; and if they are grown boys, they are addicted to cursing, swearing and lying.

Do you mean, that you have generally got the better of those habits after they have been a little time in the house?—Yes; we have an order of discipline they fall into with very little trouble.

Have you anything but corporal punishment to restrain them from those practices, particularly that of falsehood?—There are cells for confinement, which have been seldom used; and I have 10*l.* per annum at my disposal to reward captains, monitors, and other meritorious boys. These boys must keep a very strict eye to their several duties, otherwise they will be punished instead of rewarded.

Is it the habit of a captain and lieutenant to prefer complaints to you of the other boys?—Yes, it is a part of their duty.

Have they any feeling that it is a point of honour not to make those complaints?—Yes, among some; but I have dismissed them.

Do the boys conceive it a dishonourable act of the captain to carry a tale?—They do.

Has the captain any authority to punish?—No, he dare not raise his hand or foot; I never allow any child in the school to raise his hand or foot to another. When I went to the institution there were 112; with the same annual stipend I maintain 180. Government, during the time Mr. Grant was Secretary of State here, diminished it from 2,800*l.* to 1,850*l.* We were still able, by economy, to support 180. Since then Government have taken 200*l.* more from us; and we are certainly in debt this year from the very high state of provisions. If we had room for 300, we should never have a vacancy.

Do you think, if you had accommodation and means for 500, you would have a demand for so many?—I think we would, by establishing local committees at Cork, Limerick, Waterford, Belfast and Galway. I have had a long correspondence with Rear Admiral Sir Josiah Rowley and with Lord Colville on the subject, relating to the Cork station, when they respectively commanded there, which came to nothing from the low state of our funds.

Have you any lands?—None in our hands.

Have you any estates?—We have some small property in the county of Carlow.

Where did your bank stock come from?—It was the saving of different grants and donations that were given; bank stock rose very high, and there were bonus's which increased the amount of it.

How did you acquire the land in the county of Carlow?—It was left by will. When I came to the institution the diet and clothing were 17*l.* a year per head. There was a trial upon a bail bond, and the Society were bound to prove what the diet and clothing amounted to, and it was very near 18*l.*

What books are used in the school?—All that I have mentioned in the catechetical part; Mann's Catechism, the Church Catechism, Mann's Explanation, Extracts from the Scriptures by Dr. Bell, Mrs. Trimmer's Selections from the Old Testament, the New Testament, and the Psalter, various small spelling books, and Carpenter's spelling book for explanation; and when these are gone through, we put the Bible into their hands.

Do you make use of any books published by the Kildare-place Society?—No.

Are you aware they would make you a grant of books, if you applied for them, without any expense to yourself?—No, I am not indeed aware of it. I am a member of the Society for Discountenancing Vice; and I used to get Bibles and Testaments at a very reduced price. The Society have altered their plan, and curtailed the privilege very much. Books on grammar and geography are put into the hands of the children; also Gough's Arithmetic, M'Kay's Navigation, and selections from it on geometry and trigonometry, which I selected myself, and they were printed for the use of the school.

Are all the officers sworn on entering upon the discharge of their respective duties?—No, none, except the Registrar.

Do you know the system of gymnastics established at the Hibernian Military School?—

Yes;

Yes; and it was mentioned to our Board, and the Governors did not think it necessary. The nautical gentlemen said, they would learn it much better on board ship.

Are the children dressed in a uniform?—Yes; the uniform is blue, with anchor buttons.

Are they drilled in any way?—In summer they are taught to march, wheel and counter-march, and so forth; it was merely introduced by myself, being an old military man, I amused myself with it.

You say, some boys have been taught lunar observations?—Yes.

By yourself?—Yes, and the usher, but not lately. I have not had any lately who have staid long enough. I have had some who have gone through them admirably.

Is the play-ground large enough for the use of the school?—Yes, fully so.

Have you room for any more children than you have in the Institution?—Ten more.

The dormitories are very crowded?—Not very much so.

The beds are very close to one another?—Yes, but the dormitories are well ventilated.

Do you consider it a healthy situation?—I do, from the experience of the last fourteen years; but I have heard much to the contrary. I beg leave to amend a former answer as to prevalent complaints, by saying, that scrofulous complaints appear to increase very much, not only here but elsewhere, nor did I intend that as a matter particularly appertaining to this House, but as a general remark, which might be useful to the Commissioners. It breaks out in spring and autumn particularly.

Do you find that you have sufficient strength of ushers to conduct the business of the school?—Yes, on the present scale of education.

Have you any connection with the Ouzel galley?—No, the friends that we had in connection with it are dead.

Is algebra taught commonly in the school?—No, we do not teach it; it is unnecessary for nautical purposes.

Fortification?—No.

Surveying?—No.

Gunnery?—No.

Appendix, N° 25.

Examination of the Rev. George N. Wright; Friday, 2d December 1825.

WE understand you have for some time discharged the duties of assistant chaplain to the Hibernian Marine School?—Yes, I have.

Have you been regularly appointed?—I had a regular nomination from Dr. Gamble.

It is a delegation from him, who is regularly the chaplain, to do the duty in his place?—The way in which I understand it is this, he (Dr. Gamble) was at liberty to nominate a deputy; the Board of Governors did not wish to nominate one, as they would then have to pay him; so Dr. Gamble nominated me, and it was by the consent and approbation of his Grace the Archbishop; I purposed to put the nomination into my pocket, but I forgot it.

When did that take place?—Two years next January.

What preferment do you hold in the church?—Not any.

What other duty do you discharge?—I have a very large school in Dublin.

What duties do you discharge at the Marine School?—My engagement with Dr. Gamble is to assist, that is, to preach every second Sunday, to catechise once a week, or in fact, there is no certain definite time for catechising appointed in my agreement; it is merely to assist in the discharge of the Sunday duty.

Have you received either from the Governors of the Institution or any other person, any exact specification of what your duties are, or ought to be?—No, never.

Has it been left to your own option to decide what you were to do?—Altogether, except the formal agreement; "I, A. do nominate and appoint the Reverend George Newnham Wright to assist in the duties of chaplain to the Hibernian Marine School, for the consideration herein named, &c.; lately, Dr. Gamble has become quite incompetent to discharge the duties; he has absented himself, and let the thing gradually fall on my shoulders; he does not attend at all.

Do you know whether it was necessary for the Governors to consent?—I cannot say.

Did any communication take place between you and the Governors, before your appointment?—No, not before.

Was it understood you would succeed to Dr. Gamble upon his death, or upon his being unable to discharge the duties?—I do not know that there was any such understanding.

Have you any reason to expect you shall succeed to him?—I have not, beyond the chance, that having served a number of years, if I then applied for the situation I might be appointed; my employment is of such a nature that I would rather have something to do on Sunday than be idle. I have twenty boarders, and I take them to the Marine Chapel with me; they have a pew there, and are under my eye; the duties of the situation are not laborious, unless a greater quantity of catechising be imposed upon me, which as yet the Governors have not done.

What attendance do you give in the course of the week?—Not any.

Is it on the Sunday you catechise the children only?—When I understood they were to be sent to the annual examination, I catechised them two hours every day for one month.

Did you think them tolerably proficient?—I did.

Appendix, N^o 25.Examination of
Rev.George N. Wright,
2 December 1825.

Was your instruction and examination confined to the catechism only, or did it extend to the New Testament?—It might more properly be called a divinity lecture; the boys were directed to prepare themselves in a chapter or two in the Testament; these the master compelled them to commit to memory, and I examined them in the given quantity, and lectured them upon it afterwards, from three to five o'clock each day.

Is the master competent to do that?—Yes, historically; but he declines teaching them as a catechist.

Have you recommended any books to them as guides to their instruction?—I always looked on it as a very delicate matter to interfere in the arrangements of the Marine School; as the governors have never appointed me in any way, I was unwilling to suggest any thing.

Do you pay any attention to the general instruction of the boys?—Not any; and I believe it is not the duty of the catechist.

Have you ever been made acquainted with the duty discharged by Dr. Gamble?—I believe Dr. Gamble did not catechise for the last year, that is, for the year previous to my becoming his assistant.

Owing to his state of health?—Failure of memory; he is very infirm, as far as his intellect is concerned.

Do you know whether he had been in the habit of attending to the instruction of the children generally?—I believe so; but I look on it that the information the children have acquired is attributable to the master. In all public schools of royal foundation, and of similar character to this, the knowledge the boys acquire is attributable to the master of the school; the catechist only sees that the master does his duty, and if the boys do not come to him properly prepared, he cannot catechise them effectually.

Are you at all acquainted with the duties discharged by Mr. Lefanu, at the Hibernian Military School?—I believe he resides, and interferes in the management of the school.

You consider that as standing upon a different footing?—Yes; Mr. Lefanu resides in the institution. I do know of another school similarly situated to the Hibernian School, that is, the Blue Coat School, where I should think the duty of the chaplain was to interfere in the education of the boys, and the general management of the establishment; he resides in the house, and his salary is so large as to leave him perfectly independent; that is not the case in the Marine School; I might also instance the Foundling Hospital.

Do you think the situation of catechist of the Marine School is similar to that of the catechist of a charter school?—Yes; I was catechist at the Santry School for two years, and received 25*l.* or 30*l.* a year from the Incorporated Society.

Do the boys in the Marine School attend the catechetical examinations at St. Mary's church?—They have not attended since I became assistant to Dr. Gamble.

Can you state any reason why?—I wrote a letter to the governors containing my reasons for not presenting them for examination, and these reasons appeared to the board to be sufficient, and in consequence I received the following in reply.

[The Witness handed in the following Letter.]

9, Great George's-street, 10th June 1824.

"I AM directed by the Committee of the Hibernian Marine Society to inform you, that having taken your letter of the 6th instant into consideration, respecting the late arrangements of the Association relative to future catechetical examinations, it is not their wish that any of the boys of the Marine School should attend the examination to be held on the 18th instant.

"By order,

"Rev. G. N. Wright.

"Alex^r Worthington, Registrar."

Will you explain what you believe led to that letter?—The letter which I wrote to the governors, in answer to their direction to Dr. Gamble, to present the children at St. Mary's church, at the annual examination.

What did that letter contain, as nearly as you recollect?—As nearly as I remember, the letter stated, that the quantity of Scripture and divinity pointed out for children of twelve years of age or thereabouts, was so considerable, in addition to what they had in former years, that I could not, in the given time, prepare them for examination, even with the very great efforts of the master and assistants. I have in my pocket the two notices of the Association for Discountenancing Vice, one of the year 1821, and another of the year 1824, and the increase is so great, that from Mann's Catechism alone, (the subject of examination upon former occasions,) a little volume of thirty pages, the following should have been the subject of examination for the Marine School boys, when I became assistant, and which I should have prepared them in, in the space of about two months, viz. the Church Catechism, with its explanation, (that is, Mann's Catechism, or the entire examination of 1821; Mrs. Trimmer's Selections out of the Old Testament, as far as the 55th lesson (that is 100 pages of close printing), the 110th lesson, and from thence to the end of the Selections (about 50 pages), the Gospels of St. Luke and St. John, the Acts of the Apostles, and the following portions of the Liturgy, the general confession, the first collect in the communion service, and the second and third morning and evening collects; this was the increase which had been appointed by the Association in the intermediate space, between the time the boys were last presented at St. Mary's church, and the time it became necessary for them to be submitted to examination, after my appointment.

You found it too late, when you were appointed, to begin to prepare the children?—I did.

Will

463

Will the children attend the next examination?—They did not attend the last.

Was it found impossible to prepare them?—The governors did not do me the favour to communicate with me upon the subject.

Do you receive any salary or emoluments?—Not any; my agreement with Dr. Gamble was to receive a small salary, which I looked upon as absolutely necessary to be imposed upon him, in order that I might be able to say with truth, I held my appointment for a certain consideration, which the nomination specifies.

Does the agreement mention the sum?—It was a mere nominal consideration; I need not add, that I did not receive any thing, nor did I intend to ask any thing; he is a very old man, and has a large family of grand children thrown upon his hands, by the death of his son, a young clergyman of the diocese of Dublin.

Is the duty performed in the chapel every Sunday?—Yes, it is, by myself alone.

And has been since Dr. Gamble's infirmity?—Yes.

Supposing the case of your being actually appointed to the situation of chaplain, with the emoluments, whatever they may be, should you think that the duties you now perform towards the children were all you would be called upon to discharge, or should you take a different course, and pay more attention?—Unquestionably take a different course; I feel I cannot now interfere in the school or the instruction of the children without appearing officious; the governors have carefully avoided recognizing me, and therefore I am very cautious in making any the least suggestion.

Has your connexion with the school enabled you to form any opinion as to the mode of general instruction of the children?—The masters are always in attendance, and there appears to be a good deal of discipline observed in the school; the part of their studies which I have had occasion to inquire into, I have found they are very fairly prepared in. I had opportunities of comparing them with the boys of other schools, but the peculiar situation in which I am placed does not enable me to become thoroughly acquainted with the system of education pursued in the school.

Do you think the boys from the Marine School for the most part turn out well?—They do. I think it is a very useful institution. I am satisfied that since the present master was appointed, the number of elopements has diminished, and the general conduct and propriety of the school is very much bettered. I did cast my eye over an old Report, and learned from it, that the school was not then in very good order, nor the discipline very correct.

Female Orphan House, Circular Road, Dublin.

RESOLUTIONS and BYE LAWS as taken from the Journals of that Institution.

Resolved, That the Governors and Governesses of this Institution be summoned by the Register five days previous to each meeting; and on all occasions in which particular business is to come before the Board, the said business to be inserted in the summons.

THE Matron is to keep inventories of the household furniture, linen, and children's apparel, which when past use are to be disposed of for the benefit of the Institution, and not to be looked on as perquisites, as none are allowed to any persons in the house.

It is expected the Matron will confine herself to great plainness of dress, and exact the same of the servants. If they do not comply with such orders, she is to make her complaint to the Governors and Governesses, and such persons (if the complaint be well founded) are to be removed as improper examples to the children.

The Matron is not herself to receive, neither is she to suffer any of the servants to receive, the visit of any person in a room in which shall be any of the children.

Resolved, That the interior economy and regulation of the Orphan House, as far as respects the management of the orphans and the direction of the servants, are peculiarly in the province of the Governesses, and of them only.

Resolved, That when any articles are wanted by the Secretary, the Register and Accomptant, or the Matron, for the use of their several departments, application be made in writing to the Board for such articles being supplied, and that no articles whatsoever be purchased or expense entered into on account of the Orphan House before a written order of the Board be obtained, except for provisions, unless in cases of absolute emergency, and then and in such cases only by written order by one or more Vice Presidents or Committee, appointed in the absence of the Board.

Resolved, That a proper book or books be provided for the use of the Matron, to enter regular accounts of the several articles of clothing, made or unmade, and of all other articles entrusted to her care, and that such book or books be kept ready for the inspection of the Board or the Governors at all times when called for.

Resolved, That the Matron do deliver to the Register and Accomptant, before eleven o'clock in the morning of each Board day regularly, a list of the orphans in the house.

Ordered, That no money or any other matter or thing by way of gratuity, fee, reward or profit, or present, be demanded, taken, accepted, or received by any person employed in the Orphan House, or salary or wages from the friends of this Institution, on any pretence whatsoever, either for themselves or any other person, of or from any person or persons supplying the Orphan House with provisions, or any other article or articles, or of or from any persons employed to do any work at or for the Orphan House, or of or from any relation, friend, or connexion of any orphan or orphans at present admitted, or who are soliciting or who may hereafter solicit for the admittance of any child or children into the Orphan House, upon pain of immediate dismissal by the first Board assembled after their knowledge of the offence; and that fair copies of this order, signed by the Secretary, be posted up in the board-room, school-room, matron's-room, dormitory, hall, and kitchen of the Orphan House, for the information of the parties concerned, and that none may plead ignorance thereof.

Resolved, That in cases of emergency, the Secretary or Register and Accomptant be and they are hereby authorized and directed to summon an extraordinary meeting or meetings of the Governors and Governesses, and that such business only for which they are then summoned be transacted.

Resolved, That the bills of tradesmen who supply any articles for the use of the Orphan House be certified by the Register and Accomptant, respecting their being rightly cast up and properly charged, that the several articles were received, and by regular orders of the Board, the articles of provisions excepted, which are to accompany all such bills, and that the amount of each bill is really and actually due to the party applying for payment, all which being complied with, a proper order shall be written upon each bill, signed by the President for the day, directing the Registrar and Accomptant to pay the same.

Resolved, That all drafts upon the Treasurer to the Orphan House be made payable to the Register and Accomptant of the Orphan House; and that the Register and Accomptant do regularly on each Board day account for the expenditure of the money entrusted to them.

Girls to be admitted from the age of five to ten years, instructed in the principles of the established religion, taught "reading, writing, cyphering, needle-work, geography, washing, and every part of household work" that may render them useful servants, and to be apprenticed or put out to service from the age of sixteen to twenty-one.

Resolved, That certificates be deposited in the hands of the Mistress, with an order to deliver one of them to any orphan applying for admission, in order that the said orphan may procure the signatures of the minister and churchwardens of the parish to which she belongs, to such certificate.

Resolved,

Resolved, That every candidate for admission be required to appear at a monthly meeting with a certificate, signed in the manner prescribed, and with a recommendation from some subscriber to this Institution.

Resolved, That any Governor or Governess, or subscriber who shall hereafter recommend a child to this Institution, be required, previous to the admission of such child, to enter into a bond, conditioned for the payment of fifty pounds sterling, in case it should appear that the child so admitted had either father or mother living at the time of her admission.

Resolved, That in future children shall not be admitted into this House in less than a month after they have been proposed.

Resolved, That every Governor and Governess shall be proposed one month before their election takes place.

RULES for the interior Management of the Orphan House for Destitute Females.

Appendix, N° 42.

THE MATRON.

WHEN the whole family is assembled, she is to read prayers every morning before breakfast, and every evening after supper, in the dining-room; to superintend the servant of the house, to see that she does her business properly, and discharges the trust reposed in her faithfully; to keep an account of the current expenses; to receive and take care of the provisions, and to take an account of the quantity and weight thereof; to keep an account of the materials brought in for the children's work, and of the delivery of the same when finished, in order to adjust and rectify any mistakes that may happen; to keep an account of the money due or received for the same; to deliver such account to the Register, to be delivered to the Board, noting in such Report all the works in which the children have been employed for themselves.

To superintend, direct, and instruct such girls as are appointed to perform the household business; to see that all the children are properly employed in working and reading, during the hours appointed by the guardians; that they mend their own clothes, and that they regularly say their prayers night and morning; that they are always kept neat, clean, and decent; to accompany them to Divine Service, and visit their rooms before she goes to bed. She is daily to attend to the state of their health; when sick, remove them to the infirmary; give notice thereof to the gentlemen of the faculty, and to the guardians; treat them with tenderness and humanity, and report their behaviour occasionally to the guardians.

To see that the house, and every thing belonging to it, be kept clean, the children's apparel duly taken care of, the beds regularly made, and the linen properly got up; to attend the children at their meals, see that grace is reverently said before and after, and that proper decorum be always preserved; to see all the fires and candles extinguished, doors and gates fastened at eight o'clock in winter, and at nine o'clock in summer; to superintend all the domestic business of the house, and to see all the established rules strictly observed.

The senior girls are to be more particularly under the Matron's inspection, that she may know their dispositions perfectly, and instil such principles of piety, truth, honesty, modesty, industry, sobriety, regularity and rectitude, as may make them good and faithful servants.

THE ASSISTANT.

THE Assistant is to act under the direction of the Matron, to give her most constant and zealous aid in maintaining effectual discipline in the school, and strict order in the house; to consider it her special charge to superintend the work, to be peculiarly attentive to the morals, tempers, behaviour, personal neatness and cleanliness of the children; to promote the objects of the Institution by every exertion which circumstances call for.

THE TEACHERS.

THEY are each to have an equal number of children under their care, whom they are to keep strictly employed in working and reading during school hours, and that the children make and mend all their own clothes; wash, comb, and keep the children at all times clean and neatly dressed; to attend them at their meals, see that grace is reverently said, and that proper decorum be always preserved; to attend the children to Divine Service, make them find out the Psalms, lessons, epistles and gospels of the day, make them be attentive during the service, and make them regularly say their prayers night and morning. They are to rise at five o'clock in summer, at seven in winter, and make the children rise at the same hour; they are to obey all the orders of the Matron and her Assistant, and to observe all such rules and orders as are or may from time to time be made.

THE SERVANT.

SHE is to attend to the dairy, to take care that the provisions be properly dressed, and placed on the tables at the stated hours (See Table N° 3); that the linen be carefully washed and got up, the house and furniture exactly cleaned; she is to instruct the children who may be placed under her by the Matron in all household business, and to observe all rules and orders as are or may from time to time be made.

Appendix, N° 42.

Neither the assistant nor servant are at any time to sleep out of, or absent themselves from the house, without express leave from the Matron, nor to quit their situations without giving notice thereof to the Board, and to remain till the next Board-day following, so that the Guardians may have proper time to engage others; any one disobeying this rule to forfeit the friendship of the Governors, &c. &c.

The house is to be open, on week days only, to such as may visit it in company with, or by an order from a Governor or Governess; no servants to be admitted; no girl apprenticed from this Institution, or any friends of the children or servants are to be permitted to visit them, except in the presence of the Matron, on such days and hours as the Board may appoint.

EMPLOYMENT OF THE CHILDREN.

THE children are to be taught to read, to write a legible hand, and cast up accounts. They are to be taught to do all the household duties, to make and mend all their own clothes, to make shirts, shifts, and other linen, to execute all kinds of needle-work, and when there shall not be any other work in the house, they are to knit stockings and garters, and spin flax; they are never to be unemployed but at the stated hours for recreation. (Prices of work, see Table N° 1.) No child to be allowed to talk or complain of another but in presence of the person complained of, and a lie must always be punished with rigour.

THEY are to scour the sleeping rooms once in ten days in summer, and once a month in winter; if the season be particularly damp, then fires shall be lighted before they begin to clean the rooms. The elder girls (in turns weekly) to assist in serving the others at their meals. The children are not to begin to eat till they say grace, and all to be called by the sound of the bell; if any one comes in after grace is said, to have nothing but dry bread and a draught of water, and a strict silence to be observed during the repast in general.

After every meal, half an hours recreation, and then to proceed to their daily employment; as soon as they are called into the school-room every morning at nine o'clock, they are to form into classes, to read and repeat their lessons, and afterwards they are to write and then settle to their work. At twelve o'clock, the Matron shall repeat some portion of Scripture from the New Testament or the Psalms, each girl having her own book to fix her attention, and then to return to their several employments.

As soon as the children have supped, and the room is cleared as before mentioned by the elder girls, prayers are to be read by the Matron. The children shall be washed and combed every night; shall say their prayers in the sleeping-rooms as in the morning, and not be allowed to talk when in bed. Every Saturday afternoon the elder girls must prepare their clothes for Sunday, and assist those who are not able to do as much for themselves; to have their feet washed every Thursday after the clothes are washed, and the little ones to be put into the bath weekly, the elder ones only once a month; to have clean shifts, aprons, caps, cuffs, tuckers, and handkerchiefs twice a week; night cap and pocket handkerchiefs once a week; clean tippet and gloves the first day in every month; a clean bedgown once a month, or if employed in household business, the week after their work is done. The children never to be suffered to be in the kitchen or in the sleeping-rooms, but when in actual employment. A child is not to be suffered to open the street door, or appear in the front of the house, or to be sent out of the house on a message on any account.

R. Malins,
Register and Accountant.

Appendix, No. 43.

Examination of Mr. Richard Malins; Monday, 29th of November 1824.

WHAT is the establishment of which you are registrar and accountant?—The Female Orphan House.

By whom is the Female Orphan House governed?—By a number of governors and governesses.

Of whom do they consist?—The Lord Lieutenant is the president, and Mrs. Latouche, of Belle Vue, is the vice-president, and a number of other governors and governesses.

By whom are they appointed?—They are elected by the Board, and were first nominated by Act of Parliament when the charter was granted.

When was the charter granted?—In the year 1800; I am not certain; it was the last parliament but one that was here.

Do you reside in the house?—No.

Who is the resident manager?—The matron; I do all the business for them they want a man to do.

How many years have you been registrar of it?—From the commencement of it.

What is your salary?—£.75. a year.

How many children are in the establishment?—One hundred and sixty-eight.

Do you remember the number of governors or governesses?—No, I do not, they alter very much; new ones are elected every year as the others die; there are a great many in the Act of Parliament.

What funds are there for the maintenance of the establishment?—What is collected at the charity sermon, the annual subscriptions, the parliamentary grant, and some trifling interest of government stock.

Do you keep the accounts?—I do.

Is there a committee of governors and governesses?—There is a general board.

How often does it meet?—Once a month.

Is there any committee?—No.

Who is it superintends from time to time?—Mrs Latouche is the principal governess.

How often do the governesses attend for the purposes of inspection?—They attend once a month at the Board, and some of them very often; there is hardly a week passes there are not some of them there.

Appendix, N^o 43.

Examination of
Mr.

Richard Malins,
29 November 1824.

Is Mrs. Latouche the most frequent attendant?—Yes, she was, but she has had sickness in her family; she has not been there this month.

Has any other governess been there?—Yes, constantly; I saw the Honourable Mrs. Fowler there the other day, and Mr. Alexander Knox is a very active governor in Dawson-street.

What children have been admitted?—Orphans without father, mother or friends; orphans having neither father nor mother.

On whose recommendation are they admitted?—The recommendation of the Board and the churchwardens and ministers of the parish to prove the truth of their assertion.

From what parts of the country are they admitted?—All parts.

At what ages are they admitted?—From five to ten.

What number of years are they kept there?—Till we can provide for them; generally till they are about sixteen or seventeen.

In what way are they provided for?—As servants.

As servants only?—Yes, except in case of lameness or any thing of that kind, we find it necessary to put them to trade where they can be sitting.

Is it easy to get places for them?—We have more applications than we can supply; they go greatly about children, a kind of under nurses, where there are large families.

Do you know why they are particularly chosen for that purpose?—They find them generally very good work women, and they are better disposed than most other children, and their having a better education.

Is any premium given with them?—None; the child gets one when she is out of her time.

What is the amount of it?—Five guineas.

What proportion of the girls who are apprenticed claim the premium?—I believe they almost all get it.

What are the conditions with which they must comply to obtain it?—Serving their time faithfully; they are bound in an indenture, and if they serve the indenture out, the indentures bind the master or mistress to pay five guineas.

The house do not pay that five guineas?—No.

Is there any fee paid by the Orphan House?—None, except in cases where we find necessary to put them to some trade, and I think, since I remember it, there was only one.

Suppose a girl turned Roman Catholic, would she get her five guineas?—I suppose so that we have nothing to do with.

Have you reason to believe that many do turn Roman Catholics?—I believe not.

Do they for the most part turn out well?—A great many of them.

Do a great many of them turn out ill?—Not many.

Is it always known when they do?—Not always; if they turn out ill, they generally make application to us for relief.

Are they not ashamed to see you, if they turn out ill?—Want puts shame aside.

How many can you call to mind, of late years, to have turned out ill?—Not more than two or three, that I know of; and many leave their places, and get on very well afterwards: there are some that have been ten or fifteen years in the same situation.

You do not know, at the house, whether they get the five guineas or not?—No.

How many admissions are there in the course of a year?—From 20 to 25.

How many do you apprentice in the course of a year?—About the same number; because we keep up the number, 168: when there is a vacancy, we fill it.

Do none die?—Yes, but very few; and then it is the same.

Do any elope?—We have not had one elope these ten years.

Who is the instructor of them?—The chaplain catechises them; but the matron instructs them—her and her assistant.

What is the chaplain paid for the instruction of them?—He is chaplain to the church also, and gets 150*l.* a year.

Who is the present minister?—The Reverend Charles Dickinson: he attends twice a week, to catechise the children.

How are the children fed?—They have meat three days a week, and broth three days; the other is made up of potatoes, and milk or butter.

What clothing have they?—A green stuff.

How much in a year?—They get one suit in every year, and then they make it good, if there is any accident happens to any of them, to make it hold out, so as to keep them decent; they are new clothed at the beginning of the year.

Do they make their own clothing?—Always; their shoes excepted.

Do they take in work?—A great deal.

Who has the profit of it?—The establishment.

Have the girls themselves any part of it?—None at all.

Have there not been considerable additions to the buildings?—Yes; in these few years a chapel was built.

Are the children healthy?—Very healthy.

Have any diseases been prevalent among them lately?—We believe they have had no diseases lately at all; they sometimes bring in diseases with them; scrofulous diseases, that turn into decline.

Are diseases of the eyes prevalent in the Institution?—I never saw an instance of it; we received one with bad eyes.

How do the girls conduct themselves?—In general, very well.

Have there been any instances of the girls turning out ill?—Never.

If no expenses were incurred in building, about what would be the annual expense of the establishment?—About 2,500 l. or 2,600 l.

How comes it, that the expense for diet in 1817 was 1,655 l. and that in the year ending 5th January 1822 it was 996 l.?—It was a fall in the price of provisions; bread was little more than half the price.

Are they supplied by contract?—Meat, they are; not bread.

Who contracts for the supply of the food?—The Board.

Who contracts with them?—A man of the name of Keogh, at present, in Ormond market.

How is the bread supplied?—By the baker.

How is the clothing supplied?—I purchase it.

By contract?—No.

Why was the clothing 368 l. in one year, and 420 l. in another?—You will find every thing has been declining these three or four years; all the expenses.

What permanent funds have the Institution?—None, but the interest of government stock.

What amount of government stock have they?—Not quite 3,000 l.

How did they become possessed of it?—One thousand eight hundred pounds was the gift of Lady Cremorne; the Board thought themselves bound to fund it, and not expend it; there was the legacy of Mr. De Courcy, and the saving upon it; and the rest has been savings.

If you divided the total expense of the establishment among the number of children in the Institution, what would it come to per head?—About 15 l.

Do you speak of the last year?—Yes.

Appendix, N° 43.

Examination of
Mr.

Richard Malins,
29 November 1824.

Appendix, N° 44.

Examination of the Reverend Charles Dickinson; Friday, 27th January 1826.

WE understand that you hold the situation of chaplain to the Female Orphan House?—Yes.

Do you hold it by virtue of a written appointment, or in what way?—The chaplain is appointed by the Board, and the appointment is referred to his Grace the Archbishop of Dublin, for his sanction and licence.

When were you appointed?—In August 1822.

Is there an annual re-election, or is the appointment permanent?—It is permanent.

Will you mention, in general, the nature of the duties which are expected from the chaplain?—The duties of the chapel, and the religious instruction of the children; the chaplain attends the Orphan House on two days in the week, for the purpose of examining and lecturing the children.

Is the chapel connected with the school particularly?—It is; it is a chapel belonging to the Institution; built for it; and although open to the public, intended particularly for the use of the female orphans.

It appears to be a chapel of considerable dimensions?—It is sufficiently commodious; the galleries are appropriated to the children, with the exception of the front gallery, which is reserved for the governors and governesses; the pews in the body of the church are designed for the public.

Is it attended by the public generally?—It is well attended; in fine weather we have very considerable congregations; our congregations, in wet weather, are of course diminished, but I am sure that diminution would not be so great as it is at present, if the Circular Road were in better order. We depend in fact for our congregation not only upon the fineness of the Sunday, but upon the fineness of the preceding days; for when there has been rain, the pathway of the Circular Road becomes quite impassable.

What do you think is the average number of the congregation, independently of the children?—It is hard to strike an average, on account of the variation of attendance in different seasons. The body of the church holds about 400, and in fine weather it is often full; we have seldom less than from 150 to 200.

With respect to your duties more immediately connected with the instruction of the children, you have mentioned that you attend twice a week; for what length of time is that attendance usually given?—The stated time is two hours, between twelve and two; but I sometimes occupy the children for a longer time. The manner in which we proceed is this; the children are divided into six classes; I lecture on the one day the first, third and fifth classes, and on the other day, the second, fourth, and sixth classes. By thus having junior and senior classes on the same day, an expedient portion of time can be allotted to all. I generally detain the two senior classes for an hour, the third and fourth classes for about three quarters of an hour, and the fifth and sixth classes for about twenty minutes. The children of those classes are so young, I feel I could not require their attention with any advantage for a longer period.

So that you give your instruction to three different classes on each day?—Yes.

Are you in the practice of not only lecturing them, but examining them also?—I do both; they prepare, during the interval of my visits, a portion of Scripture which I prescribe.

Appendix, N^o 44.Examination of
Rev.Charles Dickinson,
27 January 1826.

I examine them on the day I visit, for the purpose of ascertaining that they have paid sufficient attention to this portion during the preceding week; but in addition to examining them, I direct their minds to every important passage, and I dwell upon it, applying its instruction minutely to the government of their minds and actions, exemplifying it for the younger children by an application to their present duties and conduct amongst each other; and for the senior classes, by specifying its bearing upon the duties they will have to undertake, and the difficulties and temptations they will probably have to encounter on going out into the world.

When you give out the passage on the preceding day, is it your instruction that they should be prepared to explain to you the contents of it, or are they desired merely to read the passage?—They are required to be well acquainted with the facts and the precepts contained in the portion of Scripture, but when any thing doctrinal occurs, I find it more prudent to explain it than to question them upon it, because I would wish to impress upon them the feeling that they are not competent so to compare Scripture with Scripture, as to enable them to ascertain the doctrines of Scripture for themselves, and that in their present age, it is better for them to receive them from their instructors. Were I to dwell too much upon the examination of the children, I should fear I would impress upon their minds, that to enable them to answer was the purpose for which they were instructed. I wish them to make a wide distinction in their own minds, between the mode of studying the Scriptures and their ordinary lessons. I examine them, therefore, just sufficiently to ascertain that they have paid adequate attention to the portion of Scripture marked out to them, and that they have not been mis-spending their time.

State a little more distinctly the difference that you wish to impress upon them between the examination upon their ordinary books of instruction and the examination upon the Scriptures?—In studying their ordinary lessons they are aware that knowledge is the point aimed at. They are examined in those lessons for the purpose of ascertaining that they have attained it; a similar mode of examination in the Scriptures would leave upon them the impression, that the object pursued was the same in the two cases. It is of the highest consequence to guard against such an impression. It is therefore necessary so to intermingle instruction and exhortation with examination, as to make them perceive that there is an object beyond knowledge, for the promotion of which this knowledge is subservient, and for the sake of which it is communicated. In instructing children a careful line of distinction must be drawn between the knowledge of religion and the being religious. They must be made to understand that religion can be correctly and adequately estimated in proportion only as its principles have become impressed upon the heart.

The children are of course in the practice of reading the Scriptures on other times in school, as well as on the days when you examine them?—Yes; every morning there is an hour appointed, in which each class, in the presence of the matron and under the superintendence of the monitresses, reads the Scriptures.

Do you think, without this frequent and regular course of reading the Scriptures, that the children could be equally prepared to receive profitable instruction from you on the days of your examination?—I am perfectly certain that they could not. I am sure I should have very little power to produce impression upon them, if not prepared by that previous reading.

Do you know whether the superintendent and her assistant are in the practice of explaining the meaning of words and passages while the children are reading, or whether they leave that entirely to you as chaplain?—They give verbal, but not doctrinal explanations. The monitresses are selected from the senior classes, and have been themselves previously instructed in the portions of Scripture which the younger children have to read under their care; they would naturally make use of the same kind of questions which I put to them when they were instructed by me in those portions. For the purpose of improving their mode of instruction, the monitresses attend with their classes, and listen to my examination, with their books open before them.

Do you not consider it a great advantage, that the school mistress should, in whatever books the children are reading, make it her practice to explain the meaning of the passages which they are reading, so far as to enable them to understand the import of the words?—Certainly.

Necessary in all cases?—Certainly.

And equally necessary and proper in reading the Scriptures as any other book?—Certainly.

Do you find, from your experience in the school, that the capacity of the children and the understanding of what they read in school, has been exercised to a reasonable extent?—Decidedly so.

The meaning is, that they do not read and repeat what they have to recite to you by rote, without appearing to understand the meaning of the words which they use?—Indeed I think not; there is such a tendency in children to read in the manner mentioned, that it requires the constant vigilance of the instructor to prevent it. He must take care not to examine verse by verse, and he must not put his questions in such a form as to make the mere repeating of the verse of Scripture an adequate answer.

Is it your practice on that account sometimes to go back to a preceding lesson, and to vary the course and order of your examination upon the different passages?—It is.

On what parts of Scripture are you in the habit of lecturing the children; is it confined to the New Testament, or extended to the Scriptures generally?—We use Mrs. Trimmer's Selection Selection from the Old Testament and the New Testament; prescribing for each class such portions as seem adapted to the ages and improvement of the children.

You mean the New Testament itself?—Yes, the New Testament itself, not selections from it. The children upon their admission into the school are made to commit to memory the Lord's Prayer, and also a prayer which has been drawn up suitable to their condition, as orphans. They are then instructed in the church catechism, and are made to commit to memory selected portions of the metrical psalms. When they can read sufficiently well we give them select lessons from the Old Testament: they are then made to read the three first Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, the Gospel of St. John, and preparatory to their reading the Epistles, I have found it extremely useful to take them through the liturgy of our church, and some of its occasional offices; the baptismal and communion services, the visitation of the sick, and the burial of the dead; the commination service I have also found useful.

Explain why you refer to that particular portion of the Prayer Book?—I think it useful to make them read those services with attention, because I know of no means so likely to imbue their minds with the purest devotional feeling. In addition to this, I think it the best preparation for an advantageous perusal of the Epistles; all the important doctrines of the Scriptures are then presented devotionally and practically, and by being thus presented, a just conception of their nature and importance is more readily formed. It disposes the children to peruse the Epistles, not simply as a system of knowledge, but for devotional and practical purposes: I am convinced that without a preparation of this kind, they could not be prepared to read the Epistles with the same desirable advantages.

You mean you have read them together?—I have made them read those services preparatory to reading of the Epistles.

You mentioned that you found that particular part of the church service, the commination service, useful?—I think it is particularly useful, for in fact the exhortation belonging to that service is a most happy arrangement of powerful texts of Scripture, in reprehension of ill conduct, and pointing out the fatal consequences of departing from the laws of the Divine Being. It is altogether so powerful, that I think it cannot fail to produce an impression upon the mind of any person.

What other books are the children in the habit of reading as books of instruction, independently of spelling books and elementary books?—There are books of natural history, books detailing the wonders of nature and art; in addition to religious books, we have books of that class.

Any historical works?—Yes; some of Pinnock's historical catechisms, and a few other works.

[The witness was desired to send a list of all the books used in the Female Orphan School if not already given in.]

What is the usual period of time that the children remain in the Institution?—I think the average number of years is about twelve; they are received about five, and generally go out about seventeen.

Do they come under the course of your instruction from the first entrance into the house?—They do.

And continue to receive it till they leave it?—Till they leave it.

During the course of that time we may presume that some of them may be able to make considerable advances in religious knowledge?—Very considerable indeed.

Are any of them during their residence in the house qualified for receiving the holy communion?—Yes; the children who are of age, and who may, we conceive, be admitted to receive the communion, are kept in separate classes. They form the first and second classes. The first class consists of those who have received the communion, and who are also either monitresses, or are to be the next appointed monitresses; the second class consists of those who are not soon to be made monitresses, but who have received the communion; those classes are kept separate, because they require more advanced modes of instruction.

Can you state the number you have in those classes severally?—From the great number of children lately apprenticed there are fewer at present than have been since my appointment; we have only thirty-eight in the school now of sufficient age to receive the sacrament.

How many monitresses are there?—I think about eight, at present; there are about ten more in the first class; those who are considered best adapted and most deserving are appointed monitresses; it is, of course, considered a great honour in the school to be so appointed.

What is the greatest number that you have had in the second class at any time?—We have had thirty-eight, and about thirty in the first class; we have very few grown children in the Orphan House at present; the greater number are under fourteen, and many of them are very young indeed.

Is that to be ascribed to any particular cause in the management?—No; it must occur periodically. The children admitted are between the age of five and ten; of course, when the Orphan House was first instituted, a great number of children about the same age were received: those children would all be prepared to go to service at the termination of a certain period, and upon their being apprenticed, a number of vacancies would again arise, which of course would be filled with young children. These, in their turn, are fitted for service about the same period. We must, therefore, continue to have for some time an extra number of children to dispose of at certain periods, and upon their disposal, an unusual number of very young children.

Is it at present one of the periods at which there have been considerable drafts made?—It is; the drafts have been so considerable that we have only grown girls enough at present to do the necessary business of the house. There is but one servant employed in the house.

What observation would you make in general as to the morals of the children?—Indeed I feel I can justly speak of the children in the very highest terms, both from the impression which their general conduct in the school produces on my mind, and also from their excellent conduct when they leave the Institution; we have had the highest testimonials of their good conduct from the families in which they have been placed. I conceive that the good state of the Female Orphan House arises very much from the judicious arrangements of Mrs. Latouche, from the kind influence which she possesses over the minds of the children, and their conviction that she is ready to befriend them as long as they continue to deserve it.

Do the children appear to be sensible of her kindness?—Exceedingly so; they are gratefully attached to her; under her superintendence, I would attribute much to the attention of our excellent and sensible matron, Miss Stephens, and her assistant, Miss Graham. I am sure that without the constant superintendence of a matron as sensible as Miss Stephens, the instruction which the chaplain could convey would produce no competent effect. Miss Stephens communicates to me constantly every thing that has taken place in the school, with the view of directing my lectures to any particular point which she may consider necessary.

We understand that children come into the Institution at a very early age?—At a very early age.

Do you not consider that an advantage with respect to their after training and conduct?—A considerable advantage; the very young children the matron takes peculiarly under her own care, in order to impress upon their minds good habits from their entrance into the Orphan House.

So that they cannot have an opportunity of forming any improper habits?—No.

Do you find them more particularly addicted to speaking untruth than what is to be expected from children in their situation?—Not more than may be perceived amongst children generally. They are closely watched; it is considered in the school a disgraceful thing to tell a lie, and I think it would not be countenanced by the grown children, they would immediately inform of any younger child; the monitresses can be very much relied upon; none are appointed but those who it is believed may be trusted; they of course superintend the children at all times, even at their play hours, so that nothing can go on wrong in the School which is not immediately communicated to the matron.

Have they any opportunities of having intercourse with persons out of the house, their relations; or opportunities of forming any acquaintances?—Their relations are permitted to visit them on the first day of every month, and on any other day when they make a special application, if the matron should conceive there was a real object for the visit.

Are the elder children permitted at any time to leave the house occasionally?—No, they are not; all the children are taken out occasionally in summer by the matron, to the Phoenix Park, for the purpose of exercise; but they are not allowed to leave the house except under her care, indeed they do not appear to desire it; the children are exceedingly happy.

They do not consider it as a painful confinement?—Very far from it; they seem much attached to the Orphan House, I think they take a pride in it; it is generally considered as an objection to boarding schools that the affections of the children are allowed to wither; I do not think this verified by our experience in the Orphan House; they form very decided friendships towards each other, and they have feelings towards Mrs. Latouche and Miss Stephens like those of children to their parents.

Do you think that the minds of the children are, so to speak, in a healthy and sound state?—Very decidedly so indeed.

Have you had occasion to see any of those who have returned to the house after completing the service in which they have been engaged?—Yes.

Did they appear to you to come voluntarily and with feelings of regard towards the Institution?—I have always observed it to be the case; I believe the children to be warmly attached to the Institution; I have lately taken one of them as a nursery maid, and her representations have convinced me of this more satisfactorily than I could otherwise have known it; the state of feeling amongst the children is highly gratifying; they seem to have a romantic and enthusiastic affection for the Institution.

Has the girl to whom you have alluded turned out well and fitted to the situation?—Perfectly so.

To your satisfaction?—Perfectly so.

State whether any emolument, and what, is attached to your situation?—One hundred and fifty pounds a year.

Do you reside in the house?—No, there is not room in the Institution; there is no residence.

Does any thing occur to you to suggest to the Commissioners relating to this Institution which you have not already stated?—I have said a good deal in praise of the Institution, I would just wish, for my own sake, to say that I could do so unrestrainedly, because the arrangements are not due to the chaplain; I have turned the subject a good deal in my mind, and I could not propose to Mrs. Latouche any alteration which I should consider an improvement ment in the mode of management, although I am sure any such suggestions would be willingly received.

We understand from that, that you found the arrangements to be so well made that you had not occasion to interfere in suggesting a different course?—I have not had any occasion for so doing.

Appendix, N° 45.

Examination of Miss Sarah Stephens; Friday, 27th January 1826.

WHAT is the situation that you hold in the Female Orphan School?—General superintendent.

When were you appointed?—In 1820.

From whom did the appointment come?—The Board of Governors; I was in the house three months before I was appointed.

To make trial of the situation?—I came over as reading mistress, but at that time there was a matron and a reading and writing mistress; I came over as reading and writing mistress. It was thought fit by the Board to reduce the number of assistants; the matron left and went to England, I then took her situation as well, and I have filled both.

How long have you continued to hold both?—Ever since she left.

That is, matron and reading and writing mistress?—Yes.

Have you not an assistant?—No, not for writing classes; I have one assistant for the work.

Does the whole duty of teaching devolve upon you?—Entirely.

As well as the general superintendence of the establishment?—As well as the general superintendence of the establishment.

Had you, before coming to the Female Orphan School, any experience in similar institutions?—Yes, I was trained to the system by Doctor Bell, at the Central School, in Baldwin's Gardens, London.

What salary or emoluments are attached to your situation?—Sixty pounds a year Irish; then the Board reserve to themselves 20*l.* a year, to see whether I do my duty properly; I have regularly had the 20*l.* given me, so that my salary has been 80*l.* a year Irish.

Since your appointment you have received 80*l.*?—Yes, without the least hesitation.

You reside of course in the house?—Yes.

Have you no other advantage or allowances?—No other allowances, excepting the Board chooses to make me a present.

Have you allowance for coals or any thing of that kind?—Every thing is found in the house for me.

The salary which you receive applies both to your situation as matron and schoolmistress?—As schoolmistress and matron.

It is a remuneration for both situations?—For both.

Will you mention, if you please, the course of instruction in the school, the hours of attendance of the children, and the employment during the different periods of the day in which they are engaged?—We rise at six o'clock in the morning; at seven o'clock, we have prayers; immediately after, we go to breakfast; then the children assemble for the Scripture classes to study for Mr. Dickinson, that takes them three quarters of an hour; from that time they play until nine o'clock; then I have them to my own classes, which we make distinct from the Scripture classes.

Describe more particularly what we are to understand by your own classes?—Reading and writing.

How long do they continue in your class?—Till ten.

Does the chaplain attend daily?—No, twice a week.

The prayers are not read by the chaplain?—I read them.

After ten, how is their time disposed of?—From ten until half-past one they are at needle work, at two they dine, at three they go into the school for needle work and remain till half-past five; from half-past five to seven they have for play; they sup at seven, at eight we have prayers, and at half-past eight they go to bed.

Is that the regular course during the whole year?—During the whole year, winter and summer.

At what periods of the instruction are you personally present with the children?—I am regularly with them from nine to ten, and the greatest part of the day besides; when I have looked to the business about the house, and seen that all is right, I go back to the school room.

Have you an assistant who attends at the time of the instruction in needle work?—Yes; and when I am not with them the assistant is, so that one or the other is always in the school room.

What is the name of your assistant?—Graham.

Is she able to give you any assistance in the reading and writing department?—She is capable of it, but never does, unless any thing particular occurs.

You do not withdraw her attention from the peculiar business to which she is to attend?—I do not, as there is so much to do; I do not think she could attend to the other.

What are the books which you employ in the schools, the reading schools?—The English spelling books.

Miss

Sarah Stephens,

Can you enumerate them?—I have a list, which I will deliver in, of all the books that are used in the school.

[* The same was delivered in.]

This list contains the whole of the books which you use in the school?—The whole list of the books which are used in the school.

By whom are those books provided?—The Board provides them.

Provides the whole of them?—Yes.

Scripture reading forms part of the instruction daily;—At eight o'clock in the morning.

Is there any particular portion that you confine your attention to, or do you make selections from all parts?—That is done by Mr. Dickinson.

Does he point out the parts of the Scriptures he wishes to have read in the school?—He does.

Does it contain portions of the Old as well as the New Testament?—The Old Testament from Mrs. Trimmer's selection and from the New Testament.

Do you teach arithmetic?—Yes, I do.

To what extent?—Not further than avoirdupoise weight.

Any geography?—It is very trifling; it is the small books; we have a class of girls who are expressly taught for the nursery to teach children, and those I teach some of the elementary parts of geography, to make them useful when they go into their situations; but that could not be done throughout the school.

The same course of instruction we understand is pursued with regard to all the children in the school?—It is.

They all receive education as Protestants, and attend the chapel belonging to the Establishment?—They do.

Have you reason upon the whole to be satisfied with the capacity and proficiency of the children, taking them upon the average?—Particularly so.

Do you find it easy to preserve discipline in the school?—No difficulty whatever; we scarcely know what punishments are.

Do you ascribe that in some degree to the circumstance that they come to you at so early an age that you have an opportunity of forming their habits?—Some of them are nine and ten years of age, and they come in very obstinate at times, but they see we decide upon good behaviour without punishment; that I think has better effect than punishment; they see also we have a desire for their good rather than to punish them, and by that means they leave off their obstinacy.

Upon the whole you found that system answer the purpose?—It does; I can controul the whole family as it were by a look.

You employ some of them as monitresses to the rest?—I do.

What number at present have you in that situation?—Eight.

Do you derive material advantage from them?—Yes; each one has the charge of 20 children.

Do you allow any power of punishment to any person except yourself?—No; whatever is done wrong, I have the complaint brought to me, and I manage it myself; but I do not allow others to punish.

Have you had occasion to complain of any of the children, so as to make it necessary to dismiss them from the establishment, since you came?—In two instances.

Was it for any particular vice, or any particular offence committed, or from their general habit?—From natural bad propensities, which would have been injurious to the other children.

Can you state at what age they have been admitted into the house, or what had been their previous situation?—One had been badly situated, through the example of a bad step-mother, and I believe she came to the house at the age of nine years; and in the other case, she was I believe illegitimate, no friends could be found belonging to her, and the responsible person was dead; she was exceedingly ill disposed, and exceedingly vicious in her habits.

Of course you were apprehensive that they would affect the others?—We tried them two years before the Board received the complaint to dismiss them, when it was found impossible to be of any service to them to remain longer in the Institution. One went to live with her sister in the country; and the other, Mrs. Latouche apprenticed, with a premium, in a very steady family; and the accounts they give are, that they hope she will do well.

How long is it since the latter girl was dismissed from the house?—They were both dismissed November twelve month.

Have you had any children attempt to escape from the establishment?—Never.

What degree of intercourse is permitted to them with their relations or others, who are desirous to visit them?—They are permitted to visit them on the board day, which is the first of the month.

Is that permission given to any person who applies?—Only to their friends or relations; those who are known by the children as their friends.

Do you find, in most instances, some persons to make inquiry after them?—Yes.

Are they not received from all parts of Ireland?—They are.

We understand that most, if not all of them, are apprenticed as servants?—They are.

What is the period of the indenture?—From two to five years.

Do they ever go out for a shorter period than two years?—Not shorter than two years.

Are the children in general healthy?—Very healthy.

What

What opportunities of exercise have they in the open air?—In fine weather they are out in the play ground from half-past one till two, and from half-past two to three, half an hour being occupied for dinner. They are in the play ground in fine weather; there is a play room for them in bad weather.

Have you any in the sick room or hospital?—No, we have not.

Is there any disease prevalent among them more than another?—No; we never have had fevers.

Is there a regular dietary appointed?—There is.

We understand that the establishment at present is full?—Yes.

Of how many does it consist?—One hundred and sixty-eight.

Have you had any applications lately for admissions which you could not grant?—We have; we have three upon the list now.

In what situations of service do they most frequently engage?—In the nursery.

Are they instructed also in other branches of housewifery?—For housemaids; for the kitchen and for the dairy.

Have you a dairy belonging to the establishment?—Yes.

Of what extent?—Eight cows.

Is that sufficient to supply what is wanted in the house?—Yes; we find the milk of one cow not more than enough for twenty-one children.

Do you make any butter?—We disposed of butter the last year to the amount of 59*l.*; the children do not eat butter.

Are all the children, whose age qualifies them for it, instructed in those different branches of house service?—Yes; there is but one servant kept in the house, which is the cook.

Mention how many you engage in the kitchen, how many in the house work, and how many in the dairy?—Eight for the laundry, one for the dairy, three for the kitchen, two for the dining room, and seven for the dormitories, which seven are in school all the day, their work being done early in the morning.

How long do the same girls continue in those different occupations?—They are changed weekly; they continue weekly in their situations.

Do you conceive that the experience they have had in the establishment is sufficient to qualify them for those respective employments when they go out of the house?—I do; they are generally found to be quite as capable when they go out, as many servants who have been living out for some time.

In what classes of society do they generally engage, or is there any distinction?—There is no distinction; inquiry is made as to the respectability of the family to whom they are recommended, but there is no distinction.

Do the applications only come from those who want the servants, or do you apply for them?—No, applications are always made; clergymen are very anxious for them.

You have no difficulty in procuring situations?—None; I refused one yesterday.

Is one girl sufficient to manage a dairy of that extent?—With the assistance of the cook; but four others are appointed to milk the cows; the one girl does the dairy business only.

The four are not exclusively so employed?—No, they are employed besides.

Do you frequently hear of them after they have left the house?—We hear of them very often; they have a great attachment to the house after they leave it; there is scarcely a week but we hear from some of them. The families they live with are all anxious that they should keep up a communication with the house.

Do they return sometimes after their services have been completed, to inform you of it?—If they do well they do so.

Do they receive any premium?—Not from the house; only five guineas for their service from their mistress.

Can you state whether or not this premium of five guineas has, in the majority of instances, been received?—Generally received.

Of course it depends upon their conduct, whether they receive it or not?—It does; it is a very rare instance that it is not received.

Of course there must be cases where you have not an opportunity of knowing what becomes of them, if they go to a distant part of the country; are they generally apprenticed out in Dublin, or in the neighbourhood of Dublin?—In general; or to families well known to the Board, if sent to a distance.

Have you had applications from a distance?—We have an application now from a distance, but I believe it will not be granted, because the Board does not know sufficient of the family.

What medical attendance is given to the establishment?—A physician, Dr. Orpen, who is paid from the house, and he regularly comes once a week, but if we require him, we send off for him immediately; there is a surgeon also who attends, but he is not paid, his attendance is gratuitous; surgeon Hewson.

What is the greatest age of any of the girls at present in the house?—Unless there is any particular cause for their remaining, they go out at seventeen and eighteen; we have four in the house who cannot be recommended for situations on account of defect of intellect and bodily health.

How do you dispose of them?—We employ them in the house.

In working?—In working.

Are the girls in general able, from their age and strength, to go through the different work appointed for them in the house, before they leave it?—Quite so.

Appendix, N° 45.

Examination of
Miss
Sarah Stephens,
27 January 1826.

Such as washing and the work of the laundry?—Yes.

Do you make use of any machinery for washing?—No, plain washing.

Have you ever tried any, or the use of steam?—There is no machinery made use of; it being generally considered that the girls having the assistance of machinery were not so well calculated to go into a family where there is no assistance. Steam was tried, but was given up, through having proved inconvenient, and perhaps dangerous; so that the manner of teaching them is as plain as possible, that they may be useful in families.

Mrs. Latouche takes the particular charge, we understand, of this Institution?—She does.

Does she attend at the regular periods of the meetings?—She does; and she has an account of every child's conduct sent to her every Saturday, marked by myself, by which means she can trace the conduct of each one in the house for a great number of years back.

Has Mrs. Latouche taken an interest in the charge of the establishment since its commencement?—From the commencement; she never ceased.

What other ladies are in the habit of attending?—Miss Boyle, Mrs. Fowler, Miss Bolton, and a great many of the governesses, when in town, occasionally.

Have you children of Roman Catholics, as well as others?—Yes.

Do you know them?—When they come in we know them, but we make no distinction whatever in them; if they do not know the Lord's prayer, we teach them that the first thing, but if they do know it, we begin with the orphan's prayer. Many come in who do not know the Lord's prayer.

[The Witness delivered in the Form of Prayer.]

Are many of them quite unacquainted with it?—Very many are.

Do you find many come in who have received no religious instruction of any kind?—Yes, none of any kind.

Do the relations of children that were of Roman Catholic families, come to visit them, as well as others?—They do.

You have mentioned that you do not find the children difficult to manage or to submit to discipline?—No.

Or liable to much vice or immorality?—Nothing of the kind.

How do you find them with respect to their moral feelings and affections, that they are open to kindness, and sensible of it?—Particularly so.

Do they shew an attachment to you?—Generally they do.

Do they seem to feel it generally to the managers and governors that are most attentive to the conduct of the Institution, for instance, to Mrs. Latouche, who takes so particular an interest in it?—Most particularly so.

They have expressed it in your presence?—Yes; if they should hear that there was any illness in Mrs. Latouche's family, you would not hear the sound of a voice in any mirth, until they knew the cause was removed; and even if the assistant should be ill, I have only to mention it, and there is quietness immediately, from the idea of kindness.

Most easy to manage, in consequence of that?—Yes, I have found them more susceptible of kindness than the English children.

When Mrs. Latouche and the other ladies visit the school, they shew their attachment by their manner?—Yes.

Without any restraint?—Yes, without the least restraint.

Does Mr. Knox continue to be frequent in his attendance?—Very frequent; he is particularly anxious for the welfare of the establishment.

Are you in the practice of giving any rewards or premiums to the children?—No, it was considered unnecessary, excepting to the monitresses; they are rewarded for their attention to the children under their care.

Was it apprehended that it would produce little feelings of jealousy?—It might do so.

What is the general nature of the instruction they receive in needle-work, to what extent is it carried?—All kinds of plain work and baby linen.

What emolument has the assistant mistress, Miss Graham?—Forty guineas per annum.

Is that a fixed sum?—It is.

She also resides in the house?—Yes.

Does Mr. Dickinson occasionally visit the school at other times besides the two days of regular attendance?—He does.

Do you find in general that the children are apt to learn and receive their instructions?—Some of them very quick, and others very dull.

Are you in the practice of explaining to them what they learn or to explain the meaning of the words?—I examine them to know that they understand what they read.

You mentioned in one of your late answers, that you found that the affections of the children were particularly warm and susceptible, more so than you have experienced in other countries?—Yes.

Have you formed the same impression as to the capacity of instruction as to their intellect?—Much quicker for their age.

What period of time would you consider necessary to teach one of those children to read from the commencement till they were capable of reading to your satisfaction, a child of moderate average capacity?—Three months.

Do you mean from the beginning of the spelling?—From the beginning.

To read a common book?—Not a child of five years old, but a child of seven or eight years old, in about three months she would be able to read.

To

To read to your satisfaction?—In a book of first reading; then of course I would give her more than one hour's instruction in a day; I have some children nine years old particularly clever.

How long have they been under instruction?—About two years.

You consider them as very good readers?—Yes, they read and write well on a slate.

Do you find much difficulty in giving them a proper tone and accent in reading?—With some of them there is a difficulty, and with others there is no difficulty.

Have they generally formed habits of pronouncing?—Some of them come with a very great brogue, but we have very little of it in the house.

Where was Miss Graham taught the school system?—At the Central School by Dr. Bell.

Examination of Alexander Knox, Esq.; Saturday, 28th January 1826.

WE understand that you have taken a considerable interest in the Female Orphan School, and have done so for some time?—I have been a governor of the Female Orphan house between fifteen and sixteen years.

Was that since the establishment of the Institution?—No; the Institution commenced about the year 1790, and I did not become a governor till the month of January 1809.

You have looked after its interests uniformly since that time?—I have not omitted any opportunity of assisting it. From my first acquaintance with it, I have been deeply impressed with its importance and utility as a public institution.

Mention generally what the object and purpose of the Institution are?—The object of the Institution is to rescue female children, who have lost both father and mother, from the extreme misery to which they would otherwise be exposed; to take parental care of them, and to introduce them as happily as possible into life, by training them in principles of religion and virtue, and in habits of industry and obedience.

Is the circumstance of a child being deprived of father and mother, sufficient alone to recommend it to the charity, or is enquiry made into the means of support the child would receive from relations or otherwise?—This latter circumstance is certainly not overlooked; but generally the state of the case is apparent upon the face of the application. The child in most instances is brought by the nearest connections after the father and mother; and those persons generally belonging to the more industrious and decent poor, it is scarcely to be supposed that they would offer their relative for admission into a public charity, if they were able themselves to support it. The feeling of pride which is natural in those cases, and which I think is common in Ireland, would prevent their making such a proposal, unless there was a necessity for it. At the same time, we do not rest in this probability, if any suspicious circumstance seems to require particular investigation.

Do you conceive that there is a general repugnance even among the lower classes in Ireland, to apply for the benefit of a public charity?—I suppose such a feeling prevails towards the more common charitable asylums for youth, because I have known it considered as a reproach to have been bred at such an establishment. In speaking of persons who had been so educated, a nick name is applied. It is said, "Oh, such a one is a Parisheen;" which I take to be a corruption of the French word Paroissienne.

Does that term apply to any particular public charity?—I suppose in practice, it is applied indiscriminately to those who have been bred at public charity schools, but the term I presume was taken more particularly from parish schools, and that religious prejudices led to its being made a term of reproach.

What precautions are taken to ascertain the real situation of the child before its admission into the Institution?—Some respectable person must give a bond for 50 l. payable to the Institution, if it be discovered that the child has either father or mother living. I have brought the form of recommendation which I think will best exemplify our caution in admitting children.

(Witness.)—Considering our Institution, not as an asylum for paupers, but as a place of education for those who could not otherwise be made useful members of society, we are very attentive to the competent capability of those who are admitted into it.

Is it part of your regulations that if a child should be found to be afflicted with any permanent disease, that incapacitates it for useful purposes, to return it?—Every child is received on the express condition that she shall be returned to her recommender, on its being found that she is afflicted with any such malady.

In what persons or body is the management of the Establishment vested?—The management is vested in a body of governors and governesses, incorporated by Act of Parliament in the year 1800. Many persons were named governors and governesses in that Act, and to the survivors of these are to be added such persons as have been since elected at meetings consisting of three governors, the incorporating Act having given the power of electing to that number. But although our corporation is still numerous, our meetings are not numerously attended, at least since I became a governor; but I have the less lamented this circumstance, because in point of fact no charitable institution could have been watched over with more unremitting care. I may say, that the Female Orphan House is inexpressibly indebted to the long continued and indefatigable attention of its vice president, Mrs. Peter La Touche.

Is it not probable that some of the governors, finding that the management was vested in such able hands, may have thought it on that account less necessary to give their attendance?—That consideration no doubt has had its effect; but I think the small attendance chiefly arises from another cause. This Institution was originally established by persons of station and fortune, and its active patrons were, with few exceptions, of that class, which, in consequence of the Union, have almost wholly ceased to reside in Dublin. Thus the Female Orphan House has lost nearly all its early friends, while there have been scarcely any others of a like description coming forward to supply their room. At the same time, while we are happy to find individuals who are disposed to act cordially along with us, we deem it prudent to abstain from needlessly extending our present list of members, lest by want of caution in this respect, the plans which we have digested to the best of our knowledge and are practising to the utmost of our power, might be warped and traversed, and new plans and principles introduced in their stead.

What is the usual attendance of governors at the stated meetings?—Usually, but a few attend. The largest meeting I remember for years consisted of nine; at another time, when a meeting of seven was necessary, it was not easy on a short notice, to get so many.

What is the common and ordinary number of persons who attend to carry on the business?—Three may do all the ordinary business; sometimes there have been four and sometimes five; but I think the number which has attended, has not very often exceeded what was necessary to do regular business.

Do the meetings most generally consist of the same individuals?—Not exactly, but for the most part with little difference. There are some kind friends of the Institution (for instance, the Countess of Farnham, and the honourable Mrs. Fowler), who generally attend when they are in Dublin; and there are others who would be willing to attend, if at any time it were particularly necessary. But three being sufficient to do ordinary business, we conceive it unnecessary to urge a more numerous attendance, except in cases which require a larger Board. At the same time, as the minutes of every meeting are regularly recorded, any governor or governess wishing particularly to know the proceedings, may at any time examine the books, and see all the arrangements which have been made and the measures which have been taken from the commencement to the present day.

Are the buildings the property of the corporation?—The buildings are on land partly held from Lord Palmerston, and partly from the Earl of Rathdowne; the nature of the tenure I cannot exactly state; but it may be learned from the registrar. The buildings have been latterly enlarged; the cause was, that the house being originally built for only one hundred orphans, when an hundred and sixty were thronged together within the same precincts, not only inconvenience was felt, but danger to the health of the children was apprehended; when therefore the building of the chapel was undertaken, it was thought best to make one work of the whole. A wing was accordingly added to the house, which has made the accommodation proportionate to the increased number of inmates, and the expense appears to be fully compensated, as I believe few public institutions are so completely healthy, as the Female Orphan House.

The chapel and the additional building were erected by the Society were they not?—There was aid granted for three successive years by Parliament; the difficulties in the public finances then occurred, and the aid was discontinued. Mr. Peel, at that time Chief Secretary of Ireland, was requested to give an opinion whether we should not apply to the completion of the work (which was now too far advanced to be relinquished) certain property of the Institution, vested in the public funds, the interest of which had been applied annually to the support of the Establishment; and he appeared to think that the work having been commenced under the encouragement of assistance from Parliament, which unforeseen difficulties had impeded and made hopeless, under the circumstances it only remained for us to apply our funds to the completion of the buildings.

By drawing upon your funds in the way you have mentioned, that diminished the annual income?—That consequence, of course, followed; but the work was felt to be indispensable, and not least so the chapel. At all times it had been a difficult matter to lead the children on Sundays to a parish church, but when the number grew to 160, the conducting them through the streets was attended not only with much difficulty but with such hazards as to reduce us to the alternative of withholding them from public worship, or of having a place of worship attached to the Institution. To remedy this otherwise insuperable difficulty, the building of a chapel was undertaken.

By what means were you enabled to carry on your annual expenditure after the diminution of your fund?—Parliament has given us an annual grant, for which I think we are much indebted to the countenance always shewn to the Female Orphan House by the Irish Government.

When was the grant renewed after having been suspended?—The annual grant for support never was suspended; it was the aid for the new buildings which I stated to have ceased. The annual grant never was suspended from the time when it commenced under the Marquis Cornwallis.

Has the amount of the grant been the same, or has it varied annually?—It has varied according to the price of the different articles needed for the Institution.

You give in an estimate of the expected expenses?—We do; I have brought copies of two estimates, one of the year that is past and the other for the year which is now commencing.

Can you state what was the amount from Government for the year ending the 5th of January 1826?—The aid granted was 1,761 l. being the amount of the deficiency of funds as appearing on the estimate.

Be so good as to mention what is the amount of your estimated expense for the year now begun?—£. 2,680. 4*s.*, and our annual funds being calculated at 813 l. 17*s.* 1*d.* the deficiency for which we have applied to Parliament is 1,866 l. 6*s.* 11*d.*

Could you state what is the average amount of donations and subscriptions?—The donations and subscriptions, excepting the gracious donation of 100 l. per annum from His Majesty, have fallen almost to nothing. The Institution sometimes receives a small legacy, but the collection at the annual sermon has fallen from above 1,000 l. to less than 200 l. As I said, our early benefactors have almost wholly passed away, and multiplied calls for contribution, which are more popular as having at least the stimulus of greater novelty, have still farther diminished the current of bounty which used formerly to flow towards this charity.

We observe, from the estimate for the current year, that 184 l. 10*s.* is included in the fund as the produce of a charity sermon, was that preached in the chapel belonging to the Institution?—Our charity sermon is always preached in St. Peter's church. Our chapel would not contain a sufficient congregation. The Archdeacon of Dublin permits us to have the use of St. Peter's.

Have you had any addition to your permanent funds recently?—We received a large donation two or three years ago, either from or through the Viscountess Cremorne: it amounted to 1,680 l. British. I understand also that our Institution is to receive 1,000 l. Irish from the property of the late Dr. Barrett of Trinity college, Dublin.

Are there any officers of the Institution, besides the chaplain, the superintendant, and the assistant schoolmistress, who receive salaries?—The chaplain, the registrar, the matron and her assistant, the singing mistress (who is also organist), and the physician, receive salaries. A stipend is paid to the sexton of the chapel, with wages to one female servant, and to the labourers who work the farm.

Is the singing mistress employed for the sole purpose of teaching singing?—For teaching psalmody and playing on the organ at divine service. It appeared to us that the chapel would not answer its purpose, if it had not the external appearance and suitable appointments of a regular place of Church of England worship; we considered that children are most likely to be trained to devotional habits, by associating religion in a proper measure with what is naturally engaging and impressive, and that external circumstances should as much as possible be made conducive to this effect. We therefore chose that stile of building which appeared to us most suitable to our Church of England service. On the same principle we resolved to have an organ, which we endeavoured to procure with as little expense as possible to the Institution. Mrs. Latouche had a hundred pounds to dispose of, given by the late Mr. John Latouche,* which she thought she could not apply more usefully; one of the governors gave 50 l. The organ cost 300 l. or 300 guineas, but it was thought that the contributions at the chapel might fairly go to the liquidation of what remained, until the payment was completed.

Do you recollect what might be the expense of building the chapel?—Between 6,000 l. and 6,500 l.

Are the pews in the chapel appropriated to particular people?—The pews in the lower part of the chapel are open to the public. I do not believe there have been any proposals for taking pews, and we considered that it was best to leave them open in order to induce a congregation. We had reason to think that the Orphan House chapel might be convenient to several respectable persons in the neighbourhood, and it seemed to us that a small emolument was of less importance than a competent congregation.

But no payments are made for the pews so as to make a fund?—The pews yield nothing except the amount of the collections, which are always made on Sundays, and which I am sorry to say are less than might in reason be expected.

Is the house full at present?—The house is always kept full; for though there are continual calls upon us for girls, there are continual offers of children to be received. A few of the girls, I believe, not above three or four, have long remained in the house, being through weak health or other inefficiency not qualified for any service. These, of course, are are burdens upon the Institution; but we have since learned to be more cautious than ever in our admissions. Every child when proposed is examined by the physician or surgeon, or both; and a child will not be received if there be not a fair prospect of both her bodily and mental competency. In this and in every instance, Mrs. Latouche has been exercising her best judgment for the interests of the Institution during thirty years; and while she has ever been on her guard against theoretical experiments, she has studiously adopted every practical improvement which her experience suggested and her reason approved. But I must not express what I feel on this subject, lest I should cause annoyance where I could least intend it; I will therefore only remark, that as Mrs. Latouche has been the best of parents to the female orphans, they too have always appeared to regard her with filial attachment; it has seemed as if the vacancy left in their hearts by the loss of their natural parents had been thus filled up, and that those tender affections, which might otherwise have lain dormant, have been revived and kept in exercise toward their truly parental benefactress. I must also say, that the kindly feelings which have been thus excited, appear to have become both in superintendants and in children the ruling spirit of the house; and I very much ascribe to the habits of mind formed by this training that the female orphans have given such general satisfaction in domestic situations.

Is the feeling of gratitude and affection general towards Mrs. Latouche?—It must be supposed that among 160 children some will have more sensibility and some less, but I really think that the children exhibit in this and in every instance as much of the good qualities of human nature as could be expected in this imperfect world: it seems to me that we have had as much success in forming the young female character for humble life as could have been reasonably anticipated in the existing state of society.

It is your opinion, therefore, that the result has been highly satisfactory?—In my opinion it has been highly satisfactory.

Have you the means of knowing, that in the majority of cases the girls who have been educated at the Institution have turned out well in after life?—In my opinion they have turned out as well as we could in any reason have reckoned upon, allowing for the weaknesses of human nature, and the common hazards of the world. I think our expectations could not have been more satisfactorily fulfilled.

Have you had intimations to that effect from families in which the girls have gone?—Very frequently.

Have there been instances where a person who has received one of the girls from the Orphan House has afterwards made application for more?—This also has happened very frequently, and such persons have often recommended to their friends to procure servants from the Female Orphan House. I would remark, that to fit the girls for usefulness in such situations, is particularly kept in view in the economy of the house. For instance, there is but one servant, the cook; the whole work, therefore, of the house, including all the washing, and the business of the dairy, is done by the girls; and in order that they may be trained to regularity of habits, and continual attention to their conduct, an exact report of the behaviour of each individual is transmitted to Mrs. Latouche every week, so that they all feel, that though she is at some miles distance, they are always virtually under her inspection; and I am persuaded they are greatly influenced by the fear of giving Mrs. Latouche pain, and by the prospect of her approbation.

You have stated the very important advantages afforded to this Institution by the personal exertions of Mrs. Latouche; is it not your opinion, therefore, that without such individual exertions the same results could scarcely have been expected, and, in the ordinary management of this kind of Institution, more than could be looked for?—I am afraid that such must be my general opinion, and I would add, that although the Female Orphan House has arrived at something which appears like mechanical regularity, we could not expect the same results if we had been less exact or less happy in our choice of matron. In every way I think our Institution appears to have been singularly favoured by Divine Providence, and therefore I could not make the Female Orphan House a standard for calculating the success generally of similar establishments.

Have the governors reason to be satisfied with the officers connected with the establishment in general?—In my opinion they have great reason. Our registrar has been a devoted friend and benefactor to the Institution from its commencement, as well as one of the most efficient men of business I ever knew. Our chaplain, I think, is a most excellent and useful man. Our matron is every thing that we could wish. Her assistant (who particularly superintends the needle-work) gives very great satisfaction, and I cannot help adding, that the steady and proper attention of eight senior girls, who act as subordinate teachers, contributes not a little to the good order of the house.

Is the method of treatment pursued by the matron, and the discipline in the house and in the school, such as you approve of, particularly alluding to the circumstance of any correction or punishment that may be necessary to inflict on the children?—I conceive the matron to be such a person, both in moral and religious principles, and in natural dispositions, as could be no other than humane and kind, though at the same time exercising sufficient firmness. She is nevertheless so modest and sober-minded, that I am sure she would not resort to any severe measure, without first consulting Mrs. Latouche; and upon the whole, her conduct towards the children appears so much to have excited both respect and affection, that cases calling for severity are, I believe, of rare occurrence. It may be right, however, for me to state, that the cordial feelings which I am ascribing to our orphans are by no means of recent origin. I already mentioned the sense of shame likely to be felt by young persons bred in charitable institutions, but during many years we have had a pleasing proof, that the Female Orphan House creates no such apprehension. It is always observed, that at the annual charity sermon, when the children walk into church, such of the girls as are at service in Dublin, or its near neighbourhood, come regularly for the purpose of walking into church with them, as if they felt it an honor to have been connected with the Female Orphan House. I have often seen them, from their number, form an interesting group at the rear of the procession.

Have you found in general, that the children retain their health well in the house?—I should think more so than in most large private families. The Female Orphan House could never be deemed unhealthy; but I think it has become more remarkably healthy of late, not only from the enlarged building, but also from increased care not to admit children of whose soundness of constitution any doubt has been expressed by our attentive and skilful physician, or by a most respectable surgeon of this city, who has given his assistance gratis.

Have you no means of admitting a greater number than at present in the house?—No; our present means would not support any greater number.

Has there been any accession to their number lately?—Yes; on His Majesty's graciously granting a donation of 100*l.* a year, the number was increased from 160 to 168.

You of course receive children of all religious persuasions into the house?—When children are brought to us as orphans, and are in all other respects admissible, we do not make any difference on account of the religion of their parents. It is known by those who bring them, that as they are to be, to all intents, children of our family, they must consequently be educated in our religion. We never invite any to commit their infant relatives to our care; and we have no concern but to perform, to the best of our skill and power, the work of Christian charity which we have undertaken.

All of them are educated as Protestants of the Established Church?—Yes; and that (as I have just said) is a fact known before hand to all who offer children for admission. It is our wish and object to educate them as members of the Church of England, religiously but not controversially; we consider that they may probably go into families where they must live with Roman Catholic servants; while therefore we are solicitous to attach them, practically and affectionately to the Church of England, we wish as much as possible to attain this object, without introducing into their young minds any seeds of religious animosity.

You instil into them a knowledge of the truth, but do not suggest to their minds the controversial differences that prevail between different bodies?—Exactly so; and for this farther reason, because many of them, being children of Roman Catholic parents, the dwelling expressly upon Roman Catholic errors might preserve the recollection of their parents religion in their minds, and hence they might be more disposed to relapse into that religion at a future day than by avoiding all controversial modes of instruction, and by endeavouring simply to train them in the positive principles and duties of our own pure and practical religion.

Are the children sometimes admitted at an age which enables them to have previously formed their religious opinions in any degree?—We are cautious in that particular; and except there are circumstances, which on grounds of humanity, make the case imperative, we do not wish to receive a Roman Catholic child after six or seven years old; we conceive that before that age there will probably be no lasting impression; but when the child is more than between six and seven, we are attentive to discover whether her religious professions may not be such as to prevent her imbibing the principles and habits of our church.

Would you feel anything of the same reluctance towards Protestant dissenters, or think it necessary to do so?—That is a question which I do not think we ever had occasion to consider; but I do not believe we should feel equal need of caution, for however important we conceive the distinction to be, between the principles of Protestant dissenters and those of the Established Church, we should think the transition from the former to the latter, especially in young minds, much more easy than from the Roman Catholic religion to that of our church. In the children of Protestant dissenters, there would be little if anything of a positive nature to be effaced, however much to be introduced. In Roman Catholic children, after a certain age, there would be much to be effaced and it might be too late to efface it.

SEVENTH REPORT
THE COMMISSIONERS

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR MAJESTY:

WE, the undersigned Commissioners, nominated and appointed by a Commission under the Great Seal, bearing date the Fourteenth day of June, One thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, beg leave humbly to report, as follows:—

Royal Cork Institution.

WE should not, perhaps, have considered this Establishment as falling strictly within the scope of our Inquiries, or have made it the subject of investigation, if a strong desire had not been expressed in different quarters upon the subject, and particularly in the following Memorial transmitted to us from the Managers of the Institution.

To the Honourable His Majesty's Commissioners of Inquiry into the State of Education in Ireland.

The Memorial of the Managers of the Royal Cork Institution.

Sheweth,

THAT His Majesty having been graciously pleased to appoint you His Commissioners "to inquire into the nature and extent of the Instruction afforded by the several Institutions in Ireland, and maintained either in whole or in part by the public funds, &c."

That your Memorialists, in conformity with His Majesty's most gracious Commission, humbly entreat that you will be pleased to inquire into and report upon the state of the Royal Cork Institution, which was incorporated by Royal Charter, "for diffusing the knowledge and facilitating the general introduction of all improvements in Arts and Manufactures, especially Agriculture, and for teaching by Courses of Public Lectures and Experiments the application of Science to the common purposes of Life."

That your Memorialists have the honour to transmit you a Copy of the Charter and Bye Laws of the Institution; and have hereunto affixed the Seal of the Corporation, this 1st day of November 1824.

Signed on behalf of the Managers,

E. Davy,
Secy.

Tho^s Cuthbert, V. P.
W^m Beamish, V. P.

Having necessarily visited Cork, in reference to other objects, we deemed it expedient to comply with this request.

This Establishment appears to have been originally founded by the Rev. Mr. Hincks, a highly-respected Schoolmaster of Cork, who induced a few gentlemen of that city to subscribe for the purchase of philosophical apparatus, with a view to illustrate Lectures delivered by him to his pupils and others at his private residence.

A Charter of Incorporation was granted to this Society on the 20th March 1807, in the 47th year of George the 3d, on the petition of some of the principal Gentlemen of Cork, to the Duke of Bedford, at that time Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

The persons whose names were subscribed to the petition were by charter constituted a Corporate Body by the name of "the Proprietors of the Cork Institution," and were appointed Managers for the first year, with power to acquire property to the annual value of 500 l.

A set of bye-laws was framed, providing for the election of a President, Secretary, and thirty Managers, of whom the two former, and one third of the latter, were to be chosen annually at a general Meeting of the Proprietors, to be held in the course of the autumn. Another General Meeting was also appointed to be held in the spring of each year. A Proprietor's qualification was fixed at thirty guineas (the number of Proprietors being unlimited), in consideration of which they become entitled to a personal and transferable right of free admission to the different objects of the Institution, and to various other privileges. The subscription of a life-member was fixed at fifteen guineas, and of an annual subscriber at three guineas: both of these classes enjoy the particular rights and privileges of Proprietors, as they are specified in the bye-laws.

Soon after the establishment of the Institution, Professors were appointed, and Lectures given in Natural Philosophy, Chemistry, Natural History and Agriculture. It was provided by the bye-laws that the united salaries of the Professors should not exceed one third of the funds of the Institution, nor the salary of any one exceed 100 l. per annum. Sums were appropriated for the purchase of suitable Philosophical Apparatus, Models of useful Machinery in every Art and Manufacture, and the most improved Implements of Husbandry. A Library was commenced, to be supported in part from special subscriptions, and in part by grants from the Funds of the Institution. A collection of Minerals was purchased, and a Botanic Garden established. These, with the appropriation of certain grants and subscriptions (not exceeding one third of the whole funds), to the purposes of Agriculture, under the superintendence of a Committee and Secretary, to act in concert with the several Country Farming Societies, constituted the objects of the Institution.

The four Professors are—first, Dr. Taylor, Lecturer on Natural History, who receives an annual salary of 100 l. Irish. He delivers a course of Lectures, which comprehends the sciences of Botany, Mineralogy, Geology and Zoology. It consists generally of twenty-four Lectures, which commence in April, and are given twice a week during two or three months. Dr. Taylor holds also the situation of general Superintendent of the Institution, for which he has a salary of 100 l. Irish per annum. He has lately undertaken to discharge gratuitously the duties of Secretary and Under Treasurer, for which Mr. Davy, until his resignation in 1826, received 150 l. per annum, which has been withdrawn in consequence of the reduction of the Parliamentary Grant.

Second,—The Professorship of Chemistry was vacant at the period of our visit of inspection, by the removal of Mr. Edmund Davy to the Royal Society of Dublin. The salary attached to it is 100 l. a year, Irish. The Lectures generally commence in October.

Third,—Dr. James Willes, M. D. is Lecturer on Natural Philosophy, and receives an annual salary of 100 l. Irish. In the course of the year, beginning either in March or June, he gives twenty-four or twenty-six Lectures on Optics, Mechanics, Hydrostatics, Electricity, and Astronomy.

The attendance on the three foregoing Classes is represented to us as being very numerous, and the Lectures which are given in the morning, are repeated in the evening by each Professor to another class.

Fourthly,

Fourth,—Mr. George Tisdall is the Lecturer on Agriculture, and has 100 l. a-year Irish, in consideration of which he now discharges also the duties of Agricultural Secretary, the salary of 50 l., formerly annexed to that office, having been lately withdrawn. He commences his course in May, and gives one Lecture in each of fifteen weeks. These Lectures are not repeated in the evening. The attendance is much less numerous at these Lectures than at those of the other Professors.

The Department of practical Agriculture is under the direction of a separate Committee and Secretary, who are in correspondence and connection with the different Branch Farming Societies in the county, to which they make annual grants, proportioned to the amount of their respective subscriptions. The sums granted are applied in aid of their premiums. These grants formerly amounted to 500 l. a year, but have been latterly much reduced. The number of local Agricultural Societies, in connection with the Cork Institution, has declined from ten to six. As this branch of the Institution is distinct from that which has public instruction for its object, we shall abstain from any further detail respecting it.

The delivery of the various courses of Lectures, which we have already noticed, appears to be at once the most successful and important part of the Institution; its good effects are described by all the witnesses whom we have examined on the subject:—Dr. Taylor says, that his “morning course is usually attended by “persons of a higher order, and the evening lectures by commercial persons or “shopkeepers.” The same observation is applicable to the other classes, with exception of the agricultural. Some of the senior boys from the Schools in Cork attend the Lectures of the Institution.

Appendix,
N° 1.

The Lecture Room can accommodate about 200 persons, and is described as being generally full.

In speaking of the results of the Lectures, Mr. Cuthbert, one of the original Managers of the Institution, “thinks they have been attended with great utility in “the town; they are very much attended by ladies particularly, and by scientific “men; in fact, almost every man that wishes to improve himself attends either “morning or evening.” He also adds that he considers this branch of the Institution “as a place of education very much for the improvement of the younger “inhabitants of Cork.” Mr. Lecky, another of the original promoters of this Society, gives his opinion “that the Institution has done incalculable benefit to the “city and neighbourhood of Cork,” and “has raised a spirit of inquiry among “the middling classes, particularly with respect to science, that he thinks has been “of great benefit to them, and to the community at large.”

Appendix,
N° 2.

The testimony of several other witnesses might be quoted to the same effect.

In 1818, an attempt was made to extend the operation of the Institution by the appointment of Professors of Mathematics and Moral Philosophy, but though the general impression seems to have been in favour of the addition, it failed from insufficiency of funds for the purpose.

It was at one time proposed, and had been originally contemplated by the bye-laws, that some small amount of payments should be taken from persons attending the Lectures. But Dr. Taylor informed us, that “the Proprietors having the right “of transferring their tickets, being 204 in number, and transferring their tickets “to the morning as well as the evening lectures, the Public in fact had about “408 tickets in a day, and there could be but few remaining who would not have “it in their power to obtain a ticket, and the number became so very small that it “was resolved not to take money for admission.” In addition to the Proprietors tickets, the lecturers have the privilege of issuing them to applicants; and the witnesses generally seem to doubt, whether, in case the Proprietors waved their right of transfer, there would be found any considerable number of persons who would be willing to pay even a very moderate sum for admission; and they think that the attendance on the lectures would in all likelihood fall off very considerably in consequence of any such charge.

Connected with the Institution is a Botanic Garden, situated in the neighbourhood of Cork, and under the care of Mr. James Drummond, who receives 180 l. a year for finding coals, labour, and every thing that is required for the garden; he has also the privilege of disposing of the duplicate plants. The ground consists of nearly six Irish acres, of which only four are now cultivated for botanical purposes; between one and two acres have been turned into a nursery garden and shrubbery. Mr. Drummond supplies the botanical professor with specimens of plants, and the agricultural lecturer with samples of the different kinds of grasses, &c. He gives the following account of the present state of his collection:—"We have about 100 different sorts of grasses. We have about 500 hundred native plants that are wanting for the lectures. There are about 2,000 indigenous plants, including those in the twenty-fourth class or Cryptogamia of Linnæus." He subsequently adds, "I must observe that a great change has taken place in my situation within these six or seven years past. I was before merely a servant to the Institution, and my duty was to take care of the property of the Institution. But now the garden has become in some sort a nursery; I am obliged to introduce and cultivate such plants as I can find a demand for: 180 £. would be nothing to keep up a garden of four acres. I am satisfied that 5 or 600 £. a year would be the least sum that would be necessary to keep it up as it should be kept up." To account for this change, it may be necessary to state, that the Managers, finding the cost of the Garden formerly to be so considerable, as to be a heavy burthen on the limited funds of the Institution, were obliged to reduce the expenditure, and place it on its present footing. It has therefore ceased to be, strictly speaking, a Botanic Garden, Mr. Drummond (since the reduction of his allowance) making it as profitable as he can to himself, by the sale of fruit-trees, &c. to the amount of about 100 £. yearly.

From the general appearance of this Garden, its situation remote, from the Institution, and its difficult access, we were led to entertain great doubts as to the expediency of its being continued; and these doubts were materially confirmed by the testimony of persons whom we examined.

Appendix,
N° 3.

Mr. Clear, the Treasurer of the Institution, being examined on this subject, stated, that "a number of the Proprietors have considered it rather an useless attachment to the Institution; others have been of a very different opinion."

Mr. Archdeacon Thompson, however, gives more decided evidence on this head, for he says, "My opinion is, that the Botanic Garden has been a millstone about the neck of the Institution since its first origin, partly arising from its unfortunate situation; and I am inclined to think, that since they contracted for the management of it, its utility has fallen off also."

We are ourselves of opinion that the Institution would on the whole derive advantage from its discontinuance. If the Society wish to establish a Mathematical Professorship, the saving thus effected might perhaps enable them to carry it into effect.

The Library consists of a good collection of scientific publications; to the medical part of which the students of the city and neighbourhood are said to resort with considerable advantage. The selection and purchase of Books is directed by a Library Committee, which is chosen out of the body of Managers. Between two and three hundred pounds are annually laid out on additional works, which sum is partly defrayed by special subscriptions. The hours of admission are from eleven to four. The late Librarian stated to us, that "if the Library could be opened in the evening it would be of the greatest advantage to this commercial city."

N° 1.

The Managers, with a view to the illustration of the Lectures, early turned their attention to the acquiring a Collection of specimens of Natural History. Of this Museum Dr. Taylor the Superintendant speaks as follows:—"When I lecture on Mineralogy there is a very good collection for that purpose; when I lecture on Zoology, the specimens are deficient. We have some presents made occasionally; but we have no funds; and such a collection requires great funds to make it available. But we have a tolerable collection of native Conchology, and a few specimens of Birds and Fishes."

In the Report of the proceedings of the Institution for 1825, the union of "The Royal Cork Society for the Fine Arts," with "The Royal Cork Institution," is stated to have taken place at the recommendation of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; and the collection of Casts, graciously presented by His Majesty to the former Society, has been removed to the Gallery of the Institution. There is also a Philosophical Apparatus for the illustration of the Scientific Lectures.

In the Appendix will be found an Account, furnished by the Treasurer, of the Receipts and Expenditure of the Institution, from its commencement to 1825, inclusive; by which it appears, that the expenditure for the latter year was £.2,168. 14s. 3½d.; the Parliamentary grant was £.2,058. 6s. 8d.; and the amount paid by annual subscribers £.73. 18s. 9d. No money appears to have been received for Proprietors shares during the last five years. But it was stated to us, that those shares, which were originally to be purchased for thirty guineas, are now to be sold for twenty guineas. In compliance with the Bye-laws, a moiety of the amount originally subscribed for shares, viz. £.2,093, was invested in the purchase of £.2,908. 1s. 8d. 3½ per cent government stock.

The House of the Society is situated in the South Mall, Cork, and the lease of it, subject to an annual rent of £.240, was purchased by the Institution in 1811, when a fine of 500 guineas was paid. The Lecture-room, and accommodations in general, are very insufficient for their purposes. The Building is much out of repair, and the Proprietors so dissatisfied with it, that the want of funds seems alone to have prevented their purchasing other premises.

ROYAL CORK INSTITUTION.

Appendix, N^o 1.

Minutes of Evidence taken before the Commissioners of Education Inquiry, at Cork,

MONDAY, 25th September 1826.

Dr. Thomas Taylor, having been sworn, was Examined as follows.

WHAT Situations do you hold in the Cork Institution?—Lecturer on Natural History, Superintendent, Secretary, and Under-Treasurer; the two last offices have only fallen to my share within the last week, in consequence of Mr. Davy having removed to Dublin; he was Secretary and Under-Treasurer.

Were you appointed lecturer on Natural History at the first establishment of this Institution?—No.

When were you appointed?—I was appointed in the end of 1819, and I commenced to lecture in 1820.

Who was your predecessor?—Dr. Fleming was my predecessor as lecturer in Natural History; the managers of the Institution thought proper, in order to gain more respectable Professors, to unite the offices of Lecturer on Natural History and Superintendent. The office of Superintendent having become vacant they advertised an union of the offices, for which I stood, and which I received.

Had you been in the practice of lecturing upon that subject before you were elected here?—Never. I had published upon some subjects in natural history, which, I believe, was my principal recommendation.

Where were you educated?—In Trinity College, Dublin.

What number of rival candidates had you at your election?—I think there were nine.

What persons vote at the election of the Professors?—The Managers only.

What salary have you as lecturer on Natural History?—100*l.* Irish.

Is it a rule of the Institution that no Professor shall have more than 100*l.* Irish?—As lecturer.

What salary have you as superintendent?—100*l.* Irish.

Were you also to have a salary as Secretary?—The Managers have lately, since the departure of Mr. Davy, resolved to do away with the salary of the offices of Secretary and Under-Treasurer, which he held at 150*l.* a year; and I am to receive for doing the duties of the four departments, only what I received before: this is in consequence of the reduction of the Parliamentary Grant.

Are the Commissioners to understand that you take the salary of the two offices you held previously, and do the duties of Secretary and Sub-Treasurer; and that the salary formerly attached to those two offices ceases?—Yes. It is right to mention, that the Managers having made a resolution to commence with the new system in January next, since Mr. Davy would have received 25*l.* for the remaining three months of this year, they have allowed it to me.

Have the goodness to state what duty you discharged as lecturer on Natural History?—My duty is to deliver a course of twenty-four public lectures, to be repeated in the evening of the days; the morning course is usually attended by persons of a higher order, and the evening course by commercial persons and shopkeepers.

Are those twenty-four lectures all you deliver in the year?—Yes; the Professors are each of them I believe; as for myself, I can answer that I am, ready to deliver a longer and more elementary course, if classes could be found to pay for the trouble, but they cannot: the sort of class that Cork furnishes is chiefly that of a public class, and it is difficult to make public lectures interesting beyond the number of twenty-four in any one department.

Have your lectures ever been published?—Never; it is a practice with lecturers not to publish lectures; there was one course of lectures in which I stepped out of the limits prescribed to me by the Bye-laws of the Institution. I was to lecture in mineralogy and botany, and I volunteered one year to lecture both on mineralogy and zoology, and the course of lectures which I delivered on zoology was afterwards delivered verbatim by the Professor of the University of Dublin, professedly as mine, and so far they were published.

Dr.
Thomas Taylor,
25 September,
1826.

Dr.
Thomas Taylor,
25 September,
1826.

Is the duty you have to perform as lecturer on Natural History discharged in twenty-four days?—It is discharged in twenty-four double lectures, but these occupy from two to three months, as they are delivered twice in the week, and sometimes three times in the week.

Are the lectures on natural history repeated, or do you vary any of them?—I lecture one year on botany, another year on mineralogy, and I have sometimes varied it by adding zoology to mineralogy; also different branches of the same subject are taken up in different years; the object of the lecturer is to excite as much interest as possible by varying the department of the science.

What number of persons attend your classes?—It is hard to give more than an average number; the commencement of every course is more fully attended than the end; persons seem to get weary of public lectures when they exceed twenty-four, but the lecture-room holds two hundred, and certainly for more than three fourths of the course it is full, morning and evening. I have known it occasionally to be very empty in consequence either of bad weather, or if it being the termination of a course.

In what way is the distinction between the different classes of the persons that attend morning and evening brought about?—It is entirely voluntary, sometimes the most respectable members of society attend the evening, who have not time to attend the morning, or who have omitted in consequence of some accident.

At what hour do you begin to lecture in the morning?—The usual hour is from two to three in the day-time, and from eight to nine in the evening.

What class of persons both as to age and situation, attend your morning class?—As to situation in life I should call them respectable gentry, and as to age I think they are nearly all adults.

Are they mostly male or female?—There is a very considerable proportion of females.

Should you think that above half are females?—I should think as good as an half, if not above it.

What class of persons generally attend your evening class?—In the evening, I suppose the better description of shopkeepers—that is to say, those who have got a certain degree of education, for to others it would be unintelligible.

Is the proportion of males and females the same?—Perhaps more males attend in the evening than in the morning, because the higher orders of females do not like coming out at night to attend a public class.

Has it ever occurred to you that some moderate payment might be taken from the persons attending lectures of this description?—It was attempted and originally contemplated, I believe, by the bye-laws of the Institution, but the proprietors having the right of transferring their tickets, being 204 in number, and transferring their tickets to the morning as well as the evening lectures, that, in fact, gave to the public 408 tickets in a day; and there could be but few remaining who would not have it in their power to obtain a ticket, and the number became so very small that it was resolved not to take money for admission.

If that right of giving free admission to the lectures were waved on the part of the proprietors, what payment do you think could be required, without materially diminishing the number of persons attending?—I think one guinea for a course the greatest limit; the numbers attending will be inversely as the price of the ticket; but I speak with some hesitation, because I know that in so limited a place as Cork the novelty of lectures is over. After lecturing six or eight years the number who will afterwards pay cannot be very great.

At the time when payment was received, were the lectures attended by many persons through transferable tickets?—I was not myself here at the time, but I understand it was the case that every proprietor took advantage of transferring his tickets.

And that the lectures were constantly attended by persons who had tickets from the proprietors?—Yes.

In point of fact, do the persons who attend now obtain tickets from members, or is the whole thing entirely open to any body who chooses to attend?—In point of fact, they do obtain them from proprietors, and also from the lecturers themselves; they apply to the lecturer, and he uses his discretion whether the person is fit for the lecture-room or not.

Then in order to be admitted to one of your lectures, it is necessary that a person in the first instance should notify it to you that he is desirous of attending, and receive from you a permission to attend?—Yes.

Unless he brings a ticket from a proprietor?—Yes; that admits him of course.

That you have no check upon?—Not the least.

Does a person obtain admission immediately upon presenting a ticket from a proprietor at the door?—Yes.

Of those who attend, do the greater number come in right of tickets, or by permission from yourself?—I think latterly, the greater number have applied to myself, but formerly they came almost entirely with proprietor's tickets. I think I have distributed for the last course of lectures two hundred tickets, independently of the proprietors.

Does a ticket go for the whole course, or for any individual lecture?—For the whole course.

Is it in the power of a member to transfer his ticket to an individual during the Course?—Yes: and to give his ticket to one individual in the morning, and to another in the evening.

His privilege is limited to two tickets in a day?—Yes.

And his own personal attendance besides?—Yes; at least they have never been refused.

Do any young persons, who are in the course of education at schools, or any other institutions existing at Cork, attend the lectures?—About two years ago, I think we were

Dr.
Thomas Taylor,
25 September,
1826.

applied to by the principal schoolmasters of Cork to allow five or six of their senior boys to attend, to which the Managers acceded, and they each got five or six tickets to dispose of in the beginning of the season.

Does that practice continue?—That practice has continued; but latterly it was not satisfactory, as we found the boys made a great deal too much noise. As soon as we conceived they did not derive the benefit that was intended, we thought it better to defer it till they were of a better age.

Of what age were those boys?—I suppose from twelve to fourteen.

There is no such class of persons as subscribers to the lectures, but only proprietors?—Only proprietors: any person has a right to pay for a ticket if he chooses.

When payment was required, what was the sum taken?—One guinea.

Are we to understand you to say that there are four hundred different individuals who attend, more or less, during the classes?—Yes, I suppose so, from the fact of myself having distributed at least two hundred tickets, and the proprietors having distributed theirs; and I also conclude it from the fact of the lecture-room, as well in the morning as in the evening, not being able to hold all that come; the room will not hold more than two hundred.

Does the Museum of the Institution contain the specimens which are necessary for illustrating the subjects you lecture upon?—When I lecture on mineralogy there is a very good collection for that purpose; when I lecture on botany there is a botanical garden that answers all the necessary purposes; when I lecture on zoology the specimens are deficient; we have some presents made occasionally, but we have no funds, and such a collection requires great funds to make it available; but we have a tolerable collection of native conchology, and a few specimens of birds and fishes.

Are there not plates to which you can have reference?—We have abundance of books of plates, and we have recourse to them for want of specimens, but they are never so satisfactory to the class, nor do they make the same impression as specimens.

As being the Professor whose duty it is to lecture upon botany, does the botanic garden fall in any degree under your superintendence?—As superintendent of the botanic garden I am obliged to visit it, and take care that it is in proper order, and that the plants are taken proper care of by the curator of the garden. I mentioned before that the office of superintendent was attached to that of Lecturer on Natural History, in order to increase the salary; but besides that, the duties attached to the office of superintendent were so interwoven with that of professor of natural history that it became necessary to ally them together, for it is the business of the superintendent to arrange all the specimens of natural history given to the Museum.

Does the arrangement and the superintendence of the mineralogical collection fall under your care also?—Entirely; and I have made a new catalogue of them.

In lecturing upon mineralogy are your lectures principally directed to the explanation of minerals, or do you include geology?—Geology is included; but the great object of each course of lectures is to present the practical application of the substances to the purposes of life, for a public class will not bear the mere going over the dry characters of individual substances. When one is lecturing on mineralogy, for instance, on the subject of iron, under that head come the whole of the foundries, and the application of iron to every department of the arts.

You have stated that as superintendent your attention is directed to the collection of specimens of natural history, and to the botanic garden; does it comprehend any other subjects?—It does; in that situation I have to control the current expenses of the Institution; to take care of the property of the Institution; to see that all is in order, to take care that the other officers and servants of the Institution do their duty, and if not, to report to the managers.

You exercise a general superintendence?—Yes.

That applies to all officers whatever, receiving salary under the Institution?—Yes.

The Commissioners see that in the account of the expenditure of the Institution for the year ended the 5th of January 1826, the sum of 172*l.* is accounted for under the head of agriculture; is that expenditure in any way under your superintendence?—It is now, but it was not till within a week ago. It was the under-treasurer who took care that it should be applied to the objects for which the institution intended it.

It appears that 253*l.* 16*s.* was expended upon the botanic garden; was that expenditure under your direction?—It was not under my direction; but I can explain how it was divided, and how it was expended; there was 180*l.* given as a salary to the curator for finding labour of every description, coals for the green-houses, and keeping the plants in order; the rest went to pay the rent of green-houses, repairs, and taxes of the garden itself.

Does the curator perform that by contract?—He performs it by contract; he has besides that, the privilege of selling duplicate plants, but he is strictly bound down to keep up the number originally given to him; indeed he has even increased that number, and to supply the lectures on botany and agriculture with specimens.

Of what land does the garden consist?—Five acres and a half.

Is it held on lease?—It is.

Was a fine paid for the lease?—There was.

Is the garden in your opinion worth the rent paid for it?—I conceive it is, though it might be difficult to get the exact rent for it; but if we were to wish for a botanic garden we would be very glad to get it for the rent we pay; I think we pay about 7*l.* an acre for the land.

What length of lease have you?—985 years.

Dr.
Thomas Taylor,
25 September,
1826.

Does the curator derive any other advantage from the garden than the sale of duplicates?—He receives 180*l.* a year, and with that he must find all the labour, plants, manure, coals, &c. that are requisite.

For what length of time is that contract?—The contract with the curator has diminished gradually from year to year; that contract was entered into two years ago.

For what length of time is it binding?—They have the power of dismissing the curator whenever they please; the curator has no tie upon them whatever.

You conceive they may lower the amount from year to year?—Yes; they are not bound for any specified time; I have reason to suppose that the sale of duplicates is very little indeed.

Has the curator a house?—He has a very small house.

Is he found in coals and candles?—No.

Does the garden contain a valuable collection of plants?—I think it does.

Is there any thing in it that is particularly rare or curious; or are the specimens in it to be found in the garden of Dublin?—I believe every specimen in it would be found in the garden of Dublin, except perhaps a very few things; we have occasionally sent to us seeds from abroad to the garden. I mentioned in the Report that we have a flowering plant that has never been found in Great Britain before; but that is of very rare occurrence.

Is there any other advantage to science derived from the botanic garden than the facility it gives you of obtaining specimens to lecture upon?—Yes, I conceive there is; I conceive it is subsidiary to the Horticultural Society of London, and that it introduces a variety not only of flowering plants, but of fruit trees of the most valuable kinds. The Horticultural Society lately sent over those which they had themselves collected at considerable expense from abroad and different parts of England which have been propagated.

Might not an individual, being a member of that society, obtain them in his own garden?—An individual, being a member of that society, I presume, might; but a very important office of a botanic garden, properly conducted, is to endeavour to naturalize useful foreign plants; we have constantly had an eye to that. All our correspondents have been asked by us to send seeds of those plants that are practically used, and that we thought would bear our climate.

Have you ever succeeded in attaining that object in any degree?—It is an object that has been taken up rather lately, since I joined the Institution. I cannot say that we have succeeded so far as to be able now to recommend plants for application to the purposes of life.

How far is it necessary to resort to specimens from a botanic garden in order to deliver lectures upon botany to a class in such a way that they may derive beneficial instruction?—You must have specimens to illustrate not only all the classes of the artificial system of Linnæus, but also the natural orders; you must have specimens to illustrate the substances from which useful timber and useful fruits, and culinary vegetables, are actually obtained, not only in this country but in others.

Does the ordinary practice of showing specimens, from what is called an hortus siccus, not provide a sufficient means of illustrating lectures on botany?—They are not sufficient to illustrate lectures on botany; they might be sufficient to afford demonstrations to persons sitting round a table, but a class are never satisfied with them, they are not satisfied even with the best plates.

Are not living substances for the most part to be procured in ordinary nursery gardens, without having an establishment for the purpose of furnishing them?—A great number are, but several are not; a great many, perhaps, could be collected in different nurseries, but the nurserymen lay out their capital chiefly in the rearing of plants for mere sale.

Are not those which are most useful and most fit for general purposes to be found in those nursery gardens for sale?—The nurseries confine themselves principally to fruit and timber trees, and to those flowering plants that are most common and most easily propagated.

Are there lectures on botany in Dublin?—There are, by two Professors; there is the garden of the College, and the garden of Glasnevin; the garden of the College is maintained at the private expense of the senior fellows; at an expense of not less than 600*l.* a year. I conceive the Cork garden to be the cheapest establishment of the kind perhaps in Europe, but certainly in the British dominions.

Did it ever occur to you that any mode might be adopted by which either the expenses of the botanic garden might be lessened, or the payment of them assisted,—is there any means by which the garden itself might be turned to any avail, except by selling duplicates of plants?—I never could conceive of any other way; if the garden were in a different situation from what it is, if it were nearer the city, and in some public walk, it would be possible to raise a subscription from those persons who might have the privilege of walking in it, but that is the only other mode I can think of.

Do any other duties than those you have described fall to your charge as superintendent?—Not as superintendent.

If the appointment of lecturer on natural history had been the only one that it was the intention of the managers to bestow upon the candidate, would it have been a sufficient object to induce you to seek for it?—Most undoubtedly not.

Will you describe your duties as sub-treasurer?—There is a treasurer through whom the checks go to the bank, and he has little more to do than that; the duty of the sub-treasurer is to receive and examine all accounts, and to see that the charges are proper, and where he is not agreed about the charge, to report to the managers; to pay all accounts; to pay all bills upwards of 10*l.*, through the treasurer, by check; all checks are drawn in the name

Dr.
Thomas Taylor,
25 September,
1826.

name of the treasurer by the sub-treasurer, and to pay the current expenses of the Institution; to keep an account of vouchers, and to account to the Account Office.

Does any money pass through your hands as sub-treasurer?—Yes, to meet the incidental expenses of the Institution.

Do you retain any of it in your hands?—I must retain some, in order to meet the incidental expenses.

What is the largest amount you ever retain in your hands?—I do not draw until there is some call for money, and I have none in my hands, and merely to save the expense of check-books. I do not draw for less than 20 l., or for more.

Does the treasurer keep any money in hand?—The treasurer keeps no money in his hands, it is lodged in the branch-bank of Ireland. Originally the treasurers were bankers in this town, but private bankers are done away with now.

The office of treasurer is honorary without any emolument?—Yes.

The Commissioners see, that in the account of the expenses of the preceding year, 320 l. were laid out in books, stationery, printing and advertisements; will you state whether you as superintendent had any direction in the selection or purchase of the books?—No; the selection and purchase of books is directed by a library-committee, which is chosen out of the body of managers. Books are recorded in a certain album, or book kept by the proprietors, and they meet so many times in a year, and select out of them such as they think fit for the library, and they order them at once.

Does the same observation apply to stationery?—The stationery does not form a very prominent feature of expense; the summonses are obliged to be sent round, which are printed; there is some paper, pens and ink for the Institution itself.

Do the accounts for books fall under your cognizance?—Yes.

Is it your duty to examine them previously to their being passed?—It is.

383 l. appears to have been paid for rent, taxes, and insurance; will you have the goodness to state to the Commissioners for what that rent is paid?—The rent and taxes are for the premises.

Do you reside on the premises?—I do.

Have you any other advantages than those derived from your salary?—I have my residence for my family; there are also coals and candles found me.

What servants are there living upon the premises of the Institution?—There are two porters and a charwoman, but not living on the premises. During the continuance of the lectures it is absolutely necessary to have two; one to remain at the inner door of the lecture-room, and the other at the outer door of the Institution.

Have they the charge of the different rooms in which the casts and collections are; is it their duty to keep them clean?—It is their duty to keep them partly clean; the charwoman is to wash the rooms down; it is their duty when any dust happens to come there to see them cleaned; they take out summonses for committee-meetings to managers and proprietors, sometimes to considerable distances, and one or other must constantly be in waiting; one of them also acts subsidiary to the chemical professor, assisting him in making preparations; and while he is busy in that it is absolutely necessary to have the other at the doors.

It appears from the accounts of the expenditure that the rent of the house has varied in different years?—It has been diminished within the last two years by the landlord, nearly 100 l. a year, in consequence of the fall of the times, and the Society threatening to go somewhere else if he did not do so.

Has not the Society itself incurred considerable expense by building?—It has.

In what way could they compel the landlord to reduce the rent?—Because they were perfectly aware that no other person would give the same rent.

Have the Society the power of giving up the lease if they wish it?—I conceive they have.

Has not the Institution the power of holding land in fee?—I believe it has to a small extent; but we have no funds that would enable us to build.

Are all your premises in the South Mall held in one tenure?—Yes; there was lately a stable taken in order to square the premises, and I believe that is now held in the same tenure.

Was any fine paid for the interest in those premises?—Yes, the fine was 568 l. 15 s.

Is not it the regulation of the Society that each Professor should take care of the apparatus necessary for his own lectures?—Yes.

Is that the practice?—It is; for instance; lately when the chemical professor vacated the place the managers ordered him to give up the apparatus to me as superintendent, to hold it till a new one was appointed.

In the account of the expenditure there is a payment of fifty guineas a year to a person of the name of Bath, for the care of the apparatus,—for what is that paid?—That is paid for the actual repair of the apparatus, to a person who is an artist, and a worker in philosophical instruments; he is to repair and make anew things that are wanting, and since the junction of the Society of Arts he has the charge of the casts.

Are you a Proprietor?—I am.

At what periods of the year are your lectures given?—My own lectures begin either in April or the beginning of May, according to the season for botany; and if it be the lectures on mineralogy they begin early in April, and continue for two or three months: two months when I lecture three times a week, and three months when I lecture twice a week.

Has the Institution any property arising from bequests or devises?—No.

Dr.
Thomas Taylor,
25 September,
1826.

Have any sums been subscribed, or given to the Society by individuals, except so far as is necessary to constitute the individuals giving, proprietors?—Not that I am aware of.

The payment of what sum constitutes a proprietor?—The payment at present of thirty guineas, if a person wishes to purchase an original share; that is the price fixed by the managers, but there are shares in the market that may be purchased for something less than that.

At what sum are they generally sold in the market?—The last four or five, as far as I have heard, at twenty guineas.

Have you any annual subscribers?—I believe there is one annual subscriber to the general purposes of the Institution.

Does an annual subscriber to any particular amount acquire any of the rights and privileges of the Institution?—No further than for that year.

What rights has he for the year?—It appears to me that he has the same as a proprietor.

Has the Society any, and what, permanent property?—They have a sum of 2,908 l. 1 s. 8 d. in three and a half per cent Government stock.

From what does that arise?—That stock was purchased by part of the produce of the original shares, one moiety of which was ordered by the 19th section of the bye-laws of the Institution to be laid out in the purchase of stock as a permanent fund.

When you apply to Parliament for a grant, do you give a detailed estimate of the purposes to which the grant is to be applied?—A detailed estimate.

Does your expenditure generally agree with the estimate in each item?—Very nearly; I think the estimate is a very little greater than our expenditure in general.

Do the different items of the estimate correspond with the expenditure?—I think all, excepting where there are incidental expenses; all fixed salaries and such things, precisely agree.

For instance, in the account of the expenditure of the Institution there is a sum of 153 l. 3 s. for agriculture, is that about the amount of the sum at which the expense of that department was estimated?—It is about the amount; it may vary, from one circumstance; if a farming society does not return its accounts by a certain time in the year, by the regulations it disentitles itself to the grant of that year, and therefore the amount may fall short thirty or forty pounds in any one year; but the money in general is expended as it is estimated.

You do not apply a sum of money which you have estimated as required for one purpose to another purpose?—I do not think we do; it may happen that we may exceed our estimate in one item, and fall short of it in another, but a perfect account is given, and the balance accounted for.

In passing the accounts before the Audit-board, is any reference made to the estimate?—I am not aware, I never passed an account with them yet.

Appendix, N^o 2.

Monday, 25th September 1826.

Thomas Cuthbert, Esq. having been sworn, was Examined, as follows:

Thomas Cuthbert,
Esq.
25 September,
1826.

YOU are one of the Vice-Presidents of the Royal Cork Institution?—I am.

Are you also a Proprietor of that Institution?—I am; I had originally two shares, one of which I gave to my son; he is a proprietor.

Were you one of the original proprietors?—I was.

Did you take an active part in the foundation of the Society?—I did.

Are you a manager of the Institution?—I am one of the managers. With respect to the original foundation, it was at the instance of Mr. Hincks, who was a long time secretary to the Institution in its infancy, and he was in fact the founder of the Institution. He kept a school in Cork, and being very much respected, at his instance several of the gentlemen subscribed, and laid the foundation of getting astronomical instruments and other matters for his lecturing for his pupils. Immediately after it came into some consequence, we were visited by Sir John Newport, and Sir John exerted himself, I believe, to get us a grant from Government; he was, I believe, Chancellor of the Exchequer at that time.

Was the grant made immediately upon the institution of the Society?—No, not till some years after. I am not certain whether it was before or after the grant that we got the Charter; I know that we were going on before we got the grant.

What has been the effect produced in the town by the lectures that have been given?—I think they have been attended with great utility in the town; they are very much attended by ladies particularly, and by scientific men; in fact, every man almost that wishes to improve himself attends either morning or evening; some it does not suit to attend in the morning, others in the evening; for instance, shopkeepers and the middling class of the people attend in the evening when the same lectures are repeated.

Do you consider it in the light of a place of education, or rather as the resort of persons who do not know well how to occupy their time?—Certainly as a place of education, very much for the improvement of the younger inhabitants of Cork.

Has it ever occurred to the managers, that it might be beneficially extended as a place of instruction?—It was proposed at one time to do so, but the opinion of the managers was against it; it was discussed a good deal, and I believe they were afraid it would interfere with the schools at present here, and likewise with the College; they did not wish, on account of a jealousy with the College of Dublin, to have a School within the place; and indeed all the Masters here, who are Masters of very good academies, remonstrated against it, and said it would injure them.

Are not the classes attended by persons of a very different age from those who are able to attend the Schools?—The Masters of the Schools get so many tickets from each lecturer to distribute to the head classes, to the boys that they think likely to benefit by the lectures.

Has not that been discontinued?—That has not been discontinued by order of the managers; the liberty of doing it still remains at the option of the Schoolmasters.

Do you know whether the Schoolmasters do avail themselves of that privilege?—I cannot say; they did avail themselves, I know, of it.

As a principle, do you think it would be right that Schoolmasters should take pupils, and receive money for their instruction, and afterwards to any considerable extent avail themselves of instruction given at an Institution which is provided at the public expense?—It is only the lectures that they attend which may benefit them, and prepare them probably for the scientific reading of the College; it does not interfere at all with their classics; in that Institution, as it is constituted, that species of education for which the Schoolmaster is paid could not be attained, because the first ground-work of a boy's education is the classics.

Has it ever occurred to you that it might be beneficial to have lectures in Mathematics?—Certainly, I think it would be; we once had a lecture in Mathematics, but our means will not afford to pay the lecturer.

Has a lecturer on Moral Philosophy ever been contemplated?—There was a gentleman proposed to lecture on the subject, but we could not pay him; it was a gentleman who is a proprietor that applied for the place, and was very indignant at not being appointed.

What was his name?—Mr. Thompson.

According to the Charter, are you at liberty to appoint what Professors you please?—As far as our means go. A resident chemical lecturer would be of very great use in Cork; Mr. Davy was of great use to the manufacturing line particularly.

Is it not the intention of the managers to elect a new chemical professor in the place of Mr. Davy?—Certainly; Mr. Davy's time did not expire till last month.

How many candidates are there for that situation?—Three.

Are you upon either of the Committees of the Institution?—I was Vice-President of the Agricultural Committee.

Can you give the Commissioners an account of the proceedings under the Agricultural branch of the Society?—I think we had ten or eleven Associations at one time in operation; some of them for want of subscriptions have fallen off, or probably from the indolence of their secretaries; but we have at present either five or six in operation; one of their subscriptions amounts to 70*l.*; that is the Lismore Association.

In what way are those Societies connected with the Institution?—They subscribe a certain sum annually, which they give in premiums in their districts, and the part of the grant that is appropriated by the Managers for that department is given in proportion to the subscriptions of each Society.

Can the Commissioners be furnished with an account of the subscriptions to each Society, and the amount of the money granted to such; together with a statement of the application of that money?—Certainly; I think they can. Mr. Tisdall, who was acting as secretary to the Agricultural Society, and who is the lecturer, will be able I think, to give the necessary information.

Is the proportion of money granted to those Societies, and which is expended through the means of those Societies, large?—No; 500*l.* used to be the sum before our grant from Government was reduced; we generally distributed it amongst those Societies; we gave it to the ten Societies at 50*l.* a piece, and then we had a letter from Government, stating that it would be better to give it in proportion to the subscriptions of the different Societies, which we have adhered to; I believe about 340*l.* is what we have appropriated this year.

Have you had any opportunity of observing what the effect of these Agricultural Societies has been in the country?—They have been of very great use; we have in the neighbourhood of Cork very respectable ploughing-matches, which have made very good ploughmen, and very good farmers of a set of very indolent people, and in the different Associations in the Baronies it has been productive of very great advantage; that and the models that we have got over, have improved our ploughmen very much; formerly we had three men to a plough, now there is but one, with long reins. In some parts of the country you will see three men still.

Do not you rather attribute that to the general spirit of improvement which has necessarily spread over the country?—I do not; I think that but for the Farming Societies and the great attention of the gentlemen in the different neighbourhoods who have set a good example, it would not have been followed.

Do not you think the gentlemen would have set that example for the sake of their own interest, independently of the Societies?—I do not think they would if this Institution had not first set the matter going by giving them a grant, and encouraging them to get subscribers; our farming was very much behind hand indeed before the Farming Societies were instituted.

Are not the models of the most improved implements now pretty generally circulated over the country?—They are; we get over from Scotland, or from London, every new model that we think may be of advantage.

Thomas Cuttler,
Esq.

1826.

Are not Scotch ploughs and Scotch carts in pretty general use amongst all farmers?—
They are,

Is not a very large proportion of the Southern part of Ireland cultivated by farmers who have so little capital that you can hardly expect them to carry their mode of cultivation to perfection?—They have very little capital.

Can you expect much improvement from persons so poor as they are?—No; but the Societies make up for their poverty by encouraging them, and making presents of implements to the best ploughmen, and the man that keeps his farm in the neatest order; they give local premiums, which have been attended with very good consequences, and they make up for the want of capital in some measure.

If models of good instruments have been introduced into the country, is not it probable that the artificers about the country have now learned to construct similar instruments for the use of the farmers in the country?—They take after the models they see in the Institution, but it is a very difficult matter to get some of them to use them.

Will not a sense of their own interest gradually overcome that difficulty?—I do not think it will till they are confident they are right; I got an instrument made after a model in the Institution, and till I stood by myself I could not get my ploughman to use it.

Can you state what rule is adopted with regard to the apportioning of the money with reference to the amount of the subscriptions?—The managers make grants to the different Societies of certain sums in proportion to their subscriptions; I think the grant upon the Agricultural item came to about 11 s. a pound on their subscription.

How do you separate the proportion of the funds applicable to Agricultural Societies from the general mass?—The Treasurer of each Society is obliged to give in a subscription list, which he guarantees to be accountable for to that Society: then according to that, we make the grant, and then we see the expenditure at the end of the year.

How do you know what sum to detach from your general grant for the purpose of those Societies?—We make our grant for that purpose in the proportion of our reduced grant; it was 500 l. before the reduction of the grant.

In what way is the payment of the subscriptions ascertained before the grant is made?—They are collected locally; the Treasurer gives in the names of the subscribers, and he is bound to account for that sum of money, and to pay it whether he receives it or not.

He is a local Treasurer?—He is.

Is there a separate Treasurer for each Society?—There is; they are in different Baronies in different parts of the country, and they fix on their local premiums whatever they think most advantageous to the country, either for the growth of flax, or for the best spinning, or any thing of that kind.

What other objects are aimed at by the Societies besides those you have mentioned?—They have a variety of objects in the Barony of Imokilly; they give premiums for the best green crops to the farmers, and two or three gentlemen of the Association go round to inspect.

Is it the practice of the Societies to distribute looms or spinning-wheels?—In some of the Societies they have done it, but the Ladies Associations have taken that part up more actively than the Gentlemen.

Can you state in what way the money is applied to those objects?—I cannot; I have not been a member of those Societies.

Have any alterations in the Society ever occurred to you which you think might be adopted with improvement?—None; we have not the means of improvement; we would wish for a better lecture-room, and a room for casts, if we had the means of obtaining it.

Are there any means by which the funds of the Society might be increased?—It is impossible; I do not think they would get 10 l. in Cork, for most of the men who wish well to it have become proprietors. Some subscribe to the Botanic Garden, and some to the Library; persons can subscribe to any department; but as to the lectures they can get tickets from any of the proprietors.

Are the tickets given by the proprietors sufficient to fill the lecture-room?—More than sufficient; the proprietors are above 200, and the room will not well accommodate 200.

You are aware that a change has lately been made in the appointment of the Sub-treasurer and the Secretary?—Mr. Davy was Sub-treasurer and Secretary, and we are obliged to economize: we have appointed doctor Taylor to those offices.

Could that principle be carried further in the Institution, and by that means could the number of officers be diminished?—No, we have gone as low as possible; we could not get a resident lecturer for the money. Doctor Taylor as superintendent of the Institution, lecturer and secretary, gets 200 l. on the new system; it was 250 l.

Is there any reference at all to religious principles in the lectures given, or in the selections made of individuals as lecturers?—None at all; the subject-matter of the lecture must be approved of by the managers; they point out the course.

Are the managers exclusively of any particular religion?—We have persons of all religions amongst us, Protestants, Catholics, Presbyterians and Quakers; in fact there is not a word ever mentioned about religion.

Are the classes also of a mixed character?—Yes; every person that wishes to go can get admittance, and they are most respectably filled.

In the balloting for proprietors, or those who are to succeed to proprietors shares, is the question of religion ever thought of?—No; it is never thought of; when any proprietor dies his executors can dispose of his share.

His son is admitted without ballot, is he not?—Yes.

But

Thomas Cuthbert,
Esq.

But any other person must be admitted by ballot?—Yes; but we generally take the person that is recommended.

Does the same rule apply to the individuals who are candidates for Professorships?—Yes; I do not think we have had an application from a Roman Catholic to fill any of the chairs.

Are the different Professors now Members of the Church of England?—They are.

What was the utmost extent of the grant you received from Government at any period?—2,500 l. I would beg to observe that the Botanic Garden is not kept in the style in which it ought to be kept, or as it was at first; Mr. Drummond is one of the most scientific gardeners to be found any where, and we allowed for it very handsomely at the commencement, but we found that we were obliged to economize; and consequently though the garden is kept as well as possible for the money expended, yet it is not like the Glasnevin Garden, or other Gardens of the same description.

Appendix, N^o 3.

Tuesday, 26th September 1826.

Mr. William Clear, having been sworn, was Examined, as follows:

Mr.
William Clear,
26 September
1826.

YOU are a Proprietor of the Cork Institution?—I am, and was one of the original Proprietors.

Are you now in any office in that Institution?—I hold the office of Treasurer.

That office is merely honorary?—It is so; it gives me a right to sit as a Manager at the Board.

But no money ever remains in your hands?—None.

What is your duty as Treasurer?—On the Under-Treasurer making out any account, he fills a check, which I sign; the money is deposited in the Branch-Bank of Ireland, and I sign a check for the payment of that sum of money.

Can you state when this Institution first assumed the shape which it bears at present?—In 1807, I believe the Charter was granted; a few gentlemen, about the number of thirty, subscribed originally ten guineas each towards furthering the objects of establishing an Institution in Cork, on the application of Mr. Hincks, who then acted as Treasurer, and in fact was the great promoter of the Institution. Government gave a Charter, and incorporated the Proprietors; and during the progress of the Charter a number of gentlemen became Proprietors at a reduced sum to what it would be under the Charter. Under the Charter we were not allowed to take a Proprietor under thirty guineas; the original shares were ten guineas; and while the Charter was getting forward, a number of gentlemen subscribed twenty guineas each. From the time the Charter was completed a Proprietor's share was thirty guineas; it could not be less by the express terms of the Charter. Then Mr. Hincks, who was the principal Manager and Actor, got together the apparatus, and was the sole lecturer at first to the Institution; he acted as honorary Secretary for a good many years, and afterwards the business became so heavy that it was necessary to remunerate him for his services, and from that time he got 150 l. a year as Secretary.

Were there meetings before the granting of the Charter?—There were several meetings. I believe it was called the Cork Philosophical and Literary Society.

Upon that grant of the Charter it assumed the shape that it now bears?—Yes.

Can you recollect when the first grant of money was made by Parliament?—I believe in 1807.

Immediately upon the granting of the Charter?—Yes; the first four years the grant was 2,000 l. Irish.

Was it afterwards increased?—It was afterwards increased; there had been an application made to obtain the old Custom House for the Institution; the house where it was originally held was a private house belonging to Mr. Hincks; it was too confined, and application was made for the old Custom House, which at that time was not used. As it was afterwards converted to some other purpose, it was not given; but 500 l. Irish was given instead, to provide a suitable place.

How long did that payment continue?—It was continued till within the last four years, and then it was reduced to 2,000 l. British. Up to 1822, the grant was 2,500 l. Irish; in 1823 and 1824 it was 2,000 l. British; in 1825 it was 1,900 l. British; the last year it has been reduced, I believe, something above 200 l.

Is it usual to send in an estimate with a petition previously to obtaining the grant?—Every year it is required by Government.

How soon after the granting of the Charter were the lectures regularly given?—I believe immediately after the granting of the Charter there were lecturers appointed, but I cannot charge my memory with the number of lecturers that were immediately appointed.

At present the Commissioners understand there are a lecturer on Chemistry, a lecturer on Natural Philosophy, a lecturer on Natural History, and a lecturer on Agriculture?—Yes; besides other gentlemen not attached to the Institution, who have occasionally given lectures on other subjects.

These four lecturers have each of them a salary of 100 l. Irish?—They have.

Do the gentlemen you last alluded to receive any salary from the Institution?—There have been two classes of them; some have lectured without receiving any thing from the Institution, but they have sold their tickets. There have been one or two cases within my recollection

Mr.
William Clear,

recollection where sums were paid to the lecturers; smaller sums than to the regular professors.

Of what nature were those lectures?—There was one on Botany, during the absence of the regular professor on Natural History; there was another on Conchology, but I doubt if that was paid for by the Proprietors, but that on Botany I know was; there was either one or two courses on Botany.

The Commissioners understand that it is the practice of the Proprietors to distribute tickets to their friends for free admission to those lectures?—Every Proprietor has a right to a ticket for himself, and he likewise has a right to transfer that ticket to whom he pleases; but besides that, on the application of any respectable person at the Institution, as far as the accommodation of the Institution lecture-room will admit, tickets are given gratuitously; and there has no payment for a number of years been taken for any ticket.

Do you conceive that if the power of the Proprietors to distribute free admission tickets was in any way abridged, that there would be found persons in the town and neighbourhood of Cork to pay a small sum for admission to those lectures, so as to increase the fund of the Institution, and the salaries of the Lecturers?—I do not think there would; there would be a few that would pay, but not to any great extent.

If that payment was as low as 10s. for the whole course, do you suppose that persons would not be willing to pay?—I am sure that several would, but I do not think a large number would.

Could any payment be borne; could a payment as low as half-a-crown be borne?—It could be obtained from a considerable number, I should suppose.

Do you think even that payment would diminish the number that attend the Lectures?—I am sure it would very considerably.

What leads you to entertain that opinion; is it from any thing you have observed?—I was led to form that opinion from the description of persons who now attend; there are some courses of the Lectures that are much better attended than others, and there are some courses that I dare say would still obtain a great many to attend them; but there are some courses not of that popular nature that would induce a great number to attend; and any impediment thrown in their way would prevent their attendance.

Which are the popular Lectures?—The course on Chemistry is a particularly popular one, and it would bring a good attendance; but it must be recollected that the Proprietors have a right of admission to those Lectures, and the Proprietary is very large. The number that could be admitted in our lecture-room, independently of the Proprietors, if they all attended, is very small.

As it is evident that the Proprietors cannot maintain the Lectures without the assistance of Government, it is open to Government to consider upon what terms they will grant their assistance, and they might deem it expedient to ask of the Proprietors to abandon a part of their right, which right can be of no advantage to them without the Government assisted them?—Certainly.

Do you think upon a notification to that effect, that the Proprietors would find any difficulty in so far abandoning the right they now possess, as to give up the right of giving free admissions to persons to the Lectures, and to consent that each individual who attended should make a small payment?—I know that many of the Proprietors would willingly surrender that right, but there are a great many more, perhaps, who would not. I cannot speak decidedly upon that point. I would beg to observe in explanation of the opinion I gave with respect to payment for Lectures, that when the Institution was originally formed it was necessary to induce persons to attend, and tickets were sent round by the secretary at that time to all young persons to induce them to attend—it was a new thing in Cork. Now in consequence of the Lectures there has been a taste excited upon those subjects which did not then exist, and how far it would be well to check any thing of that kind by requiring payment, is a point to be considered.

You say that the Chemistry Lectures are attended with considerable eagerness; what other course do you consider as popular?—The Natural Philosophy; some parts of it at least have been very well attended.

Do you think that a moderate payment could be borne by the persons who attend the Lectures on Natural Philosophy?—Indeed I should suppose it could.

Has that point ever been considered by the Managers?—The Managers have had it before them at different times, but they never came to any decision upon the point.

Are the Lectures on Agriculture well attended?—I have never attended them myself; but I understand they are not well attended.

Do you suppose that the want of attendance at that class arises from the persons attending the Lectures being principally inhabitants of the town, and from their being persons not interested in agricultural pursuits?—That in part; and in part from practical agriculturists not putting any faith in theoretical systems.

In fact, you consider that it is not a subject that is well fitted to be made the subject of a course of Lectures?—Indeed I think not; an experimental farmer would in my opinion be much more fitted to advance agriculture. The Institution was formed at the time when the Duke of Bedford was Lord Lieutenant; he was particularly attached to agriculture, and agriculture was therefore made a leading point, as the Commissioners will see from our Charter.

Are the Lectures on Natural History well attended?—They are.

To what extent do you think that the Society consider themselves as bound by their Charter to devote themselves and their funds to the encouragement of agriculture?—The bye-laws

Mr.
William Clear,

bye-laws particularly require that a sum should be devoted to agriculture not exceeding one third of the whole amount.

Does it require that it should be equal to one third of the whole amount?—No; but there is a clause in the charter stating the Institution to be “for diffusing the knowledge and facilitating the general introduction of all improvements in arts and manufactures, especially agriculture;” and the Managers felt, that under that clause in the Charter they were bound to devote a certain portion of their fund to agriculture. They have reduced materially what they had originally granted to the objects of agriculture, and the sum now devoted is not, I suppose, half what it was originally. But a number have felt that it might be dispensed with altogether; at the same time, there are a number of country gentlemen attached to the Institution, who are favourers of agriculture, and they perhaps would not be pleased at agriculture being left out; they would naturally say, “You are bound by your Charter to support agriculture.” We felt that we could not get rid of the obligation to devote a certain part of our fund to it; but I am sure, that if Government permitted it, the majority would be found glad to get rid of it.

What is there connected with the agricultural department of the Institution that makes it necessary that it should have a separate secretary?—There is attached to the Institution a subscription from certain members, called a Farming Society, and he attends the meetings of that Board, and he likewise corresponds with the other societies in conjunction with the Farming Society; he, I believe, keeps their accounts, and regulates their proceedings, and summons meetings.

Could not that correspondence be carried on, and that duty be performed, by the general secretary of the Institution?—This year there has been a change made; his salary has been reduced. In consequence of the reduction of the grant a Committee of the Managers was appointed, to see in what part of the Institution they could curtail so as to make the reduced grant answer the objects of the Institution; and amongst the other curtailments, 50 l. was struck off Mr. Tisdall's salary, and from next January he will be entitled to 100 l. Irish, instead of 150 l. which he got before; the Managers required that he should perform the duty of agricultural secretary for that sum, as well as lecturer; but he demurred to that: however, there was a compromise made, by his consenting to do the duty of secretary gratuitously, and to let the 100 l. stand still as his salary as lecturer.

Has it ever been considered whether the Society, in the case of any lecturer becoming incapable from ill health, or any other infirmity, would think themselves bound to give him a retired salary, or whether they would let him altogether retire from the Institution without any payment whatever?—There has never an instance occurred of the kind; but I feel as a Manager, and I am sure it is the feelings of the other Managers, that they would not be bound to give any retired salary to a person incapable from any cause of performing the duties.

Do the Lecturers hold their situations subject to the will and pleasure of the Managers; Is it understood that they may be dismissed at any time without cause assigned?—The point is at issue between the lecturers and the managers, in consequence of the wording of the bye-laws. The lecturers conceive they cannot be dismissed without having failed to perform their duty properly. The managers say they have the power of putting them off when they please; for instance, if their grant is reduced so that they are not able to maintain them. However, the Professors say they have no right to do so; and there is some question on that point raised now, in consequence of the reduction of the grant. Every thing, however, has been arranged. There was another thing occurred to the managers; that if any of the lecturers insisted upon retaining his situation they could reduce his salary so as to make it not worth his while to retain it.

Do you think it would be beneficial if there were a course of Lectures on Mathematics?—I think it would.

Has it ever occurred to you that any other lecturer might be appointed than those which now exist, and a Mathematical Lecturer?—There have been at different times propositions for adding other lectureships to the Institution, which were taken into consideration by the managers; but they felt that they were limited by their funds. I believe they felt pretty generally that a Mathematical Professor would be a very useful one, if they had the means of establishing the professorship; but they had not the means, and therefore did not appoint one. There was one or two courses delivered on Mathematics, one on Arithmetic and Algebra by the celebrated Mr. Walker of Dublin, and one other gentleman at least lectured on the subject of Mathematics here; those, I believe, were not paid for by the Institution, but by the persons who attended the course; the Managers merely gave the rooms and their sanction. With regard to Moral Philosophy and History, they thought that to be less useful, though, if they had the means, they would like to establish such a lectureship. There was one gentleman very active in pressing those points (Mr. Thompson); he got a good many of the Proprietors at one time to meet and recommend such a thing to the managers. At the same time, it certainly was not intended at the original formation of the Institution, and it was particularly urged on those who formed it, that it should not wear the appearance of a College, or great School, so as in any way to interfere with the Dublin College; it was rather for young men whose parents were not able to afford them a scientific education at college, that they might, after getting the regular school education in the schools of the city, avail themselves of lectures on moderate terms.

Has the Institution hitherto been found to interfere in the slightest degree with the College at Dublin?—Not in the slightest degree.

Mr.
William Clear,
1826.

Would the addition of two such Lectureships cause it to interfere in the slightest degree with the College?—I do not think it would.

As long as the Dublin College retained the power of conferring degrees, and as long as an Institution of this kind was wholly without any such power, is it possible that it could in any way interfere with the Dublin College?—In a very limited degree, certainly, if at all.

Can you recollect whether the attendance upon Mr. Walker's Lectures was numerous?—I can scarcely call it numerous, but it was a very respectable attendance.

If Lectures on Mathematics were regularly given, and it was known throughout the country that at such a period the Lectures would commence, would it not be likely that such a course of Lectures would be more numerously attended than a mere casual lecturer could possibly expect his to be?—There may be something in the novelty, and in the circumstance of a lecturer coming here, particularly a man like Mr. Walker, whose abilities are known; but I should suppose notwithstanding, that a lecturer on those subjects attached to the Institution would be well attended.

Do you know what payment was made to Mr. Walker?—I do not recollect; it is a great many years since.

The Commissioners observe, that the Institution is very much loaded with the rent of the buildings in which their collection is contained, and in which the Lectures are carried on; is there any means by which that charge could be diminished?—The rent at present is 327 l. 4 s. 8 d.; but I should observe, that there has been a reduction of 100 l. Irish on the rent of the buildings, though the full sum is put down. There were some Minors, and a legal reduction could no be made until either an Act of Parliament, or some similar power was given to reduce the rent in consequence of some legal difficulties, and therefore the receipt has passed for the full sum, but a less sum is taken. The Managers felt they were scarcely at liberty to say a reduction had positively taken place till it was sanctioned by some legal enactment. They had it in contemplation, if the funds permitted, to have built a new Lecture-room, and other rooms that they wanted, and they would not do so till they got a sufficiently safe title.

Is the title now considered sufficiently safe?—No, it is not; the legal enactments have not yet taken place.

Do they depend upon the sanction of the Court of Chancery?—Either the Court of Chancery or an Act of Parliament.

Would it not be better to purchase premises outright?—If they had the means of doing so, it would be better certainly.

Do you know the length of the lease?—It is for a long term of years, but I do not know the exact length. The Managers have the power of getting rid of it whenever they please, because it is but an assignment of the premises under which they hold. It was in agitation, if we had got a sufficient tenure, to endeavour to get some money from the public to aid us in order to add to our buildings and make a respectable Lecture-room.

Do you know any thing of the practice of admitting young persons from the schools to the Lectures?—Yes; there have been orders from the Managers to send as many as six tickets to five or six schools in Cork, to be given to the senior boys of those schools, at the discretion of the Master to admit them to the Lectures.

Have they availed themselves of that privilege?—They have.

Do they continue to do so?—They do.

Does it strike you that there would be any objection to individuals, admitted in that way, paying some small sum for the advantage they derive from the Lectures?—I dare say they might pay some small sum.

The Commissioners are informed that the lecturers are in the habit of delivering their Lectures twice in the day, and that the descriptions of persons who attend in the morning, and in the evening considerably differ. In case of it being thought right to take any payment from the persons who attend the Lectures, do you think it would be right to vary the sum taken for the attendance in the morning, and the attendance in the evening?—I rather think not, for there are a number of those school-boys that attend in the morning, though the morning-class may be considered the more fashionable class, and therefore at first it might appear that they could afford to pay more. A great portion of the class in the morning consists of fashionable ladies and gentleman, and the evening-class of rather an inferior description of persons; yet, perhaps, it might be well not to vary the sum paid for admission, for there are intermixtures notwithstanding.

What number of persons, whom you would designate as ladies and gentlemen, usually attend the Lectures?—They are very various; I should suppose half the audience in the morning may be of that respectable class.

What do you conceive to be the amount of the audience?—About two hundred the room conveniently holds seated, and I have seen the room crowded.

Do not you conceive that the ladies and gentlemen that attend would be willing to pay a subscription of a guinea a year each?—I can hardly judge from past experience, in consequence of the facility of admission, but I should conceive it reasonable to suppose that some at least would.

Do you think it would be desirable to admit persons with Proprietors tickets at less pay than others?—I should think it would, as the Proprietors have some vested right in the Institution by having purchased shares.

Would not the inequality of the charge discourage those persons who had to pay the higher

Mr.
William Clear,
1826.

higher price?—Perhaps under all circumstances it would be better that there should be the same charge to all.

If any arrangement could be made of the sort that has been alluded to, would it not be desirable that the proprietors should retain their own right of personal admission free, but that there should be a check imposed upon their right of transferring it?—Yes; I think it would be a desirable arrangement; perhaps if they had the right of admission, either morning or evening, as they chose, and if they wished to have a transferable ticket, they should pay the same as another person.

Can you furnish an account to the Commissioners of the sums received in each year by way of subscription or donation since the commencement of the Institution?—I am not aware of any sums received in the way of donation, excepting the Parliamentary Grant; but I could furnish an account by examining the books, of what has been paid by proprietors for shares in each year.

Have you not annual subscribers besides proprietors?—We have annual subscribers.

Can you furnish an account of what has been paid either by annual subscribers, or by proprietors purchasing shares?—Yes, I believe I can, by consulting the books of accounts.

Can you also furnish an account of the expenditure of the Institution?—I can.

[The Witness was requested to furnish such Accounts.]

Are there not subscribers to the library?—There are to the number of about sixty or seventy.

Are the annual subscriptions to the library applied especially to the purposes of the library?—They are; the annual subscribers to the library are chiefly medical men; and it is a sort of arrangement with the library-committee that their subscriptions should be all laid out in medical books.

Would lectures on anatomy answer at the Institution?—I think not. We have a very excellent anatomical school in Cork, which supersedes entirely the necessity of any such thing at the Institution.

Are there not several committees formed for different departments of the Institution?—There are; there is one for the botanical garden; one for the library; there is one called the Committee of Fine Arts, there is a Committee of Science, and another for the Accounts.

Have you any means in the Institution of promoting the cultivation of the fine arts?—Young men, on a respectable recommendation, are admitted to attend the Institution to take copies from the casts which are there deposited, and drawings from several books of drawings which are there.

How did you obtain the casts?—The casts were originally a present from His Majesty to a society in Cork, called the Society of Fine Arts. The society found themselves in debt; they could not pay the rent of the premises in which the casts were contained, and they got considerably embarrassed; they applied to Government for aid; Government said they could grant no aid, but recommended them to join the Cork Institution, and to get part of their grant appropriated for the purpose. On that, an arrangement was made that we should get the casts into the Institution; we had to pay the debt that was contracted, and which was due on them; and since that they have been in the Institution.

In what year did that take place?—It was two or three years since.

What was the amount of the debt that was paid?—The debt, I believe, was five or six hundred pounds; but there was a compromise for three hundred pounds.

Are there many students who attend for the purpose of drawing from the statues?—I am not aware of the number, but I have frequently seen five or six young men there; there was a young man who attained to considerable perfection in copying those statues, and it was thought advisable that he should go to Rome to perfect his education, having exhibited considerable talent; his name was Hogan.

Is there any thing known respecting his proficiency?—He had made several statues, and he presented one to Sir John Leicester, which was, I understand, very much admired; and Sir John Leicester gave him a sum of money to assist him in following his profession in Rome.

Do any modellers attend at the Institution?—They are principally engaged in drawing.

Are they admitted freely?—They are.

Does the botanic garden fall much under your notice?—Not particularly; I know some circumstances with regard to it.

Have any doubts ever arisen with the proprietors as to the expediency of continuing it?—A number of the proprietors have considered it rather an useless attachment to the Institution; others have been of a very different opinion.

Is it of any benefit except affording specimens for the botanical lecturer to lecture upon?—It is a benefit to students in botany besides.

Are there many such students?—There are a good many young men, in the medical profession particularly, who wish to acquire a knowledge of botany; there have been occasionally medical plants obtained there which were not to be obtained in any other place. I have heard physicians in the city speak, in that respect, well of it, having been able to obtain plants for medical purposes there which they could not obtain elsewhere.

With regard to any influence that may have been produced upon the inhabitants of the town and neighbourhood generally by the existence of this Institution, have you observed whether it has at all tended to improve the general state of mind and taste of the people?—I think it has had a very considerable effect. Previously to the formation of the Institution there was comparatively little acquaintance with science in the city, but since that period those who have devoted themselves to that study have been very numerous ; it has been the means of exciting a very general taste for science among the rising young men of the city.

Do you think that that is still upon the increase ?—I think it is.

The Commissioners understand that the Institution is open to all classes of religious persuasions ?—It is ; there is no distinction of any kind.

Has any thing of a party spirit ever crept into it at any time ?—I think not.

Do you find that the classes are attended equally by persons of all persuasions ?—They are attended by all sorts of persons, without any sort of distinction.

If any lecturer were to go out of his way with a view to touch upon any point connected with religious matters, would it be found fault with by the Managers ?—It certainly would.

Has it ever occurred to you, that the funds might be administered in such a way as to make the Institution more useful ?—Certainly ; there is no Institution perfect ; but the managers have administered the funds of the Institution according to their best judgment, with the exception of agriculture, which they thought themselves bound to promote by the terms of the Charter. There was some years since a letter from Government saying, that they did not approve the sums given for agricultural purposes in the way of premiums ; and a deputation, I believe, waited on the Lord Lieutenant, or on the chief secretary, and the objection was given up, and they were allowed to go on as before.

Appendix, N° 4.

Tuesday, 26th September 1826.

Mr. John Lecky was Examined upon his solemn affirmation, as follows :

Mr.
John Lecky.
1826.

ARE you one of the managers of the Royal Cork Institution ?—Not at present, but I have been very frequently ; I am now out by rotation.

The Commissioners understand that you have taken a considerable interest in the management of that Institution from the first beginning ?—I have.

Were you one of its first promoters ?—Yes.

Is there any particular department of the Institution that you have attended to more than the others ?—I have attended more to the Observatory—the astronomical part, than any other.

Have lectures on Astronomy ever formed any part of the object of the Institution ?—They have.

By whom were they delivered ?—By Doctor Willes, the Professor of Natural Philosophy.

Have you observed that the lectures delivered in this Institution have produced much effect on society in Cork.—Have they tended to spread much taste for study and knowledge ?—My opinion is, that the Institution has done incalculable benefit to the city and neighbourhood of Cork in that respect.

Will you describe the general nature of the effect it has produced ?—It has raised a spirit of inquiry among the middling classes, particularly with respect to science ; that I think has been of great benefit to them and to the community at large.

The Commissioners observe that the Institution comprehends different objects ; partly agriculture, and partly science.—Which department of the Institution do you think has been productive of the most benefit ?—I do not know which of the four departments has produced most benefit ; I think all of them are useful.

What do you observe has been the effect of the lectures on agriculture, and the premiums distributed through the means of the Agricultural Societies ; do you think they have produced any material benefit ?—I apprehend they have benefited the country by introducing a better mode of farming.

To what extent do you think they have succeeded in that object ?—If the system of agriculture in this country was similar to that in England, and the land was apportioned in farms of fifty or sixty acres each, I think a system of scientific agriculture would be very beneficial ; but whilst the land is divided out into such small farms, as it is at present in this country, I think that no system of scientific agriculture can be pursued with such benefit.

The Commissioners observe that there are now four lecturers appointed ; have you ever had occasion to think that that number might be increased with advantage to the Institution ; do you think, for instance, that it would be desirable to institute a lecture on Mathematics, or a lecture on History and Moral Philosophy ?—I am doubtful of its being necessary to have a separate lecture for those sciences ; but I think the Astronomical lecturer might give a few lectures in Mathematics at the commencement of his course.

Would it not be desirable, in an institution that professes to give education and instruction, to give more instruction in mathematics than could possibly be comprehended in a few lectures ?—I doubt if the classes that attend the lectures require it.

Would not classes immediately be found who would seek for this information, if it could be obtained ?—I think that there are so many good schools in Cork, probably they would not.

Would not young persons attend after they had left school ?—I doubt whether they would.

Would not persons resort to Cork for the purpose of attending such lectures ?—I doubt it.

Mr.
John Lecky,
1826.

You were one of the Committee in 1818 who made a Report concerning the improved system of lecturing in the Institution; and in that the Commissioners see that you refer to a former Report of a Committee, in which it is stated that the Professor of Natural Philosophy had complained much of the deficiency of mathematical knowledge in the greater part of his hearers, which frequently rendered it difficult to explain himself intelligibly, and compelled him to pass over slightly some of the most useful parts of his course; and he therefore recommended that lectures should occasionally be given in the Institution, on such branches of mathematical knowledge as were intimately connected with natural philosophy, which constituted, as it were, the grammar of that extensive science. Do you recollect that circumstance?—I recollect the Committee.

Has any thing been done in consequence of that recommendation?—I am not aware of any thing having been done; my idea is that there would not be an attendance on such lectures.

Have you any recollection of a gentleman of the name of Walker delivering a course of lectures on mathematics?—I recollect his delivering a lecture on the philosophy of arithmetic.

Was it well attended?—It was.

Do you think that any alteration could be made in the distribution of the funds of the Institution which would be productive of improvement, or which would make it more useful than it is at present?—I am not competent to give an opinion upon that.

Do you think that any arrangement could be made by which assistance could be obtained from the public towards the funds of the Society, which might assist in discharging the expense of it?—I should suppose the assistance to be derived in that way would be very trifling.

Do you think the lectures would be attended if the proprietors waved their privilege of transferring their tickets freely, and if each person that attended the lecture was forced to contribute some small sum?—I think the sum must be very small, and that the attendance would be of course in the inverse proportion of the sum they had to pay.

What sum do you think would be borne without difficulty?—It should be only a few shillings.

If a sum, however small, was taken, what do you think would be the best application of it?—I think it should be divided between the lecturer and the Institution; but I am afraid, if any money is to be paid for the tickets, that it will be a bar to a great many of the middling or poorer classes attending the lectures.

Is there not a small observatory attached to the Institution?—There is.

Are not the observations made in that observatory of considerable use to the sea-faring persons, to correct their chronometers by?—They have been, and may still be of considerable use to the sea-faring people for that purpose.

Appendix, N° 5.

Tuesday, 26th September 1826.

Mr. George Tisdall, having been sworn, was Examined, as follows:

THE Commissioners understand that you hold the situation of lecturer on agriculture in the Cork Institution?—Yes.

Do you hold any other situation?—I also hold the situation of agricultural secretary.

The Commissioners observe, in some of the accounts of the Institution, a notice of a publication; what is the nature of that publication?—A part of the duty of the agricultural secretary was to superintend the editing of the Munster Farmer's Magazine; the publication is now suspended.

What payment do you receive from the Institution as lecturer in agriculture?—100 l. a year.

What payment as secretary?—50 l. I have received till this year. In consequence of the reduction of the Parliamentary Grant they were obliged to retrench in various parts of the establishment, and amongst the rest they required me to discharge the duties of agricultural lecturer and agricultural secretary for 100 l. a year, to which I acceded.

What duty do you perform as lecturer on agriculture?—I lecture in the usual way, as other professors.

Were you appointed lecturer at the first commencement of the Institution?—No; Dr. Barry, a very eminent physician of this town, was the first agricultural professor. I succeeded to the situation in the year 1815, upon the resignation of Dr. Barry; he resigned in consequence of his extensive professional business, which prevented his attending to it.

Of how many lectures does your course consist?—The Managers do not appoint any particular number of lectures. In general I give about fifteen lectures, sometimes more; this last time I gave but fifteen, though I intended to give more, but it was in consequence of a misapprehension of the class. I invited them to a lecture at my farm; and as that was generally the concluding part of the course, they imagined that I had finished my course, and they did not attend afterwards.

What is the greatest number of lectures of which your course has ever consisted?—I could have given an unlimited number, for I had materials for it.

Mr.
George Tisdall.
1826.

Mr.
George Tisdall,
1826.

What is the actual number of which it has ever consisted?—The actual number is very seldom more than fifteen.

What is the smallest number which it has ever comprehended?—At the commencement it did not extend to so much as fifteen; thirteen was what I gave the first course; but the labour of composing it was excessively great, and it really interfered with my health.

When does your course commence?—It generally commences in the month of May.

When did it commence upon the last occasion?—In the month of May.

How often in the course of the week do you lecture?—Once a week.

Do you deliver your lectures twice in the day?—No; the managers did not require me to do so, for this reason, they were chiefly attended by country gentlemen who could not attend in the evening. I expressed my readiness to some of the managers very frequently to deliver my lectures twice in the day, but on the principle that I have already mentioned they said it was not expedient; in fact the repetition of the same lecture is no trouble; the great labour is in composing it.

What number of persons attended your class upon the last occasion?—There were tickets applied for and issued to the amount of between eighty and ninety.

What was the actual attendance?—The actual attendance was not any thing near that proportion.

Will you state as nearly as you can what number attended at the beginning of the class?—At the beginning of the class it amounted upon some occasions to thirty, and between twenty and thirty for the greater part of the course.

At the close, what number attended?—At the close they fell off to fifteen or sixteen.

Is that about the usual attendance you have had of late years at your lectures?—I have had more upon former occasions. It may be necessary, perhaps, to explain why my lectures are not so well attended as those of other professors—the subjects treated of in an agricultural course may not be sufficiently delicate for female ears; I never had but two ladies that attended me; and it is impossible to make an agricultural course so interesting as any of the other lectures where they have interesting experiments to exhibit: it is to be presumed that no person will attend an agricultural course except for the purpose of actually receiving useful information.

Have any persons, who get their livelihood by the cultivation of land, attended your lectures as distinguished from the class of gentlemen farmers?—Yes; but not many. At this last course there was a son of a Scotch steward who put himself to very considerable inconvenience in coming to attend, and he did attend the greater part of the last course.

Is he a practical farmer?—He is a practical farmer—in fact he was a ploughman.

Was he not qualifying himself to be a bailiff or land steward?—I believe his object was merely to obtain agricultural information with a view to his own instruction.

Are not the persons who are the occupying farmers in this country for the most part persons possessed of very little capital, and cultivating but very small portions of ground?—Certainly, that is the description of by far the greater part of the tenantry.

Is a refined and highly improved system of agriculture, such as is pursued in the improved parts of Scotland and England, at all adapted to a tenantry under the circumstances in which the occupiers of land in the county of Cork are at present placed?—Certainly not; they are from their poverty utterly incapable of following the profession in the way in which it is followed in the extensive farms of England and Scotland, but at the same time they are capable of being instructed in many of the most useful branches in their own small way: for instance, with respect to the most important of all the arts, that of ploughing, a most beneficial effect has been produced by the interference of the Farming Societies, and the rewards they have given on ploughing-matches, and the countenance they have showed them upon those occasions.

Is that a subject which your lectures touch upon much?—They touch upon every subject.

Can you by lectures give any practical instruction in ploughing?—Certainly; and have done so. I exhibit a plough always as a model: I describe the way that it should be formed, and the proper mode of fixing the irons.

Have not most of the improved ploughs been introduced from Scotland and the improved parts of England?—From Scotland originally, and from different parts of England by the instrumentality of the Institution.

Have gentlemen living in the country the smallest difficulty in obtaining any plough that they want by sending to Scotland for it?—They can get them exceedingly well made in this town, in consequence of the models in the Institution.

Have many been made which have been copied from the models in the Institution?—Very many. I do not reside in the Institution myself, but I frequently attend there: I have received letters from gentlemen in the country requesting me to show different implements as models for carpenters and persons they have sent, and I have had a great deal of trouble in showing those models. I believe there is a servant of the Institution who always gives permission to those persons to come in, and he is able to prove that there is not a week in which there are not, on an average, three applications to see those machines, or three examinations of those machines by artificers of different kinds.

The Commissioners understand that there are several Agricultural Societies established in different parts of the country which are connected with the Institution?—There are six at present in existence.

Will you describe what is the nature of their connection with the Institution, and what assistance they derive from it?—I will give the Commissioners a short history of them.

Previous

Mr.
George Tisdall,
1826.

Previous to the connection between the Farming Societies and the Cork Institution, Lord Carbery, Lord Shannon, and several others of the landed proprietors of the county, thought it would be a good thing to establish a Farming Society for the county of Cork: they accordingly took an apartment in Patrick-street for that purpose, and they held several meetings: they did some business; they appointed a secretary; they offered some premiums: the only thing they did, that I know had a beneficial effect, was the purchase of a boar from England for the improvement of the breed of swine; but there was so little energy among them that it fell off, insomuch that I have been credibly informed they were not able about a year and a half afterwards, from their funds, to pay for the rent of the room in which they had their meetings, and that their secretary was not paid the salary that had been promised him. When it was found to be in a state of decline, some of the members of it thought it would be a good thing to incorporate it with the Institution: a proposal was made to the managers, and it was readily acceded to.

Was that before the Charter was granted?—That was, I believe, before the Charter was granted.

How long had the Institution existed before that Farming Society was incorporated with it?—I do not know exactly the year in which this Farming Society was established; but I believe the Charter of the Institution was granted in 1807; and I believe it must have been a year previous to that when the incorporation took place.

Can you say at all how long the Institution had existed before the incorporation took place?—I cannot say.

How long was it before those branch Societies were formed, connected with and founded upon the Institution?—The branch Societies were not formed till after the Charter was granted, and funds in the hands of the managers.

What is the greatest number of those branches that ever existed?—Ten; but there were but eight of these that were formed immediately after the Charter was granted, and they were allowed a share of the funds; the share that they were allowed out of the funds was 500*l.*

You have stated that the number is now reduced to six?—Yes.

To what do you attribute that reduction?—Several circumstances may have contributed to it; the principal one is this, that those Societies got a share of the grant without any regard to the amount of their subscription. It was rather from consideration of their utility and their merit; it continued for some years in that way. There was an addition afterwards of two Societies to the original number of eight. The two Societies that were added were in districts where few landed proprietors resided, and the amount of subscriptions from those was consequently very small; but they, notwithstanding, got a proportion of the grant to the Agricultural Department in consideration of the services they did, without any regard whatever to the amount of the subscription. Some time after that, Mr. Grant notified to the managers, as secretary to the Lords Justices, that they wished that the agricultural premiums should be altogether abolished. In consequence of that there was a great deal of anxiety entertained all over the county; all the landed proprietors took the alarm: they saw the benefit they derived from the agricultural grant, and Lord Carbery, Lord Shannon, and all the nobility and landed proprietors of the county, and all those who occupied any considerable extent of land, signed a petition to the Lord Lieutenant, to request that this order of the Lords Justices might be re-considered. It was re-considered; and Mr. Grant wrote back to the managers to state that it was the Lord Lieutenant's pleasure that the premiums should be given as usual to the Farming Societies, but at the same time recommending that they should be given in proportion to the amount of their subscriptions. In consequence of that we were not enabled to give to those Societies any thing that was worth their acceptance, and some of them discontinued their operations altogether, in consequence of the difficulty of obtaining subscriptions in their neighbourhood.

What sum of money do you now distribute among those six Societies?—The sum that was distributed last year was 300*l.*, the sum appropriated this year by the managers and proprietors was only 159*l.* 9*s.* 3*d.*, that was a certain sum in Irish currency reduced to British currency. The sum appropriated by the Agricultural Committee to the different Societies amounted to about 11*s.* 3*d.* in the pound on their subscriptions.

That sum being divided amongst each of the Societies, gave to them 11*s.* 3*d.* for every pound of their own subscriptions?—Yes.

What sum was appropriated to the Carrigaline Society?—11*l.* 17*s.*

Into whose hands was their subscription paid?—The treasurer of each Farming Society is obliged to send in an account of the amount of subscriptions for which he undertakes to be personally responsible himself; and then the Agricultural Committee appropriate to that Society a sum proportionate to that which he undertakes to be accountable for. At the conclusion of the year, previous to the month of April, when the accounts are sent to the Board of Accounts, all the different items of expenditure are regularly stated, and receipts upon proper stamps for the expenditure of every shilling of it produced to the Treasurer of the Cork Institution; those are forwarded to the Board of Accounts, and whatever information the Commissioners may want, that I am not capable of giving, with respect to the amount of those, may be had most accurately from that Board.

Do you receive receipts from the Secretary or Treasurer of each individual Farming Society, as to the distribution of the different sums of money given in premiums, and so on?—With the greatest accuracy.

Mr.
George Tisdall,
26 September
1826.

Can you state what was the distribution of the money made by the Carrigaline Society?—
I cannot tell that till we have their accounts.

Can you state it for any bye-gone year?—I have not any document relating to the Carrigaline Society.

What was the amount of the subscription of the Bandon Farming Society?—The Bandon Farming Society subscribed for the present year 49 l. 8 s.

What is the amount subscribed by the Imokilly Farming Society?—40 l. by estimate; the Kinalea Society has also subscribed 40 l.

What is the amount subscribed by the Kinnattalloon Society?—That is another name for the Lismore Society; it is a very excellent society; the reason I enter it as the Kinnattalloon Society is, that Lismore is in the county of Waterford; but they extended their Farming Society to the barony of Kinnattalloon, and the Cork Institution bound them to lay out the grant they received in the barony of Kinnattalloon in the county of Cork, conceiving that they were not entitled to grant money to be laid out in any other county. The amount of their subscription this year is 90 l. by estimate.

Where were the meetings of that Society held?—At Lismore.

In what way is it secured that the money granted to that Society shall be distributed among persons residing in the county of Cork?—By vouchers from the persons by whom the money is received.

What is the amount of the Fermoy subscription?—Fermoy has actually returned 65 l.

Does each of those Societies bring you receipts to the amount of their own subscriptions?—To the amount of their own subscriptions and the grant altogether; they have generally known what the grant would be; they have not done it this year, and the reason they did not do it this year is, that the managers of the Institution were unwilling to commit themselves by offering any sum to those Societies, or by granting any thing to those Societies till they knew what the fate of the application to Parliament would be. As soon as they got it they appropriated the sum, but it could not be confirmed except in a general meeting of the Proprietors, which takes place twice a year; one in the Spring assizes, the other in the Summer assizes.

By what was the amount of your grant from Parliament this year less than last year?—It was between 300 l. and 400 l. less; there was 100 l. taken off the year before.

Do you apprehend that the reduction of the grant will put an end to any of those Societies?—By no means; but I am satisfied it will slacken their efforts.

Do you apprehend that if the grant were altogether withheld it would put an end to those Societies?—With the exception of the Lismore Society, I believe it would be the destruction of every one; at the time the Institution received the communication I have mentioned from Mr. Grant, there were remonstrances from those Societies, stating their utter inability to go on if the grant was withheld.

The Commissioners have before them a printed paper offering certain premiums for the Bandon Agricultural Society for the year 1826. The first premium is “1 l. 10 s. to the best ploughman, including the ploughs of noblemen and gentlemen.”—Do you think it can be an object to give premiums to ploughmen employed by noblemen and gentlemen?—I think it may be dispensed with now, but at the commencement it was of the greatest utility; it was an encouragement to their ploughmen; the premiums for those are very small, at least it is the general rule that the premiums for ploughing to noblemens ploughmen should be a mere gratuity to the men, to encourage them to execute their work well; but at the commencement it was absolutely necessary to give premiums in that way, otherwise there would be no ploughing-match; there was no skill whatever in ploughing among the tenantry; but the degree of competition between the working farmers and the gentlemens ploughmen was so great, that the working farmers in many instances excelled notwithstanding the imperfection of their implements.

By the papers that the Commissioners have before them, it appears that a considerable number of premiums are given to persons who exhibit stock cattle, horses, cows and sheep; can you state whether the premiums of the first class are generally obtained by gentlemen, or whether they are generally obtained by working farmers?—It very frequently happens that they are obtained by gentlemen.

It appears, for instance, that the premium for the best draft-stallion is 6 l. 6 s., and the premium for the best bull is five guineas, which premiums can be obtained by gentlemen; and it appears that the premiums for working farmers are, for the best bull 2 l., and for the best ram 2 l. Can you state why it is thought desirable to give a smaller premium to the working farmers than in cases where gentlemen may be candidates?—From the great inferiority of the cattle, and the different descriptions of stock in the possession of working farmers; but I had no share whatever in framing that paper; the Agricultural Society of Ireland obtains a grant of I believe, 5,000 l. a year from Government, and their premiums for cattle, &c. are generally given to the gentry of the country.

Could not these Societies connect themselves with the Agricultural Society of Ireland?—I am not aware of any mode of connexion of the kind. Sure I am that the Agricultural Society of Ireland would give but a very small proportion of their aid to so remote a part of the country.

Have the Societies ever given premiums for objects connected with the manufacture of linen?—I am not aware of any; they have given premiums for the cultivation of flax.

Have they ever distributed looms or spinning-wheels?—I believe that the Fermoy Society once appropriated a part of their funds to the purchase of spinning-wheels for the purpose

Mr.
George Tisdall,

purpose of distribution, and the Agricultural Committee disapproved of that appropriation of the grant, and the grant was in consequence withheld from that Society; they disapproved of it because they imagined that they had a claim upon the Linen Board; but I speak from a very vague recollection upon the subject.

Is not the hardy breed of cattle, established in Ireland, better adapted to the exposed pasture in which it is raised, than any improved breed that can be imported from England?—I am satisfied there are many breeds of cattle, and sheep especially, that by careful culture may be considerably improved.

Do you believe that Devon cattle could stand the exposure on the mountains of this country?—The North Devon are sufficiently hardy for it, and the South Down sheep would be a very valuable stock to introduce into this part of the country.

Have you with you a syllabus of your course of lectures?—I have.

[The Witness delivered in the same.]

What are your duties as agricultural secretary, and what portion of your time do they occupy?—It is my duty to have the Agricultural Committee summoned on the third Wednesday of every month in the year; it is my duty to correspond, wherever there is occasion for it, with the secretaries of all the different Farming Societies; it is my duty to receive their accounts; the treasurer of the Institution inspects those accounts, and transmits them to the Board of Accounts, with all the necessary vouchers, and it frequently happens that with respect to some of those societies, the correspondence is by no means a sinecure; I am obliged from the dilatoriness and the procrastination of a few, frequently to urge them. It is also my duty to attend two general meetings in each year, of the proprietors and agricultural subscribers, including the members of the Farming Societies; and to superintend and make arrangements for general ploughing-matches, such as procuring a suitable field for the purpose; and having the lots for each plough surveyed and marked out on the preceding day. All this is attended with considerable trouble.

Is there any thing in this duty that could not be performed by the general secretary of the Institution?—Mr. Hincks, who had been the general secretary of the Institution before my appointment, assured me that one of the principal reasons why he gave up the situation, and abandoned the Institution, was the duty of agricultural secretary, which he was utterly incompetent to discharge, in consequence of his want of agricultural knowledge.

You think, therefore, that whoever is the agricultural lecturer ought to be intrusted with that correspondence?—The managers made it a condition; it was to be presumed that the agricultural lecturer was acquainted with agricultural subjects, and they would not elect any man as agricultural lecturer who did not undertake to do the duty of agricultural secretary, receiving a remuneration for it; that remuneration they have, in consequence of the reduction of the Parliamentary Grant, taken away. I have with me two or three papers relating to my department of the Institution, which perhaps may be useful to the Commissioners, and which I will deliver in. I will beg to give some explanation with respect to one of them. At the time that the Commissioners of Inquiry were expected to examine the affairs of the Institution two years ago, I wrote to the different Farming Societies to send in an account of the state of Agriculture in their several districts, previously to the formation of the Society, and subsequently to it; and I wrote also to one of the first agricultural authorities, and indeed one of the first literary characters in the kingdom, Mr. Townsend, the author of a Statistical Survey of the County of Cork, for his view of it. He was one of the original patrons of the Institution, but from his state of health, he has not been able to come much to town within the last few years; and this is a letter from Mr. Townsend to me, which may possibly afford the Commissioners some information.

[The Witness delivered in the same.]

Appendix, N° 6.

Tuesday, 26th September 1826.

Dr. Thomas Tuckey, M. D. having been sworn, was Examined, as follows:

ARE you now one of the Managers of the Cork Institution?—I am; I was chosen at the last assizes; I had been off by rotation.

How long have you been a Proprietor?—About seven years; but I have been a subscriber to the Library a great many years.

Do you think that the Lectures delivered at the Institution are productive of a beneficial effect in Cork?—I think very great; I think the greatest benefit that they have been of is to the young men, to the rising generation; I think it has given them a taste for science and literature in general; they read to prepare themselves to understand the Lectures, and the Lectures induce them to read afterwards; and I think instead of spending their evenings in taverns and elsewhere, they are much more inclined to scientific subjects than they were in former days.

Do you think that is still upon the increase?—I think it is.

Does it appear to you to have given more of a literary turn to society?—I think that it has; there were two debating societies here, there is only one of them in existence now; I have attended them, and I have seen very good papers there occasionally on scientific subjects,

Dr.
Thomas Tuckey,

subjects, to which I am certain the Institution alone gave rise; and I think it has been of very great benefit to the young gentlemen of the medical profession.

In what way does it benefit the gentlemen of that profession?—By their attending the chemical lectures, and the lectures on natural philosophy, and on botany, and there is a good library to have recourse to, where there is a most valuable collection of medical books.

Is great care taken in the selection of the books purchased by the Society?—I conceive there is?—I have been on the library committee whenever I have been a manager, and we endeavoured to select books of science and expensive works that individuals could not purchase. A good deal of the money is expended in purely medical works, because the greater number of the subscribers to the library are medical men.

Do you entertain any doubt that very considerable benefit has been derived from the facility which young persons have of obtaining those books to refer to?—I am convinced that very considerable benefit has been derived.

Books are allowed to be taken out, are they not?—They are, under restrictions; valuable plates cannot be taken out.

What portion of the funds of the Society is annually allotted to the purchase of books?—I conceive that all the money that is subscribed to the library goes to it; perhaps it may average 200 l. or 300 l. a year, but I never had any thing to do with the pecuniary concerns of the Institution.

The Commissioners observe that there are four lecturers appointed. Has it ever occurred to you that that number might be advantageously extended, and that other subjects might be comprehended in the instruction given at the Institution?—I recollect once there was a wish to have a professor of ethics there, but it did not meet the wishes of the managers; they thought it might lead to the discussion of theological subjects, and they did not approve of having any thing of the kind. It was proposed also to have mathematics taught there, in order to qualify the pupils to attend the lectures of the professor of natural philosophy. I recollect some persons were very anxious to have an Elementary School there, but the managers did not approve of it, they thought it was not part of the original design of the Institution.

Do you think that it would be advantageous to have a lecturer in Mathematics?—I think it would most indubitably, if the funds would allow of it; I think the more lecturers we have the better.

Always supposing that a lecturer was strictly prohibited from entering into religious matters, would it not be advantageous to have a lecturer on Moral Philosophy?—With respect to moral philosophy, I should think that might be learned sufficiently from books; there are no demonstrations there, and there is nothing that requires experiments; it is nothing more than a lecturer reading from a book.

If persons are collected in a class, and lectures are given orally, and well illustrated and explained, does not it attract attention in a way that it is difficult to do by books?—I have no hesitation in saying that the more lecturers we have the better, under the restriction that they would not enter into theological subjects, but my answers apply to the present state of the funds.

The Commissioners observe that the proprietors obtain by their subscription the right not only to attend the lectures themselves personally, but to authorize any other individual to attend any lecture that may be given; do you not think that the Institution might be very materially benefited by the proprietors waving a part of their privilege; that is to say, giving up their right of transferring the right of attendance, and putting the lectures upon this footing, that a small payment should be made by every person attending, which payment should be divided into portions, one part of which should go to a stock-purse belonging to the Institution, and the other, which in all propriety ought to be the larger part, to the lecturer himself?—I do not conceive that the proprietors have that power; the way they do it is this, each proprietor gets a ticket, and he shows that ticket at the door, without which no person is admitted; if he does not mean to go himself he gives that ticket to any other person he chooses, but I do not conceive that he can go himself, and that he can also get permission for any other person to go without asking leave of the lecturer; in other words, there can only one person go in upon one ticket; and it is supposed that every proprietor is represented there but by one person, except that they have been in the habit of sending six tickets to each of the Schools at Cork, which may be given to the most deserving scholars. With respect to the second part of the question, for many years there has not been any person to take a ticket from the lecturers by payment; formerly there were a few.

Where so large a number of persons can be admitted by tickets given by the proprietors, is it not evidently impossible that payment could be obtained from any number of other persons?—I do think at the present time that payment cannot be obtained.

Have you any doubt that payment could be obtained if the proprietors gave up their privilege, and ceased to transfer their tickets?—Unquestionably; I conceive that many persons would pay that do not pay now; that a great many would be very anxious to attend the lectures; and that if they could not get them without payment, they would pay a moderate sum.

Would not that afford a very proper and a very obvious means of enlarging the salaries of the lecturers, and of providing a fund that might be very advantageous and useful to the Institution itself?—I am afraid that in the present depressed times the number that would attend would be small, if the contribution was so large as to be expected to increase the general funds thereby.

Have there not been occasionally lectures given at the Institution by persons who were not the regular professors?—There have; I recollect Mr. Thelwall giving a lecture there upon Elocution; his prices were so much for the course, and so much for each single lecture.

What sort of a class had he?—He had a very numerous class.

Was not there a gentleman of the name of Walker who lectured upon Mathematics?—I know he did lecture in Cork, but I think it was on what he called the Philosophy of Arithmetic; but I was not in Cork at that time.

Did you ever hear what sort of a class he had?—I should think it was not very numerous, because it was a subject that not many would understand. Mr. Peall, who was a Professor of the Dublin Society, was quartered at Ballincollig as the veterinary surgeon, and he gave a course of lectures; they were a guinea each course, and there were a good many attended them. I do not know that there was ever a course there at a less price than a guinea, except a small course of lectures that the Librarian gave on Elocution; I believe they were nine or ten shillings.

Was that fully attended?—No, I believe not. I recollect a course of lectures given there on Conchology by Mr. Thompson, and I believe he gave a course on Botany also.

Do you know what the attendance is upon the different lectures?—I attended but one course of Agriculture, and I should think the number varied at perhaps from forty to fifty; they were all males. I have attended other courses, and I think they were generally as full as the room could hold; I have seen persons standing very often; I never saw any person go away for want of room.

Has the attendance relaxed lately?—I have never understood that it has; I believe they are all extremely well attended.

Can you inform the Commissioners what advantage is derived from the establishment of the Botanic Garden?—If any gentleman or lady has any inclination to study botany they can attend the lectures, and see the plants there. I know that some of the members and managers think that it is not attended with much benefit, and the Botanic Garden is in a most inconvenient situation; but they have the same facility of learning botany there as they have in every other place where there is a professor and a Botanic Garden: perhaps the plants are not labelled so much as they ought to be; they were marked at one time, but they have been defaced by time, and we have been obliged to curtail the expenditure on the Botanic Garden.

Can you state whether the institution of the Botanic Garden is of any use for medical purposes?—As I do not practise medicine myself, I do not think I could answer that question so well as a practitioner; but I should rather think it has not been of so much benefit as the other objects of the Institution.

Have you attended at all to the operation of the agricultural branch of the Institution?—Never; I have been present as a manager merely, when they were apportioning the money, and they generally did it according to the sums that the Society subscribed. Government, I understood, wished that a considerable part of it should go to those Agricultural Societies.

Do you entertain any doubt that the most useful and beneficial part of this Institution has been the scientific part of it, and that the instructions delivered by means of lectures, has been more beneficial than any other species of instruction?—I certainly think that the scientific lectures are the most useful; I must say, however, that I attended the lectures on Agriculture, and as far as I was able to judge, I thought it was a very clear theoretical and practical course of lectures. It seems to me that it would be a very great improvement if the Professor could go round and give lectures in the different country towns, because then all the gentlemen in the neighbourhood could attend.

Are there any alterations that you can suggest in the Society, that you think would be productive of benefit?—They have a very inconvenient Lecture Room, and the library is not as convenient as it might be; but there is one thing that I think would be a very great object for the Institution; they have a great deal of ground that they might turn to some use, and it would be a great object to know on what footing they stand, whether the Parliamentary Grant is to be continued or not.

Appendix, N^o 7.Wednesday, 27th September 1826.

Dr. James Willes, M. D. having been sworn, was Examined as follows:

YOU are a practising physician in the city of Cork?—I am.

You also lecture on Natural Philosophy at the Royal Cork Institution?—Yes, and have done so for twelve years back.

The Commissioners understand that your class is numerously attended?—I believe I have as full a class as any at the Institution; except, perhaps, that of the Professor of Chemistry. I regret that sometimes we have not room to accommodate those who would attend. Our room has been repeatedly over-filled, but the number varies according to the interest that people feel in the part of the course in which I may happen to be engaged.

Do you lecture twice a day?—I sometimes lecture twice in the day, and sometimes give a lecture in the evening, and repeat it the next day at two o'clock; but the same lecture is always repeated either on the same day, or on two successive days.

Dr.
James Willes,
27 September
1826.

On both occasions you find the room full?—Very often; always a respectable attendance; sometimes it is over full.

Is the name of every person that attends a course of lectures inserted in a book or paper?—I understand the mode to be to deliver tickets at the will of the proprietors, either for themselves or to their representatives, and there are additional tickets given; some at the will and discretion of the lecturer, to those whom he may consider his friends, or to any eligible applicant, whom he may suppose unequal to pay the price of an attendance; and there are other tickets given to the different respectable Schools, so that in that way the room is calculated by the lecturer, and he gives as many tickets as he supposes will fill the room.

Do you think that all the persons attend every day, or are there any considerable number absent one day and present another?—I am not prepared exactly to answer the question accurately; but this I can say, that there are some lectures, at the delivery of which individuals make their appearance, who do not attend the course regularly—some favourite subjects attract crowds; but in general, I think, we have the same people attending through the course, with that single exception; where there is an interesting apparatus to be exhibited we have of course a much greater number attending.

Have you occasion to observe that the same persons attend repeatedly?—I have had several people attending from the time that I began to lecture till the present time.

What proportion of females attend?—I have never estimated: there are a good number of women.

Is it one third, or one half?—I should suppose nearly one third, as well as I could guess.

What number of lectures do you deliver?—From twenty-two to twenty-six. I believe the last astronomical course, which was the shortest, was either three or four-and-twenty; the other courses are twenty-four to twenty-six.

At what period do you begin to lecture?—Our regular time for lecturing is either in the month of March or in the month of June. This last year I have been prevented by illness—by an attack in my lungs, from delivering the course. If the lectures are not delivered in the course of the year I shall not take any remuneration for them.

Have you any hope of being able to resume your lecturing in the course of the year?—To be candid, I think that the great increase of my professional duties lately, will compel me to resign the situation I hold in the Institution.

What subjects do you comprehend in your lectures from time to time?—Mechanics, optics, hydraulics, hydrostatics, sounds, electricity and astronomy.

Are the lectures advertised in the papers?—Always.

Have you reason to believe that the persons that attend your class of lectures attend also the other classes?—I believe that a great number that attend my class attend all the lectures: that, I should expect to be more particularly the case among the younger students.

Is the larger proportion of the persons that attend the class what you would call younger students, or is it attended by adults?—A great number of adults attend, but the proportion of juvenile students has been lately greatly increased by the liberty given to the different masters of the respectable Schools to send some of their boys—I believe six from each School.

Has that practice been attended with advantage?—I think it has been attended with very material advantage.

Has it ever occurred to you to consider whether a small payment might not be advantageously required from the persons attending the lectures, and the proceeds either applied to the benefit of the lecturer entirely, or in part to the lecturer, and in part to the Institution?—I should suppose that would depend in a great measure upon the class likely to attend, and the increased facility given by the enlargement of the lecture-room, so as to hold a greater number. I have always thought that if a man were to devote his whole time to the business of the professorship, something more ought to be afforded to men of character and literary attainments than they can have at the Cork Institution. Holding the situation of professor there, if I were to give up my professional engagements, I should certainly expect a very handsome addition to my present emoluments there; but I have been content with the salary I have had there, and endeavoured always conscientiously to give a fair return for it, without entering into the question whether any addition were desirable.

Do you think that a small payment would discourage the attendance very materially?—I think many individuals might be got who would attend the lectures if the liberty were given of attending at a small sum. The shutting out the proprietors from their privileges would of course bring a great number of people to the lectures that cannot now attend; but my idea is that if there were a larger lecture-room we might have a very large class, small sums being required; but if I may be allowed to speak my own feelings upon the subject, if I were to give a course of lectures on my own account, a course of astronomy suppose, and I had a private apparatus, and was at the whole expense of those lectures, I should prefer having a certain number at a guinea a ticket, and giving gratuitous tickets to others who could not afford that sum rather than taking a smaller sum.

Do not you think that there is always an objection on the part of persons attending lectures to pay, when any considerable number of persons in the same situation with themselves are admitted freely?—It might be so; it would appear to me rather a desirable thing, if the object were to enlarge the class, to have a sum of money advanced for the purpose of enlarging the lecture-room; it would be advanced but once, and in that case there being room to accommodate

Dr.
James Willes,

accommodate a larger class, I think a small sum might be taken; but it appears to me that that sum should not be in the first instance divided between the Professor and the Institution; but it should be considered as an aid to enable the Institution to pay its Professors; and I do believe that the Professors would in that case be glad to have an enlarged class at the same salary that they have at present; for my own part, nothing would delight me so much as to have 500 people to lecture to, because it would be a stimulus and encouragement.

Do you entertain any doubt that if the room was large enough to accommodate more persons, many more would be found to attend?—I believe that many more would attend if the liberty of attendance were more readily had; I may mention the Mechanics Institute as an example. Mr. Lardner gave a course of Lectures on Mechanics in the spring, which was very well attended; I think that many of the same individuals would be glad to come to our lectures.

Do you know what they paid for the course?—I believe a very small sum; the principle of payment appears to me to be a very excellent one; but it appears to me that it would not be desirable to apply it to our Institution unless a larger class-room could be built; as our room is only capable of accommodating 200 at the utmost, and I think that we should frequently have 400 people.

Do you think that the subjects lectured upon might be advantageously extended. In your view what would be the effect of instituting a lecture on Mathematics competent to go fully into that science?—I am very glad to be asked that question, because I should myself have hinted it to the Commissioners. I am perfectly satisfied that the experiment ought to be made; I have mentioned it at my own lectures; the lectures which I am in the habit of delivering are expressly popular lectures, and have of course excluded me as much as possible from mathematical illustration from their very nature, because the intention is to bring people together to give them a taste for science, and to attract attention by experiment; they are rather courses of experimental illustration than strictly philosophical lectures; but they will lead those who have a taste for the subject to a more minute investigation of it, and I think those who are desirous of pursuing it further, should have scientific lectures, accompanied by a running commentary, in the way of application to practical uses, delivered at least occasionally, if not annually. I think a chain of mathematical propositions shown to be valuable by their application to the arts and practical sciences would be very useful indeed, and though I confess from experience that the attendance would probably not for some time be very numerous, yet I think that many people who are now shut out entirely from such an opportunity, would, if they were instructed in that kind of way, be made useful members of society. I mentioned that I should despair for some little time of seeing a regularly full attendance, because I know that few people would be anxious to have such a course, and one reason for saying so is, that a very eminent lecturer, late fellow of Trinity College, John Walker, who lectured on the philosophy of arithmetic here, and on algebra, was very poorly attended; indeed it was a pitiful thing to see the class that man had, highly qualified, eloquent, and most happy in all his illustrations, that man, I believe, did not command at the end of his class twelve people.

If a lecturer were permanently established, and persons who would be likely to desire to obtain such information knew it to be regularly afforded there, would it not be likely that persons would be found to attend, who would not attend a casual lecture given occasionally, and without much notice?—I think we may reasonably presume, that if there were an established course the number would increase, but the demand, judging from the past attendance, has not appeared to be very great. I feel the thing to be wanting, and I have in my lectures stated my confident hope that at some future day we should have such a course of lectures. If I were to retain the situation I now hold in the Institution much longer, I think I should try the experiment myself.

Do you think that it would be desirable to go still further, and appoint a lecturer in Moral Philosophy, who might also be competent occasionally to enter more largely into general subjects of Literature, perhaps History, ancient and modern?—I should feel no objection to an occasional course in Moral Philosophy; we have had some experiments in the way of Moral Philosophy here already; there was a gentleman of the name of Rennie gave a course some time since, and there was another gentleman gave another course in Moral Philosophy some years ago, and they were pretty well attended.

The Commissioners would be glad to know your opinion with regard to the utility of a part of your Institution which is attended with a good deal of expense, namely, the Botanic Garden; does it answer any very beneficial purpose, either as being instrumental in assisting persons in the study of botany, or for any medical purposes, or for the purpose of naturalizing useful plants, or of making persons acquainted with useful plants, an acquaintance with which they could not otherwise obtain?—I think the Commissioners are asking this question of an ignorant and prejudiced person; I am not a botanist myself; I am not partial to the thing; and perhaps I under-rate that part of the Institution, and therefore I beg to decline giving an opinion about it.

It has been suggested to the Commissioners that it is of considerable use in a medicinal point of view; your situation would naturally induce you to know whether it is so or not?—That we may occasionally find a valuable herb at the Botanical Garden which we cannot find elsewhere I am ready to admit, and that we always find in our Botanical Curator every assistance that we can desire in the examination and description of plants is also very certain, and that is a very pleasant thing to have; but I do not know that any other advantages are derived from the Botanical Garden. As far as relates to medicine, the plants that are valuable are generally very well known by most well-informed medical men.

Dr.
James Willes,
1826.

Is there any thing that you would wish to state to the Commissioners which you think might tend to improve the Institution and put it on a better footing?—I do not recollect that there is; I believe I have stated distinctly my opinion that we would get on better, as far as I can judge, and materially benefit ourselves and the public, if we had a larger lecture-room. I think that is the great thing wanted.

Appendix, N° 8.

Wednesday, 27th September 1826.

The Venerable Archdeacon Thompson having been sworn, was Examined as follows:

Archdeacon
Thompson.
27 September
1826.

ARE you a Proprietor of the Royal Cork Institution?—I am.

Have you been so from its first institution?—No, I have not.

How long is it since you were admitted?—I dare say seventeen or eighteen years.

Have you frequently been a Manager?—I have.

Have you interested yourself much in the concerns of the Institution?—At first I did; I have not latterly; not from the want of feeling an interest in it, or of being perfectly satisfied of the utility that it has been of to the community here, but my own business has prevented me; I have two or three times been a manager for three years, but latterly, since I ceased to be a manager, I have not gone there at all, for I have a great deal to do, partly in the line of my profession, and partly with other engagements in society here, charities and committees of different kinds. I do not think that money was ever better expended by Government than the money that has been allowed for the establishment of that Institution; I have been in Cork nearly thirty years, and have of course had a very good opportunity, being constantly resident, of perceiving the use that resulted from the establishment; it produces a desire of gaining information on the part of the young, both males and females, the consequence of which was, that as they advanced in life, they became a different class of persons from their predecessors, not better perhaps in morality or integrity, but persons of greater intelligence, and better members of society.

In your view it has had the effect of rather raising the tone of the minds of the people?—I think so, decidedly; I think the style of conversation has improved, and the subjects of conversation are different from what they were formerly.

Do you think that that improvement is still in progress?—I have not a doubt of it.

Do you think that the good effects produced by the instruction given by the lectures of the society might be increased, if there existed the means of establishing a lecturer in mathematics and a lecturer in moral philosophy?—The truth is, these questions have been mooted in Cork at different times within the last ten or twelve years, and I am not perfectly satisfied myself upon the subject, nor prepared perhaps to give the Commissioners all the satisfaction they might wish. I think that the lectures which have been delivered have excited a desire in the different descriptions of young persons who attend. I think that if the studies were rendered more abstract, many of them would not be capable of benefiting by them, and many of them would not desire the information, and I doubt whether in that case there might not be a falling off instead of an improvement.

What would be the effect of requiring a small payment from the persons attending the lectures?—I think the result of it would be the absence of many of those persons that now attend,

Would as moderate a payment as half a guinea, or even less than that, have the effect of deterring persons from attending a course consisting of twenty-four lectures?—I am inclined to think it would.

Could any means be devised by which the funds of the Institution could be increased by any subscriptions or donations, to be obtained within Cork itself, or the neighbourhood?—The Society has existed here so long that I think one might form an opinion of the future from the past; it has existed nearly twenty years, and in the way of an increase of books in the library, and of presents of matters of curiosity, I think there have been a good many additions made, but I am not aware of any mode of increasing its utility within the power of the people here; the persons who are proprietors consider that they have a sufficient stake in it, and perhaps would not be disposed to increase it.

The Commissioners observe that the institution goes to a considerable expense in maintaining a botanic garden, will you state what your opinion is as to the utility of that establishment?—My opinion is that the botanic garden has been a mill-stone about the neck of the Institution since its first origin, partly arising from its unfortunate situation; and I am inclined to think that since they contracted for the management of it, its utility has fallen off also; but in truth for three or four years past I have not much attended at the Institution, but whilst I was a manager that was the impression on my mind.

The Commissioners have observed that a very considerable portion of the funds of the Institution is applied in premiums, and other matters for the encouragement of agriculture. Will you state what is your opinion as to the expediency of that part of the expenditure?—Being a citizen of Cork I do not know much of the country, but I believe great benefits have resulted to this country from those agricultural premiums.

As the Institution has now acquired very much of a scientific character, would it not be desirable that the agricultural branch of it should be connected with the Agricultural Society of Ireland, and that the Institution should confine itself rather to subjects of science

Archdeacon
Thompson,
27 September,

science, which it seems to have so beneficially promoted?—I am disposed to think that great benefits would result from that; it would require quite an alteration of the Charter to enable the Board to effect it; the Charter states the Institution to be for promoting improvements in arts and manufactures, especially agriculture. It always appeared to me, that that strong expression in the charter influenced the managers upon all occasions.

Are you acquainted with the mode in which the library of the institution is regulated?—I do not know how it is regulated now, I have not been in the library these three years; when I was manager I was one of the library-committee, but since that, I have not been there.

Has much benefit been derived by the public from the collection of books in the library?—I am sure a vast deal.

Do you believe that the selection of books is properly managed?—I think there are a great many admirable books in the library.

Do you believe that the funds of the Society are economically managed?—I believe they are, for the gentlemen who manage the accounts are men of intelligence, and I believe they are men of the strictest principles.

Can you point out any alteration which you think would have a tendency to make the Institution more beneficial and useful to the public than it is at present?—I am not prepared to offer any recommendation.

Appendix, N^o 9.

Wednesday, 27th September 1826.

Mr. James Drummond having been sworn, was Examined as follows:

WHAT situation do you hold in connection with the Cork Institution?—The situation of curator of the Botanic Garden.

How long have you held it?—Eighteen years.

Were you the first person appointed to that situation?—I was.

What are your duties as connected with it?—I have to superintend the Botanic Garden, to take care of the plants that are given me in charge, to supply the botanic lecturer with specimens of different things that are wanting for him, and to supply the agricultural lecturers with different things to exhibit; grasses and things of that kind.

Who preceded you in the situation you hold?—I was the first person who held the situation.

What is the size of the Botanic Garden?—It was originally six Irish acres, but part of it has been given up for some years past.

What salary do you receive?—When I was agreed with to come here as gardener, I got 100*l.* a year, with a house and an allowance of coals and candles, and about half an acre of ground as a vegetable garden, but that is entirely done away with now, the managers did not like the expense of the garden as it was on the first foundation, and they wished to reduce the expense of it; they allow me now 180*l.* a year, for finding coals, labour and every thing that is required for the garden; the only thing that is excepted is the painting of the hot-house and green-house, and painting the doors; that they do themselves when they wish to have it done, and they pay the rent of the place.

You do not for that money take charge of the whole of the six acres, but it is a part only of that ground that is now appropriated to botanical purposes?—It is only about four acres at present. I had about half an acre of the ground before, and they gave me in addition to that better than an acre to turn it into a nursery.

What proportion of the ground is occupied by a permanent shrubbery?—I should think there is about an acre in the shrubbery at present.

Does that shrubbery contain any shrub that is not to be found in almost every shrubbery in the kingdom?—There are very few shrubberies in Ireland that have so many trees as there are in that, and it would be of no use putting any thing rare in that part, it is so much exposed.

You say that a part of your duty is to take care of the plants, will you describe what your collection of plants consists of?—We have about a hundred different sorts of grasses there; we have about five hundred native plants that are wanting for the lecturers; the native plants are the most important parts of the study of botany,—those we must have convenient to give samples of them; I have to supply specimens of different things; those that grow in the neighbourhood I need not cultivate, for I can find them without: there are about 2,000 indigenous plants, including those in the twenty-fourth class, or cryptogamia of Linnæus.

Do many persons resort to your garden for the purpose of studying botany?—There are not a great many that resort to it for the purpose of studying botany scientifically, but there are a great many that resort to it for the purpose of seeing the flowers; the garden is very badly situated for visitors; there are four months in the year, from November to February when the roads are bad, and very few go there, but in the months of March, April and the following months there are a good many persons who visit it.

What plants do you supply for the use of the agricultural lecturer?—I supply specimens of all the grasses, artificial grasses and natural grasses, that are wanted, and I supply turnips and other things wanted, to exhibit to the class that attends the agricultural lectures.

Mr.
James Drummond,
27 September,
1826.

Mr.
James Drummond,
1826.

Is it not a part of the object of the Institution to naturalize plants that are not indigenous?—It is a part of the object of the Institution to cultivate valuable plants, and to introduce them into the country; I have introduced a great number of very beautiful flowers into the garden. I must observe that a great change has taken place in my situation within these six or seven years past. I was before merely a servant to the Institution, and my duty was to take care of the property of the Institution; but now the garden has become in some sort a nursery. I am obliged to introduce and cultivate such plants as I can find a demand for; 180 l. would be nothing to keep up a garden of four acres; I am satisfied that five or six hundred pounds a year would be the least sum that would be necessary to keep it up as it should be kept up. I have since that time introduced from England a great many things, new and valuable fruit trees and other things.

Which plants you now cultivate for sale?—I now cultivate duplicates for sale.

That extends to all the plants that are much in request?—Yes, flowers and so on; I am obliged to pay a great deal of attention to them.

Is there in this neighbourhood a ready sale for such things?—There is very little sale; I have kept an account for several years since I had the garden, one year with another, till within this last year; I sold about 100 l. worth every year of duplicate plants out of the garden; I sold very little at first, but I had a greater allowance; at first I had 300 l. and that has been gradually reduced, according as I could introduce the plants that are in demand; the plants that are usually kept in botanic gardens are native plants, and many other inconspicuous flowers that may be interesting to botanists, but the principal plants that I sell are plants that the ladies are fond of,—ornamental plants.

Are the plants all properly labelled in the garden?—The grasses were labelled at one time, but they were the only part that were labelled, all the rest were arranged according to the Linnæan system, the native and medicinal plants separately; but when the back part of the garden was given up, we were obliged to include the medicinal plants, and the foreign herbaceous plants along with the native plants: Doctor Taylor and the managers wished to have the native plants arranged differently, and we are now going to arrange them in a separate department, as soon as we can.

Have you succeeded in raising many plants from seeds sent from abroad?—I have raised a good many plants from seed; I raised a very beautiful dianthus, which I distributed about in different places; we have no stove at present that we can keep plants from very hot countries in.

Have you anything but a greenhouse, the heat of which you can regulate?—We have two greenhouses.

We understand that you succeeded in growing a plant from Botany Bay, called the eucalyptus earyophillea?—Yes; I also raised a beautiful new rose that flowers early in May, and I found a beautiful new native plant here, the pinguicala grandiflora of E. Botany, that I have sent to different parts.

You are a corresponding member of the Horticultural Society?—Yes, I am; and an Associate of the Linnæan Society.

You state in one of your reports that you succeeded in raising some species of early brocoli?—There was a plant brought here by one of the proprietors of the Institution from France, and given to the Institution; the plant may be common enough in France.

You also notice in the report having introduced some sort of Brussels sprouts?—That is not cultivated here; they have very bad vegetables in Cork, and it would be desirable to introduce some good kinds of vegetables.

Under the present system of management do not you consider that the Botanic Garden is rather falling off?—It is; the Botanic Garden of course must fall off, and when there is no fund to replace individual plants, that will occasionally fall off under any system of management; a botanic garden should not be connected with a nursery by any means.

Under the present system of management, will not it rapidly become an useful nursery garden?—It is in some degree; but I do not lose any of the plants that are in the garden that it is possible to keep; I pay attention to them as far as possible, and supply them. I am bound by an agreement with the managers to do that, but I do not consider that a good plan for a botanic garden, if it can be avoided.

Do you find the agricultural plants much called for by the lecture on agriculture?—He, (the lecturer on agriculture) gives a course of lectures every season, and he exhibits specimens of those different plants useful in agriculture.

Could those specimens be procured if the garden did not exist?—The specimens for the agricultural lectures might be procured, because they are for the most part common, but the specimens for the botanical course of lectures could not possibly be procured; the most important plants introduced to the notice of botanists are the native plants of their country; now I venture to say, that in any nursery in Ireland, or at all events in Cork, there are not fifty native plants cultivated at a time, and very few nurserymen know any thing about them.

Appendix, N° 10.

Thursday, 28th September 1826.

Mr. Richard Dowden, having been sworn, was Examined as follows:

THE Commissioners understand that you were at one time Librarian to the Cork Institution?—For seven years and a half.

Why did you resign that situation?—Merely because the salary was so small.

Can you suggest to the Commissioners any alteration or improvement in the Cork Institution?—Yes; I think there are a few matters that would be improvements in the Institution. I think one of the most important ones is giving the proprietors generally, with the consent of the managers who are selected, the power of altering their laws when they think fit, with reference to some authority, for instance, the Lord Lieutenant; there is a circumstance in the present rule that has been found very embarrassing;—there are eight or nine visitors who do not reside here, and have no opportunity of knowing the Institution; in fact they never visited the Institution, except perhaps one or two of them, for the seven years and an half that I was librarian,—the consequence is, that they know nothing of the wants of the Institution, or of the progress of it; now if the whole, or the majority of the proprietors, were allowed to recommend changes, and the Lord Lieutenant was made to supply the place of those visitors, he would be far more accessible than eight or nine different persons, perhaps some of them living at a distance.

Can that object be attained without a new charter?—I believe not.

Are there any other premises which the Institution could occupy in the town which are better suited to their purposes than the house they at present have?—I believe there are; the old Custom-house is at present in the hands of Government, in a great degree unoccupied, and they are willing to give it up; they have offered it to the city for the purpose of courts, and I am told that the city are undecided whether they will take it or not; the rent required for it is very moderate, only 70 l. a year; at the same time that the rent is over 240 l.; the holdings over are very bad, and very fragile; they never can be made into a good thing short of knocking them down to the ground and rebuilding them, and it is a wretched-looking place.

Have you any suggestions to make with regard to the library?—Yes; I think that if the library could be opened in the evening it would be of the greatest advantage to this commercial city.

Cannot the library be opened in the evening by the order of the managers, without reference to any higher authority?—I believe it can.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR MAJESTY :

WE, the undersigned Commissioners, nominated and appointed by a Commission under the Great Seal, bearing date the Fourteenth day of June, One thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, propose in this our Eighth Report, to lay before Your Majesty the result of our Inquiry into the state of the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth.

AFTER personally visiting the Institution, we examined at our office in Dublin, such persons as appeared most likely to afford us information of the nature and system of the Establishment. Amongst these were all the Professors; several of the Students; the Most Rev. Dr. Murray, (who had been President, and is now a Visitor of the Institution); the Rev. Mr. Kenney, of Clongowes, (who had been Vice-President); the Right Rev. Dr. Mac Hale, who lately held the Professorship of Dogmatic Theology, and several individuals, formerly Students in the College, who since leaving it, have conformed to the Protestant religion.

We did not conceive that it fell within our province to examine into the tenets of the Roman Catholic religion, except where they appeared to be connected with the civil duties and relations of Roman Catholics, either to the State, or to their fellow-subjects.

Keeping in view the distinction now stated, we inquired into the doctrine taught at Maynooth, respecting Oaths and Vows; the several cases in which they are either held to be null from the beginning, or cease to be binding; and the extent of the power of dispensation from their obligations, claimed by the Pope, and by Roman Catholic bishops.

We have also inquired particularly into the views entertained of the Oaths and Declaration of Allegiance required from Roman Catholics by law.*

We

* The following are the Oaths prescribed by law to be taken by Roman Catholics :

I, A. B. do take Almighty God, and His only Son Jesus Christ, my Redeemer, to witness, That I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to our most gracious Sovereign Lord King George the Third, and him will defend to the utmost of my power against all conspiracies and attempts whatever that shall be made against his Person, Crown and Dignity; and I will do my utmost endeavour to disclose and make known to his Majesty and his Heirs, all treasons and traitorous conspiracies which may be formed against him or them; and I do faithfully promise to maintain, support and defend, to the utmost of my power, the succession of the Crown in his Majesty's Family, against any person or persons whatsoever; hereby utterly renouncing and abjuring any obedience or allegiance unto the person taking upon himself the stile and title of Prince of Wales in the lifetime of his father, and who since his death is said to have assumed

cap. 35.

We have also examined into the nature of what are usually called The Gallican Liberties, and how far the principles of these liberties are adopted or rejected at Maynooth.

We have inquired at the same time, into the nature of the distinctions between what are known by the names of The Ultra-Montane and Cis-Alpine doctrines, and how far either are inculcated in the College.

We have also examined into the views taught or entertained respecting the jurisdiction, authority and infallibility of the Pope, of the authority attributed to the Pope's bulls, and to the decrees of general councils, and as to the bearing and import of some of the most remarkable of both; and also as to the boundaries that are held to separate spiritual from temporal matters.

We have also examined the Professor of Canon Law as to the maxims of that law, upon a variety of important subjects, and how far the Canon Law of Rome is considered to be binding in Ireland.

In connection with the different topics arising in the course of our inquiry, we likewise considered the Class books, which are at present used by the several Professors in their lectures; and a very frequent reference to them will be found in the course of the examination.

We have also sought information as to the views entertained, taught, or inculcated by the Professors, to whom it more particularly appertained to form the opinions of the students on these subjects, respecting the authority, character, and rights of the Established Church.

We have in particular inquired into a breach of the statutes by the late Professor of Dogmatic Theology, the Right Rev. Dr. Mac Hale, now a co-adjutor bishop in the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, in printing and causing to be sold in the College, whilst he held the office of Professor there, a political publication written by assumed the stile and title of King of Great Britain and Ireland, by the name of Charles the Third, and to any other person claiming or pretending a right to the Crown of these Realms; and I do swear that I do reject and detest as unchristian and impious to believe, that it is lawful to murder or destroy any person or persons whatsoever for or under pretence of their being Heretics, and also that unchristian and impious principle, that no faith is to be kept with Heretics; I further declare, that it is no article of my faith, and that I do renounce, reject, and abjure the opinion that Princes excommunicated by the Pope and Council, or by any authority of the see of Rome, or by any authority whatsoever, may be deposed or murdered by their subjects, or by any person whatsoever; and I do promise that I will not hold, maintain or abet any such opinion, or any other opinion contrary to what is expressed in this declaration; and I do declare, that I do not believe that the Pope of Rome, or any other Foreign Prince, Prelate, State or Potentate, hath or ought to have any temporal or civil jurisdiction, power, superiority or pre-eminence directly or indirectly within this Realm; and I do solemnly in the presence of God, and of His only Son Jesus Christ, my Redeemer, profess, testify and declare, that I do make this declaration and every part thereof in the plain and ordinary sense of the words of this Oath, without any evasion, equivocation, or mental reservation whatever, and without any dispensation already granted by the Pope, or any authority of the see of Rome, or any person whatever, and without thinking that I am or can be acquitted before God or man, or absolved of this declaration, or any part thereof, although the Pope or any other person or persons or authority whatsoever shall dispense with or annul the same, or declare that it was null and void from the beginning.

I, A. B. do hereby declare, That I do profess the Roman Catholic religion. I, A. B. do swear, that I do abjure, condemn and detest, as unchristian and impious, the principle that it is lawful to murder, destroy, or any ways injure any person whatsoever for or under the pretence of being an heretic, and I do declare solemnly before God, that I believe that no act in itself unjust, immoral or wicked, can ever be justified or excused by or under pretence or colour that it was done either for the good of the Church, or in obedience to any Ecclesiastical power whatsoever; I also declare, that it is not an article of the Catholic faith, neither am I thereby required to believe or profess that the Pope is infallible, or that I am bound to obey any order in its own nature immoral, though the Pope or any Ecclesiastical power should issue or direct such order; but on the contrary, I hold that it would be sinful in me to pay any respect or obedience thereto; I further declare, that I do not believe that any sin whatsoever committed by me, can be forgiven at the mere will of any Pope, or of any priest, or of any person or persons whatsoever; but that sincere sorrow for past sins, a firm and sincere resolution to avoid future guilt and to atone to God, are previous and indispensable requisites to establish a well-founded expectation of forgiveness; and that any person who receives absolution without these previous requisites, so far from obtaining thereby any remission of his sins, incurs the additional guilt of violating a sacrament; and I do swear, that I will defend to the utmost of my power the settlement and arrangement of property in this country as established by the laws now in being; I do hereby disclaim, disavow, and solemnly abjure any intention to subvert the present Church Establishment for the purpose of substituting a Catholic Establishment in its stead; and I do solemnly swear, that I will not exercise any privilege to which I am or may become entitled, to disturb and weaken the Protestant Religion and Protestant Government in this Kingdom.

by himself, in which the policy of discontinuing the Established Church in Ireland was largely discussed.

We have also examined whether there was reason to suppose, that any relations of influence or connection, exist between the College of Maynooth and the Order of the Jesuits; and under this part of our inquiry, we have been led to inquire into the nature of an Institution lately introduced into the College, called "The Sodality of the Sacred Heart of Jesus."

Upon the subjects above enumerated, and some others connected with them, which we forbear to specify more minutely, we are under the necessity of referring generally to the examinations of the witnesses, and of abstaining from the attempt to offer any analysis of them, or to express any opinion of our own; partly, because upon many of these points the evidence scarcely admits of condensation, and partly, because the Members of this Board do not agree in the conclusions to be drawn from them.

The Examinations to which we here more particularly refer, are those of

Rev. Dr. Higgins.

Most Rev. Dr. Murray.

The Rev. Mr. Kenney.

Rev. Philip Dowley.

Rev. Matthias Crowley.

Mr. Edmund Molony.

Mr. William Rogers.

Feeling ourselves, for the reasons above given, precluded from entering further into the consideration of the subjects referred to, although we are fully sensible, that they constitute the most important part of our inquiry, we shall proceed to state briefly the history of the Institution, the general outline of its Establishment, and the duties allotted to its Professors; subjects which do not involve the difficulties existing in the former case.

The College of Maynooth was established by an Act of the Irish Parliament passed in the year 1795, intituled, "An Act for the better Education of Persons 35 Geo. 3. c. 21. professing the Popish or Roman Catholic Religion."

Certain persons were therein appointed Trustees for "establishing, endowing, and maintaining one Academy for the Education only of persons professing the Roman Catholic religion." They were empowered to "receive subscriptions and donations, and to purchase and acquire lands not exceeding the annual value of £. 1,000, and to erect and maintain all such buildings as may be by the said Trustees deemed necessary for the lodging and accommodation of the President, Masters, Professors, Fellows and Students, who shall from time to time be admitted into, or reside in such Academy."

They were empowered also to appoint a President, and such Professors and Scholars, together with their necessary attendants, as to them should seem fit, and to make bye-laws, rules, regulations and statutes for the government of all such persons as should be on the foundation—such bye-laws to be laid before the Lord Lieutenant (if not affecting the exercise of the Roman Catholic religion,) and to be binding if not disapproved of within a month.

The Trustees were invested by this Act, with a superintending and visitorial power over the Institution.

It was provided also, that the Trustees, and all persons whatsoever having any place on the foundation, including Officers and Students, should take the oath prescribed by the Act of the 13th and 14th Geo. 3. c. 35. which we have set forth in a Note to page 3.

The Act further granted to the Trustees a sum of £. 8,000 towards "establishing the said Academy."

Two other Acts have since been passed relating to the Institution, the 40th 40 Geo. 3. c. 85. Geo. 3. c. 85. and the 48th Geo. 3. c. 145. By the first, the Lord Chancellor, the two Chief Justices, the Chancellor and Chief Baron of the Exchequer for the time being in Ireland, and their successors; together with Arthur James, Earl of Fingall, the Rev. Richard O'Reilly, of Drogheda, Doctor in Divinity, and the Rev. John Thomas Troy, of the city of Dublin, Doctor in Divinity, were appointed Visitors, and directed to hold a triennial visitation at Maynooth, and diligently to for buildings, as hereafter mentioned. In the subsequent year, the grant was £. 8,972, which was continued until the year 1813, when it was raised to £. 9,673, Irish, which sum has been granted annually ever since.

The most important addition which has been made to the funds of the Institution from any private source, was derived under the will of the late Lord Dunboyne, who had been a Roman Catholic Bishop, but conformed to the Established Church. When dying, he bequeathed his property to the College. This bequest became a subject of litigation between his heir at law and the devisees. The suit was compromised under the powers of the Act of 1808, by the division of the property between the parties. From this source, the College receives annually £. 500, of which a special application has been made by the Trustees, as we shall notice hereafter.

Twenty Burses, as they are called, have been founded in the College; six of £. 30 per annum each, were endowed by Doctor O'Sullivan, a physician from Halifax, (N. A.) and others have been endowed by different persons, for students from particular districts.

Mr. Patrick Sawey, of Downpatrick, left £. 1,000, to found a burse for one student; and the College has received a legacy of £. 1,000, under the will of Mr. Keenan, the interest of which is applied towards paying the salary of a Professor of the Irish language.

As the Parliamentary grants, together with the private endowments, are not sufficient to provide for the support of all the students in the College, a portion of them, as hereafter explained more particularly, pay either the whole or part of their expenses. The money received for pensions and entrance money from students, for the year ended 5th January 1826, amounted to £. 2,420.

The superintendence and instruction of the students are committed to the following officers and professors.

The Very Rev. Dr. Crotty, President.
 The Rev. Michael Montague, Vice President.
 The Rev. Philip Dowley, Senior Dean.
 The Rev. Lawrence Renehan, Junior Dean.
 The Rev. Dr. Slevin, Librarian and Prefect of the Dunboyne Establishment.
 The Rev. John Cummins, Bursar.
 The Rev. Dr. Higgins, Professor of Dogmatic Theology.
 The Rev. Dr. Delahogue, Emeritus - do.
 The Rev. Dr. Anglade, Professor of Moral Theology.
 The Rev. James Browne, Professor of Sacred Scripture and Hebrew.
 The Rev. Dr. Callan, Professor of Natural Philosophy.
 The Rev. Charles M'Nally, Professor of Logic, Metaphysics and Ethics.
 The Rev. Jeremiah Donovan, Professor of Rhetoric and Belles Lettres.
 The Rev. Patrick Carew, Professor of Greek and Latin.
 The Rev. Christopher Boylan, Professor of English Elocution, and the French Language.
 Vacant, Professor of Irish.
 The Rev. Mr. Flanagan, Secretary.
 Alexander Knox, Esq. Agent.
 Thomas Lee, Esq. Physician.
 Edward Kelly, Esq. Apothecary.

The respective duties of the Professors and other officers of the College, will be found so fully detailed in their several examinations, that we shall content ourselves with a brief notice of them.

The President and Vice President have the control and superintendence of the Establishment. They are assisted by a Council of the House, consisting of the two Deans, and the three Theological Professors.

The discipline of the College is entrusted to the charge of the two Deans.

The nomination of the Professors is committed to the Trustees. The statutes of the College provide, that the election shall be made upon a competition of candidates, or, as it is termed, a concursum. This mode of election has, as yet, only been once acted upon, namely, in the recent instance of Dr. Higgins to the chair of Dogmatic Theology.

Theology. The Trustees have however determined, that this mode shall be resorted to on all future occasions.

There are at present 391 students in the College; of these 250 are on the Establishment; 110 are Pensioners; 20 are Bursers; 11 are on the Dunboyne Class.

The expense of maintaining the 250 students who are on the Establishment, is defrayed out of the money granted annually by Parliament, at the rate of £.23 for each student.

Those who appear on the list as pensioners, may be considered as providing for themselves.

The power of nominating the free students on the Establishment, is allotted to the Roman Catholic bishops; and the appointments are divided among them according to a scale laid down in the statutes, and adapted to the extent and circumstances of their respective districts. Each student continues connected with the district from which he has been originally recommended, and to which he is destined ultimately to return as a priest. The students, whether free or not, are all recommended by their respective bishops. If admitted at once on the Establishment, a student pays eight guineas to the general fund of the house. If admitted as pensioner, he pays a deposit of four guineas, and a like sum in addition, whenever he is afterwards placed on the Establishment. Each pensioner pays annually 20 guineas for his maintenance; instruction and lodging being provided for him without any charge.

The bishops frequently divide between two persons the advantage of any free studentship which may be at their disposal. These persons are properly designated as half pensioners. The expense which each student must necessarily incur in the first year of his admission into the College, as a pensioner or half pensioner, including clothes and furniture, is stated as amounting to between £.40 and £.50.

The Trustees have appropriated the money arising from the bequest of Lord Dunboyne, to the support of a class of twenty students, who, in passing through the regular course of education, shall have exhibited more than ordinary talent and good conduct. It was intended that the persons in this class should remain for an additional period of three years in the College. The Trustees having represented to His Majesty's Government, "that the money arising from the Dunboyne fund" should be applied exclusively in the manner above stated," obtained, in the year 1813, an addition of £.700 to the annual Parliamentary grant, in order to make up the sum necessary for the support of twenty such students.

We found, however, at the period of our inquiry, only eleven individuals in this class. As a reason for this diminished number, we were informed that the demand for priests, particularly in the province of Ulster, had been lately so urgent, as not to admit of the Dunboyne students completing their additional course of three years within the College.

The estimated Annual Expense of the Establishment, together with the detailed accounts of the expenditure for the last three years, will be found in the Appendix.

No sum appears to have been particularly voted by Parliament, for buildings, with the exception of an addition of £.5,000 to the usual grant of £.8,000 in the year 1808, for that specific purpose. The Trustees, however, acting under the general powers entrusted to them, have expended altogether a sum of £.41,913. 3s. Irish, in the erection of buildings, since the commencement. In this sum are not included the expenses annually incurred for repairs, or changes made in buildings already erected, nor of the wall lately built to inclose the College grounds.

The above expenditure for buildings, although not brought under the view of Parliament in the Annual Estimates, has been regularly accounted for before the Commissioners of Imprest Accounts, and, through their Reports, brought before Parliament. This practice seems to have prevailed more or less in other public institutions in Ireland. A course somewhat of the same nature has also been pursued with respect to the additional Parliamentary grant of £.700 per annum, made for the support of the Dunboyne class. Great part of it has been employed in building; the limitation of the numbers in that Establishment having admitted of such an application.

The College of Maynooth supplies at present about fifty candidates annually for holy orders. It is stated to us, that eighty or ninety are annually required by the different parishes throughout Ireland.

Besides

Besides the priests educated in Maynooth, we are informed that about one hundred and twenty students are in the course of education in other seminaries in Ireland. The greater part of these are at Carlow; others are at Kilkenny, Tuam, Waterford, and Wexford.

It appears further, that there are about one hundred and forty students for the Roman Catholic priesthood, now at different Colleges on the Continent. Seventy of these are in the Irish College at Paris; about twelve at Rome; and the remainder at Salamanca, Lisbon, and different private French seminaries.

Before a student can be admitted at Maynooth, he must undergo an examination, which varies in its character according to the class into which he is to be admitted.

The degree of proficiency required for the different classes, is as follows;

For admission to the Second Class of Humanity:

- | | | |
|--------|---|--|
| Latin: | { | Cæsar's Comm. 1st and 2d books de Bello Gallico.

| Greek: | { | Homer's Iliad, 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th books.
Demosthenes's four Philippicks, and De Coronâ.
Longinus De Sublimi. |

An opinion has prevailed, that the free Education which the bounty of the legislature has provided at Maynooth, has both induced and enabled persons of a much lower class to enter into the Roman Catholic Priesthood, than those who formerly filled the ministerial office, and who without such aid, could not have prepared themselves for holy orders. We collect however from the evidence, that this effect has not been produced; and that the cost of the previous education, the expenses of admission, and the charge which still attends the course of instruction at Maynooth, accompanied by other regulations adopted by the Roman Catholic Bishops, have prevented this result.

Dr. Crotty estimates the First Year's Expenditure of a Pensioner, as follows:

Outfit in Clothes and travelling to Maynooth	-	-	-	£. 17
Furniture of Rooms and College Dress	-	-	-	10
Deposit (of which £. 4. is paid at entrance) and	15s.	to Refectory	-	-	-	9
Yearly Pension	-	-	-	21
Yearly allowance for Sundries and Washing	-	-	-	12
				£. 69

It is the practice of each Roman Catholic Bishop to hold an annual meeting in his district, for the attendance of the young men destined for holy orders; the Bishop appoints Examiners for the purpose of selecting those who are best qualified. The usual age of admission is seventeen. A student on his admission, generally commences with the Humanity class, in which he continues for one year. The class is exercised in Latin and Greek, in translation and composition, and in Grecian and Roman history.

The students during their first year in the College, further attend the Lectures of Mr. Montague, the Vice President, on two days of the week, and from him receive catechetical instruction in the work called Christian Doctrine, and hear Lectures in the Old Testament. A more detailed account of the business of this class will be found in Mr. Carew's evidence.

At the end of the year, the students of this class are transferred to that of Rhetoric and Belles Lettres, which consists at present of Fifty-four students. The Professor, Mr. Donovan, has drawn up a treatise upon Rhetoric, which is committed to memory by the students.

They are also called upon to prepare compositions in Greek, Latin and English. Amongst other books read by this class, are Demosthenes, Longinus and Quintilian. Four Prizes are given at the close of each year, and the students are then examined publicly as to their proficiency in the different objects of their studies.

From the class of Rhetoric and Belles Lettres, they pass into the class of Logic, Metaphysics and Ethics. This consists at present of sixty students.

We learn from Dr. Crotty, that the treatise used in the Logic class, is a portion of a work published in France, called Philosophia Lugdunensis, in which some changes were made by Dr. Anglade, when it was reprinted for the use of the College. It is the practice in this as well as in the other classes, that the students should prepare themselves each day in a certain portion of the class book, and the Professor in his lecture on the subject, illustrates it by a reference to various authors. The Professor of Logic stated, that the works he chiefly refers to in his lectures, are Thomas Aquinas, Bossuet on Universal History, L'Art de penser, Clarke on the Being and Attributes of God, Malebranche's récherche de la Vérité, Locke on the Understanding, Beattie on Truth, Reid's Enquiry into the Human Mind, Blackstone's Commentaries, and Paley's Natural Theology and Moral Philosophy.

When the students are somewhat advanced in the Logic course, there is on one day in the week an exercise in Scholastic disputation.

In this class, the Professor addresses the students in Latin, who usually give their answers in the same language.

With respect to Ethics, it is stated that interruptions sometimes prevent the entire course being gone through within the year.

After a year passed in the class of Logic, Metaphysics and Ethics, the students are transferred to that of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy, which consists at present, of seventy-five persons. Dr. Callan the Professor, informs us that he pursues what he understands to be the Cambridge Course of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy, except so far as relates to Geometry and Trigonometry; the books used upon these subjects having been prepared by Mr. Darré, formerly the Professor of Logic at Maynooth.

The students of this class, are stated to have for the most part but little previous knowledge of these subjects, and it is hardly to be expected that during the ten months months of which the Academical year consists, they can in general make a great proficiency in the very extensive course which it is sought to comprehend.

Dr. Crotty says, "the time is so short, that a large portion of the class cannot be expected to be very profound in natural knowledge, but many who have witnessed the progress they have made at their examinations at the close of the year, have been surprized to find that one third, and often one half of the class, have given astonishing proofs of their industry and talent for those studies."

After four years passed in the classes which we have already noticed, the students are transferred to the class of Divinity, the most numerous, as well as the most important in the course of their instruction. It contains at present nearly two hundred.

In this class they remain for three years, which period comprizes the full course of divinity given in the College.

There are three distinct Professors in this department, Dr. Higgins, who fills the Chair of Dogmatic Theology; the Rev. Dr. Anglade, Professor of Moral Theology, and the Rev. James Browne, Professor of Hebrew and Sacred Scripture. All the students of this class are assembled at the same time. There are nine hours in the week occupied in these lectures, which last each one hour.

From sixty to seventy students on an average enter the Divinity class every year.

The lectures are so arranged that each treatise shall always recur once in the period of three years. These treatises are distinct and independent of each other, and consist of ten volumes, five of Dogmatic and five of Moral Theology. The former are :

- Tom 1. Tractatus De Religione.
 2. Tractatus De Ecclesiâ Christi.
 3. Tractatus De Mysterio S. S. Trinitatis.
 4. Tractatus De Sacramento Pœnitentiæ.
 5. Tractatus De Sacramentis in Genere.

The latter five consist of

- Tom 1. Theologia Moralis.
De Actibus Humanis, De Conscientiâ, De Legibus, De Virtutibus, et De Peccatis.
 2. De Præceptis Decalogi, cum Appendice, De Præceptis Ecclesiæ, et De Obligationibus Clericorum.
 3. De Simoniâ, De Censuris, et Irregularitatibus.
 4. De Ordine, et De Matrimonio.
 5. De Baptismo, De Confirmatione,
De Extremâ Unctione, De gratiâ Dei,
Et De Deo.

The first five volumes were compiled by Dr. Delahogue, a native of Paris, and Doctor of the Faculty of Sorbonne, and who was for many years Professor of Dogmatic Theology in Paris, and subsequently in the College of Maynooth.

The Theologia Moralis was first printed in France, and prepared by Mr. Bailly, a French ecclesiastic.

The doctrines inculcated in Dr. Delahogue's works, are stated to us to be in accordance with those of the Sorbonne; and the instruction given in the Divinity classes generally at Maynooth, we are assured does not differ materially from that given in the University of Paris.

The Divinity class receives also two lectures weekly of an hour each, in Scripture History; a particular chapter (or more than one if necessary) is marked out, and the students are required to be prepared to analyze and explain it. The Latin Vulgate is used, but the Greek text is referred to for illustration. The particular mode of instruction adopted will be found detailed in the evidence of Mr. Browne.

In addition to the hour appropriated for the Scripture lecture, on one day in the week, the Professor employs an extra half-hour in hearing the students comment on the Gospels or Epistles appointed for the following Sunday; and the senior members of the class, in succession, are called upon to preach a sermon on Sundays and holidays.

The Scripture lectures are confined principally to the more difficult portions of the New Testament, but passages of the Old are occasionally discussed. A new course of lectures on the Scriptures, is commenced every year. The Class Book, which is used in the explanation given of the New Testament, is the Commentary of Menochius; but occasionally other comments are referred to by the Professor, when disputed texts are to be explained.

The students are also further exercised by means of public disputation, once in the month. A chapter in the Bible is selected and they are called upon to argue on it, one against another.

At the end of the year a public examination is held, when, during three days, all are examined to ascertain the proficiency which they have made.

There is also an Hebrew class formed out of the Divinity students. It consists of twelve or thirteen persons, and is held on one day of the week for one hour. All the students of the Divinity class are at liberty to attend, but they are said to be generally so engaged with their other studies, as to find little time for the study of Hebrew. There is also, an annual public examination in Hebrew, at the end of the year, similar to that before alluded to with reference to the Scripture class.

Many of the students of the Divinity class from Munster and Connaught, and some from the other provinces, attend the Professor of Irish, from 5 to 6 o'clock in the evening, during the second year of the course.

All the Divinity class have access to the library from 10 till 2, every day, except Wednesdays, and they avail themselves of the privilege very generally.

The election for the Dunboyne class takes place once a year. The merits of the candidates are ascertained by previous examinations, but more particularly by their having obtained premiums, or other distinctions, in their last year in the Divinity class. It is not open to all the students to become candidates, but a list is made out by the President of those who are to be proposed, in which none can be included but such as have obtained the distinctions before mentioned, and who likewise have the approbation of the council of the house, as to their conduct.

Dr. Slevin is Prefect of the Dunboyne class, and his duties in that character, are to direct the studies and superintend the morals of the students. They have no other instructor, except the Professor of Hebrew. They assemble together in class three times a week, at the same hours with the other classes. They study Divinity, Canon Law, and Ecclesiastical history. The books used are, for Divinity, the general class books of the house. For Canon Law, Cabassutius's Theoria and Praxis Juris Canonici. On Ecclesiastical History, there is no particular class book; their studies in Latin and Greek, and subjects of general literature, are left to their own discretion.

The students in the Dunboyne class are also exercised in composition. Four prizes are allotted annually to them, one for Theology, one for Ecclesiastical History, one for Canon Law, and one for an Essay or Exercise in Composition.

In addition to the several class books, we have been furnished with a list of other works recommended by the different Professors for the perusal of the students, or referred to in the course of lecturing. A list of them will be found in the Appendix.

The students are at liberty to purchase books for their private use, under certain regulations. A bookseller frequently attends at the Porter's lodge to offer books for sale, but it is required that a list of the works so offered, should be previously furnished for the inspection of the proper authorities.

It is the duty of the Dean to examine the books which each student brings with him into College, and it is a general rule that none shall afterwards be introduced without being submitted to the Dean's inspection; and if any student should read any book prohibited by the President or Dean, he is by the statutes of the College liable to expulsion. It is a part of the Dean's duty to examine occasionally what books are in their possession.

We visited the apartments of several of the students of the Dunboyne class, and found them furnished with a very considerable collection of books in different classes of literature.

The Board of Trustees have prohibited the introduction of newspapers under penalty of expulsion; but the statute has not been submitted to the Lord Lieutenant in the manner prescribed by the Act of Parliament, and consequently has not at present the force of a law. It appears accordingly, that the rule is not strictly observed; and the Dean states that as the law now stands, the superiors have not thought themselves warranted in inflicting severe punishment for its infraction.

An ordination is held annually at Maynooth, when such persons only are ordained as are presented for that purpose by the College. The students usually remain in the Institution until they are upon the point of receiving priests' orders. The general rule is, to give the order of Sub-deacon to such as have finished the first year of their studies in the Divinity class; to give that of Deacon to those who have finished the second year; and that of Priesthood when they have completed the course.

The Trustees assemble twice in the year, in the months of January and June. The Board is generally well attended, and inquiries are made into the state of the house. The accounts also are particularly inspected at both meetings.

The visitations are held once in three years; on those occasions the Lord Chancellor is the person who generally opens the visitation. He calls upon the President to state, whether since the last visitation there has been any infraction of rule, or any thing irregular in the College, to require the intervention of the Visitors to remove or suppress; he afterwards calls upon the students to know whether they have any complaints to make against the President or the other Superiors. The business gone through at the visitation, does not appear generally to occupy more than an hour.

The discipline maintained in the College is stated to differ very little from that which is observed in other Institutions for the Education of the Roman Catholic Clergy. In preserving and enforcing discipline, the ordinary mode of proceeding, as pointed out by the statute, is thus stated to us by the Dean. Any Student neglecting his duty, or habitually violating any of the rules of the College, is cited before the President who privately admonishes him. If he is found to repeat the offence, he is in like manner admonished a second and a third time; and if after the third admonition, he is found not to amend his conduct, he is liable to be removed from the College. The Dean states, that this proceeding would not alone be sufficient to maintain due discipline, but that there are other considerations influencing the minds of the students, particularly the fear of exclusion from orders, which he represents as operating more powerfully than any punishment to which they resort.

The statutes authorize also the imposition of fines, but it is a mode of punishment seldom or never resorted to.

No minute is entered or registry kept of the students who are either removed or expelled from the house. But every year an account of all expulsions is submitted to the Trustees, and each bishop is made acquainted with the removal of any student, who had been recommended by him. The number of those who have been expelled during the thirteen years in which Dr. Crotty has been President, may, he thinks be estimated at from three to four in each year.

No practical restrictions are imposed upon the students in their intercourse with their friends. There is a regulation that all letters either received, or sent out, shall pass through the hands of the Dean; they are, however, never opened by him, although Dr. Crotty states, that it is generally understood in Roman Catholic Colleges, that the Superiors have the right of inspecting the letters of the students. This right, it is stated, has never been exercised at Maynooth.

There is an annual vacation of six weeks in the months of July and August, during which, however, the students do not as a matter of course, leave the College. Permission to go home must be obtained from the Superior.

During vacation the library continues open to the students in the Divinity class, and lectures are appointed in Logic and Natural Philosophy for the junior classes; and it is the wish of the Board, that the students should avail themselves of those opportunities of study. A certain degree of relaxation in the rules and discipline of the house also takes place. The only lectures which the students are obliged to attend are, in Logic, Mathematics, and Natural Philosophy, once a day; and the Divinity students are allowed to spend more time in the library than at other seasons of the year.

The students rise at five in the summer, and at six in the winter months. They assemble in the chapel for morning prayer, after which they pursue their studies until eight, at which hour they attend mass. They then breakfast, and are at liberty to amuse themselves until half past nine; from that time they prosecute their studies until half past ten, when they assemble in the different lecture-rooms, and attend the Professors for one hour, after which half an hour is set apart for recreation. At twelve, study is resumed for two hours; from two till three they attend their several lectures, and they then dine, and are at liberty to amuse themselves until five.

Their studies, either in private or in class, are then resumed, and are continued until eight, when another hour is set apart for recreation. At nine they assemble for the night prayer, after which they retire to their respective rooms, and are required to be in bed at ten o'clock. Wednesdays and Saturdays may be considered as half holidays. On those days they walk in the country, under the superintendence of the Deans.

The students are enjoined to maintain silence during the hours of study, of lecture, and of meals. The obligation is imposed with a view of preserving good order. After the night prayer, when the students retire to their rooms, silence is strictly enjoined until after the morning prayer of the ensuing day*.

The hours of recreation, about four in each day, are those only in which the students are at full liberty to speak to each other during five days of the week. On Wednesdays and Saturdays, and other occasional vacant days, the liberty of speaking is less restricted.

It appears that, on two occasions during the year, five days are set apart for what is called a "Spiritual Retreat," during the whole of which period, a silence, for the purpose of religious meditation, is rigidly preserved. One of these takes place early in September, the other at the period of ordination. The object of these retreats is stated to be, to give an opportunity of pious reflection, and preparation for confession, the confession being made at the conclusion of the retreat.

During these periods the time is principally spent in prayer, in spiritual reading, in exercises of piety, and in attending to spiritual instructions, which are given to the students in the chapel. A portion of the day is allowed for exercise, during which the students walk in solitary contemplation. A subject for meditation is given out on each day, and is explained generally by the conductor of the retreat on the day following. The subjects are such as relate to the duties of clergymen; piety and moral duties; the observance of order, and the preparation for administering the rites and sacraments of the Roman Catholic church.

The reasons which prevent us from entering into the other topics connected with this Institution, have been assigned in the commencement of this Report; and we now proceed to lay before Your Majesty the Evidence which we have taken upon the whole of this important subject.

TRANSLATION of the STATUTES, RULE OF PIETY, &c. from the Original Latin.

The TRUSTEES of the College of Maynooth

To the President, Masters, Students, Pupils, and to the Entire House; Greeting,

WHEREAS by the immortal beneficence of our best and most gracious King, George the Third, father of his country, and by the wise counsel and liberality of the Irish Parliament, a College has been founded and established at Maynooth, in which our countrymen who profess the Roman Catholic Religion may be formed to piety, and instructed in the liberal sciences: And whereas neither house nor state can stand in safety, much less be improved, unless it be regulated by the wholesome ties of law, aided by the assiduity and integrity of its magistrates; for these reasons, We, your Trustees and Patrons, in full and lawful assembly convened and vested with all authority, so that whatever laws or ordinances, or whatever regulations regarding morals we shall have enacted, and whatever laws or ordinances we shall have annulled, or whatsoever we shall have changed, shall all be done in all due form; and observing that to your original laws many points have been wanting, and these of the highest moment, and providing for this deficiency with all possible care, we have after due consultation, proposed, enacted, and do now appoint other regulations; the force of the laws which had previously existed being annulled, and those only being retained which we shall solemnly recite and impose anew: Now consider the laws themselves, which are as follows:

Appendix, N° 6.

(Translation of N° 4.)CHAPTER FIRST:—Concerning the Household and Members of the College.

First,—then let the Community consist of the following persons: of a President, Assistants, Professors, Senior Students, Students. The distinct and accurate recital of their several functions and duties, and the rehearsal of the various laws by which the Community at large is to be regulated, will comprise our entire system of jurisprudence.

CHAPTER SECOND:—Concerning the President.

I. Now this being an unshaken principle, that the happiest state of society is obtained only when laws, just in themselves, shall find upright guardians and obedient citizens, it is of the greatest importance that we should have as magistrate and defender of our laws, a person who may be deemed adequate to receive so great an authority. Wherefore let the President be a person recommended by piety, gentleness, and learning, it being his principal care narrowly to observe the different departments, that no one may be inattentive to the duties assigned him. Such a person in fine, is to be selected, on whom no suspicion can rest, either of partiality or prejudice, concerning whom no doubt can be entertained, but that in his most weighty charge, he is ambitious of one most desirable object, viz. the enforcement of rule with moderation; a person in a word, who considers that all his interests are centered in promoting the good of religion and of the state. He will no doubt recognize in the marks of honour and respect, which it behoves collegians to pay to their President, the ornaments of personal merit, not less than the borrowed insignia of authority.

II. Moreover, let him be a native, a subject of the British empire, not less than thirty years old, in priest's orders, and one who has completed the entire academic course.

III. At every meeting of the members of the College, let the President be the director of all. Let him preside at all literary exercises. Let him admit candidates who may be found worthy. Let him, and him alone, distribute amongst the deserving the premiums, not only such as we have already granted to be given annually, but likewise whatsoever others we may hereafter determine on, as the rewards of distinguished merit.

IV. Let him expel those guilty of offences to which the penalty of expulsion is annexed by the statutes; should any crime be committed, or any neglect of duty occur, not enumerated among those offences which are punished by the statutes with expulsion, and for the cognizance and punishing of which we may have appointed no other person, be it his province to estimate and judge the offence, with this restriction however, that he do not of himself alone, inflict the highest penalty.

V. Likewise let the President, after having consulted the Vice-President and Deans, determine concerning the candidates for holy orders.

VI. At the stated meetings of the board, let him report to this assembly, with all possible accuracy, the state of the entire College, not in a vague or general manner, but by a distinct enumeration of the several circumstances and duties, and in what manner they have been discharged. In order to attain this with more truth and certainty, We deem it consistent with the credit and dignity of the President, that he should direct any of the members of the College, on the certainty of whose report he may depend, to give him their testimony concerning these matters.

VII. Let not the President be absent from the College longer than a month and a half every year; but if a longer absence be unavoidable, by reason of his health or some other weighty cause, let him obtain leave for a longer absence, if, during its meeting, from this Assembly, but if during the recess, from at least two Visitors.

CAPUT TERTIUM:—De Propræside.

I. Verùm hæc tamen negotia, anxia cum sint curæque multiplicis, socium nobis videntur jure suo aliquem poscere, qui onere officiorum dividendo Propræses sit, quique interregni tempore, idemque Præsidis absentia vel morbo impediti operæ et prærogativæ succedat.

II. Hujus quoque esto omnium Academicorum actiones considerare, familiæ totius speculari mores, quodque famæ, disciplinæ, utilitatibus academicis proximum vel ipse vigilando, vel aliunde perlatum comperit, id omne summa cum fide ad Præsidem deferre.

III. Quæ de patriæ, ordinis, ætatis, scientiæque conditionibus Præsidi creando adjuncta sunt, eadem de Propræside creando jubemus.

IV. Propræses domo quotannis mensem haud plus unum ne abscedito; de comineatu impetrando, quibus ipsum Præsidem obnoxium dedimus, iisdem et Propræses legibus tenetur.

V. Si quæ reliqua sunt hujus muneris, suo quaque loco referri poterunt.

CAPUT QUARTUM:—De Magistris Officii.

I. Hic jam si quis secum recogitet quanta a vobis expectentur, quæ metæ sint propositæ, et quam oporteat vi legum æquabili undequaque disciplinam tueri, ut, quasi pacato civitatis statu, mores usu perdiscatis, religionibus colendis sanctitatem, is statim planeque sentiat, tantam causam sustineri non posse istâ publicâ, quam diximus, Præsidis et legati diligentia; quamobrem creandi videntur Academici officii magistri duo quos Decanum Seniore, et Decanum Juniore, appellamus.

II. Decani ordine, patria, pietate, scientiæ dotibus sunt qualem jam esse Præsidem volumus.

III. Decanis officio perpetuo Discipulorum mentes pietatis modestiæque præceptionibus imbuunt; exercitationibus, quæ extra scholas frequentantur, rectores se et adjutores præbent; precibus matutinis intersunt vespertinis; animi remissionibus, spatiis, studiis communibus.

IV. Nocturni interdicti Decani eodem quo Præsides et Propræses jure, alumnorum, si quæ volent, cubicula absque fraude ingrediuntur, idque omnino bis faciunt inter bina sabbata, exploraturi num probæ munditiæ gravitatisque speciem referant libros curiosè inspiciunt, et si justissima suspicio præverit, ipsa quoque, annuente Præsidi scrinia et chartas.

V. Quot mensibus Præsidi narranto, si quid exploratum tenebunt de animis ingeniisque Discipulorum. Quod si Præsides censuerit Decanis, et Pro-Præsidi, ad eam deliberationem adhibitis unum aliquem a S. munere repellendum postea videri, hanc sententiam antistiti ejus, cujus res agitur, literis missis ipse Præsides testificatur; mensibus deinde interjectis duobus, Decano iterum sententiam proponente, Præsides, si antea judicatis steterit, judicatum missum facito.

VI. Delicta, noxas poenâ, ut volent, multâve Decani coercent, tamen ne ad singula crimina plus argentei coronati maximi quintam partem, multæ nomine dicunt. Ii porro, si quem alumnus aut iteratò nocentem, suæ auctoritatis impudenter securum notaverint, apud Præsidem nomen deferunt: hic reum monendo deterreat, quod ni ter admonitus consilium iste cum factis mutaverit, domo pellitur.

VII. Administros quos volent Decani ipsi sibi legunt ex Alumnorum numero, natu maximos, doctrinis proveciores, iique monitores appellandi censuræ laboriosissimæ particulas exercent, dignos fideliter notando deferunt.

VIII. Domum ne plus octo dies continuos reliquant; nec ambo simul quocunque anni tempore a domo absint.

IX. Decanis annuæ absentia dies, sive illi septenarii sint, sive exemptiles, eo numero tantum concedimus, qui solido mensi exæquetur; de comineatu impetrando sunt quæ Præsides conditione.

CHAPTER THIRD:—Concerning the Vice-President.

I. These duties being troublesome and attended with manifold care, seem to us to demand some coadjutor, who by sharing the burden, may serve as Vice-President, and who during an interregnum, and also during the absence or illness of the President, shall succeed to his office and authority.

II. Be it his province also to observe the conduct of all the members of the College, diligently to consider the morals of the entire household, and faithfully to submit to the President whatsoever he may have ascertained, either by his own vigilance or from any other source connected with the character, discipline, and interests of the house.

III. The qualifications required with regard to country, orders, age and attainments in a President, we also require in the person to be appointed Vice-President.

IV. Let not the Vice-President be absent from College more than a month every year; with regard to obtaining leave of absence, let the Vice-President be restricted by the same laws as those to which we have subjected the President.

V. The other duties of this office shall be stated each in its proper place.

CHAPTER FOURTH:—On the Deans.

I. If any one will here consider how much is expected from you, the end proposed to be obtained, and how necessary it is to maintain discipline in every quarter by the equable force of law, in order that, under a tranquil state of things, you may learn morality by practice, and sanctity by the observance of religious duty, he will at once clearly perceive, that so weighty a charge cannot be supported by the official diligence which we have required of the President and his Deputy; wherefore it seems to us necessary to appoint two academic officers, whom we denominate Senior Dean and Junior Dean.

II. Let the Deans possess the same qualifications with regard to orders, country, piety and learning as we have already required in the President.

III. Let the Deans constantly imbue the minds of the Students with the precepts of piety and decorum; let them act as directors and assistants in the exercises practised out of class; let them attend at morning and evening prayers; inspect the Students during the time of relaxation, conduct them during public walks, and visit them whilst at study.

IV. By night and by day let the Deans have the same right as the President and Vice-President to enter, without being chargeable with impropriety, the apartments of the Students, and let them do so twice at least every fortnight, in order to see whether they present the appearance of cleanliness and strict regularity; let them carefully examine the books, and if a well-grounded suspicion shall have previously existed, even the desks and papers, with the consent of the President.

V. If they shall have ascertained any thing with regard to the characters or dispositions of the Students, let them report it every month to the President; but if the President, after consulting with the Deans and Vice President, shall be of opinion that any Student ought to be excluded from holy orders, let the President, by letter, communicate this decision to the Bishop of the person concerned; then, after an interval of two months, the Dean again stating his opinion, let the President, if he adhere to his former decision, dismiss such individual.

VI. Let the Deans punish misdemeanours and offences with a penalty or fine, as they shall determine; however, let them not impose in the way of fine on each offence more than one-fifth of a crown; moreover, if they remark any Student either offending a second time, or through impudence regardless of their authority, let them report his name to the President; let him caution the Student by an admonition; but unless, after being thrice admonished, he shall change his conduct, let him be expelled.

VII. Let the Deans select whatever assistants they shall think fit from among the elder Students, and those more distinguished for their progress in study; let them be called Monitors, and share with the Deans the more minute and arduous duty of inspection; let them faithfully note and report such as may deserve it.

VIII. Let not the Deans be absent from the College for more than eight successive days, and let not both be absent at the same time in any part of the year.

IX. To the Deans we grant a number of days for annual absence equal to an entire month, whether this period be distributed into weeks, or consist of days taken at various intervals. With regard to obtaining leave of absence, let them be circumstanced precisely as the President.

CHAPTER FIFTH:—Concerning the Professors of the Classes.

I. And since the College has been established not only for the purpose of instructing the youth in morals, but likewise in science and polite literature, reason itself suggests the necessity of appointing Masterships in the several departments of Literature, of which let the following be the classes.

Appendix, N^o 4.Statutes of the College of Maynooth.

II. Rerum Theologicarum annuam tractationem, qualis futura est, Præses, Propræses, Magistri Theologici, anticipato consilio, componunto, scilicet quæ capita scientiæ sacrae explicanda sint, qui auctores adhibendi, qui libri versandi: sin aliquam istius doctrinæ partem Magister suo ipse labore collegerit, hanc eidem Consilio permittendam censemus, iudiciumque expectandum.

III. Strenuam operam navato Theologicus Dogmatum Professor, ut Discipulis persuadeat sacrosancta fidei jura esse, quæ Regiæ Majestati obligatos tenent, eamque fidem nulla vi extorqueri posse, nullâ potestate resolvi.

IV. Magistris omnibus a Præsidente convocatis, Concilio unanimi, tabulæ exscribuntur, accommodatis ad singularum classium formas rerum docendarum materiâ serie, necessariis auctoribus; eaque tabulæ, nisi curatoribus novantibus, pro formulis sunt tralatitiis.

V. Constitutum officii tempus Professores constanter religioseque servanto; modestos docilesque discipulos continente; ingenio, tarditate, socordiâ insignes Præsidentem ne celanto, qui Magistrum officii de ea re monitum facturum est.

VI. Professor si necesse habuerit ludum deserere, exorata Præsidente, surrogatoque ex Senioribus Alumnis Promagistro, quem Præses non abnuat, exito; verum huic domesticæ impetrationi sex duntaxat dies permittimus quotannis; longiorem commeatum a Curatoribus impetrato, ipso tamen Præsidente apud hunc ordinem causam defendente.

VII. Reliquis diebus profestis Magister si ludo abfuerit, jus iudiciumque erit; verum de his alius nobis restat locus ad decernendum.

CAPUT SEXTUM:—De Professoribus diligendis.

I. Loco Professoris vacuo, post triduum ea res edicitor pro ludis curiisque academicis omnibus, literis testantibus. Post id factum sexagesimo neque amplius die, petitio publicæ dator. Præses interea caveto ne quid studia capiant detrimenti.

Candidati sunt (de Academiæ primum membris loquimur) tum ipsi Professores, tum seniores Alumni, modo tamen hi contendendi facultatem a Præsidente et Concilio prius impetraverint.

II. Sin extrarii sint iis duntaxat aditus petitioque conceditor, qui scripto antistitis auctoris testimonio præstiterint se disciplinæ academicæ cursum absolvisse; nec quenquam omnium Præses ad suffragia captanda admittito, quin is prius apud se professus sit nomen, patriam ordinem; itemque attulerit literas ab Episcopo regionis honorificas, item commendationem ab hoc ordine; vel saltem, si intermissis negotiis id fieri non possit, a duobus Quæsitibus, qui simul sint Patroni Curatores.

III. Iudices idem sint quos electioni seniorum alumnorum posthac præficiemus, ipsis adjuncto si id fieri possit Professore illius facultatis cui providendum est. Horis quotidie duabus utuntur candidati; quarto die munus absolutum esto.

IV. Theologici primis duobus diebus periculum sui faciunt in re Theologica, tertio in Philosophia, et Geometricis disciplinis; ultimo, scripto cogitaté accurato. Item Philosophici periclitantur primum quidem in Theologiâ, deinde iterato in Philosophia et Mathesi, ultimum scripto commentato, Quæstiones Theologicas Latine disputant; reliquas Latine vel Anglicè, prout ipsi Præsidi videbitur. Scriptæ commentationis disputatio apta esto ex iis argumentis quæ propria sunt classium quas petunt candidati.

V. Qui in Professoris Rhetoricæ vel Græcarum Latinarumque litterarum locum petat, præter eos quos jam dedimus, iudices habeto Professores Rhetoricæ, Græcarum Latinarumque Litterarum; primo die in Theologiâ Philosophiâque decertato, altero in Græcis auctoribus, tertio Auctoribus Latinis, ultimo, scripto argumento.

VI. Perfecto certamine, Iudicum deliberatio habetur, quos aut ipsos interrogavisse, aut certè percontantibus affuisse necesse fuerit. Concilium Præses edicito, ibique recitari iubeto hoc octavum caput constitutionum: deinde in medium prolatis quas diximus candidatorum commendationibus, in hæc verba profitéantur omnes, suo quisque loco suffragia daturi: "Graviter confirmo me tabellam ei delaturum, cui debere me religiose sentio; meque in hac muneris suffragatione, neque gratiæ conciliandæ, nec animo alienato, neque ulli aut culpæ aut commodo illiberaliter servitutum." Tum denique tesseram pro se quisque deferto, inscripto in chartam et implicito suo et candidato sui nomine commemoratis etiam motivis quibus innixus suffragium tulit. Tesseras Præses excipito, et coram concilio involucro inclusas, sigillo suo obsignato, apud se retineto usque ad proxime secutura hujus ordinis comitia. Curatores, ponderatis suffragiis et suffragatorum rationibus, eum, qui omnibus perpensis dignissimus videbitur, Professore declarabunt.

II. Let the course of Theology for the year be arranged at a previous deliberation by the President, Vice-President, Theological Professors, counsel being previously entered into, scil. the Heads of Sacred Science to be explained, the authors to be used, the books to be consulted; but if the Professor shall by his own industry have compiled any portion of this course of instruction, we order that such should be submitted to the same Council, and that a decision should be waited for.

III. Let the Professor of Dogmatic Theology strenuously exert himself to impress on his class, that the allegiance which they owe to the Royal Majesty cannot be relaxed or annulled by any power or authority whatsoever.

IV. All the Masters being convened by the President, and the Council being unanimous, let tablets be drawn up setting forth the subject-matter and order of instruction, the authors required and adapted to the several classes; and let these tablets, unless changed by the Trustees, serve as received formularies.

V. Let the Professors uniformly and scrupulously observe the time appointed for their duties; let it be their care to have their pupils modest and docile; let them not conceal such as are remarkable for talent, dulness or sloth, from the President, who is to apprise the Dean of such circumstance.

VI. If the Professor shall deem it necessary to absent himself, let him go, after having first obtained leave from the President, and substituted in his place some one of the Senior Students, whom the President may not object to; but this domestic mode of obtaining leave we limit to six days only every year; a longer leave of absence let him obtain from the Trustees; the President himself, however, defending the justice of the cause before this body.

VII. If the Professor shall be absent from class on the other ordinary days, there shall be cognizance taken thereof, but we have reserved another place in order to determine on these matters.

CHAPTER SIXTH:—On the Election of Professors

I. The place of Professor being vacant, after the lapse of three days let the vacancy be published before the class-rooms and all the college halls by letters, testifying the same: in sixty days and not longer after so doing, let there be a public competition for the place; meanwhile let the President take care that the public studies suffer no detriment. Let the candidates be (we shall speak first of the Members of the College) both the Professors themselves, and also the Senior Students, provided, however, these have first obtained permission to compete from the President and Council.

II. But if the candidates be externs, let access and leave to contend for the place be granted only to those who shall prove by a written testimony from their Bishop, that they have completed the course of studies read in the College; and let not the President admit any person whomsoever to canvass until he has declared to him his name, country and orders, and shall have brought letters bearing favourable testimony of him from the Bishop of his district, and also a recommendation from our body, or if this cannot be obtained in consequence of the Board not being convened, at least from two Visitors, who shall be also Trustees.

III. Let the Judges be the same as those whom we shall hereafter appoint for the election of the Senior Students, there being added to them if possible a Professor of that faculty, for which a provision is now to be made. Let the candidate have two hours every day for competition; on the fourth day let the competition be concluded.

IV. On the first two days let the Theological candidates be examined in Theology, on the third in Philosophy and Mathematics, on the last in writing on some given subject, after due and careful reflection. Let the candidates in Philosophy also be examined first in Theology; then twice in Philosophy and Mathematics; lastly, in writing on some given subject. Let them discuss the Theological questions in Latin; the rest in Latin or English, according as it shall seem fit to the President. Let the dissertation in writing be drawn from those subjects which peculiarly belong to the classes which the candidates sue for.

V. Let the candidate for the chair of Rhetoric or of Greek and Latin literature, have as judges, in addition to those whom we have already assigned, the Professors of Rhetoric, of Greek and Latin literature; on the first day let him contend in Theology and Philosophy, on the second in the Greek Authors, on the third in the Latin Authors, on the last in a written essay.

VI. The examination being completed, let a consultation of the Judges be held, who must either have interrogated the candidates, or at least have been present with those who did so. Let the President summon the Council, and there order to be recited this eighth chapter of the statutes: then bringing forward the recommendations of the candidates, which we have already mentioned, let all make a declaration in the following terms, each to give his vote in his respective place: "I solemnly declare, That I will give my suffrage to him to whom I religiously feel myself bound to give it, and that in voting thus, I shall not be influenced by the illiberal motives either of conciliating favour or gratifying prejudice, nor shall, in giving my suffrage, subject myself to guilt, nor seek to serve my own private interest." Then let each give in his suffrage, having written on paper, and folded up both his own name and that of his candidate, stating also the motives under the influence of which he gave his vote. Let the President receive the suffrages, and having inclosed them in a cover in presence of the Council, and having sealed them, let him retain them till the next following meeting of this body. The Trustees having weighed well the votes and motives of those who gave them, will declare him Professor, who shall seem, after careful consideration, most worthy.

CAPUT SEPTIMUM:—De Senioribus Alumnis.

I. Illud quoque tum ad Academiæ vestræ diuturnitatem, tum ad ejus instituti finem assequendum, utilissimum fore judicamus, si constanti Magistrorum quasi succrescente copia, in ejus sinu non solum reperiantur qui præstantissimas quasque doctrinas domestico tirocinio creare et propagare valeant; sed supersint etiam qui stadio academico ampliore percurso, dum in vinea Domini excolenda operam impendunt, clericorum colloquiis de rebus ecclesiasticis per singulas Dioceses præesse, et quæstiones ad fidem, mores, disciplinam spectantes, quæ inibi agitari solent, discutere possint et enucleare.

II. Quapropter, cum studiorum curriculum quale nunc in Academia obtinet, licet ad id sufficiat ut alumni, qui debita cum diligentia ipsum percurrerint, idonei evadant qui ordinaria sacri ministerii munia ritè exerceant, non tamen ut scopum superius propositum possint attingere; Idcirco eminentiorem alumnorum ordinem, quos Seniores Alumnos vocari volumus, approbantibus et adjuvantibus Regiis Ministris et Senatu Imperiali instituere decrevimus.

III. Ne autem quæ ex hoc Instituto emanatura speramus in Religionem et Rempublicam beneficia defectu prudentis regiminis deperdantur, de eorum qui in ipsum co-optandi sunt numero, dotibus, selectione et officiis, sequentia religiosè servanda statuimus.

IV. Cum census annuus, sive publicè addictus sive ex legato Illmi. Baronis de Dunboyne proveniens, non pluribus quam xx hujusmodi alumnis subsidia necessaria suppeditare possit, eorum numerus hunc limitem nunquam debet excedere. Ejus autem in varias Provincias distributio eadem sit ac illa quam pro cæteris alumnis in sequenti capite sumus stabilituri. Ita nempe fiet, ut ex singulis Provinciis Armachana, et Cassiliensi sex, ex Dublinensi vero quatuor et totidem ex Tuamensi desumantur. Intra eandem vero Provinciam singulæ Dioceses vel simul (si nempe id sinat Diocesum et locorum numerus) vel alternis vicibus loca vacantia obtineant; ea tamen lege, quod inter Alumnos Diocesis, ad quam in ordine pertinet, inveniat aliquis omnimodo dignus; secus enim, vel vacare pergat vel alii intra eandem Provinciam qui numeris omnibus sit absolutus, conceditor.

V. Alumnorum seniorum electionem Præsidi et ejus concilio deferimus; Propræsidi nempe, Decanis, Professoribus Theologiæ, et Sacræ Scripturæ. Elabente igitur anno Academico, convocato concilio exhibebit Præses nomina Alumnorum quos studiorum cursum jamjam confecturos et sacris ordinibus initiatos dignos judicabit qui in candidatorum album referantur. Horum merita seriatim discutient præfati judices; in quibus æstimandis non magis ad ingenii documenta, et præmia laudis literariæ, attendi volumus quam ad candidatorum indolem, pietatem, modestiam: cum cæteris Alumnis non scientia tantum et ingenii dotibus, sed vitæ etiam et morum innocentia prælucere debeant. Perpensis coram Deo, absque partium studio singulorum qualitatibus, eos victores Præses declarato qui plura tulerint suffragiorum puncta. Si vero hæc numero æqualia esse contingat, cui volet ex competentibus pari suffragiorum numero suffultis palmam adjudicato.

VI. Quod ad disciplinam domesticam attinet, iisdem omnino, quibus cæteri alumni, legibus obtemperent; nisi aliud manifestò exigat eorum instituti ratio, vel de iis legibus in aliquo derogandum Hic Ordo censuerit: quod tamen fecisse nunquam præsumendus est, sed ut lege soluti censeantur debet dispensatio conceptis verbis, manu Secretarii nostri munitis, Præsidi tradi, ut iis quorum interest innotescere faciat. Ut igitur præcipua capita breviter perstringamus—Officia pietatis erga Deum dignè et devotè frequentent; ad studia utilia animos serio et diligenter appellant; non ad ea scilicet quibus inanem eruditionis gloriam aucupentur, sed quæ animarum ductoribus et verbi Dei futuris ministris conveniunt. Promptam denique et alacrem obedientiam superioribus in Domino semper exhibento, nec minorem sibi invicem et cæteris alumnis benevolentiam et urbanitatem.

VII. Tribus post co-optationem annis studiorum causa in Academia manento. Bis saltem in hebdomada colloquiis ecclesiasticis intersint. Ut autem in fine cujuslibet anni manifestum fiat an studiis sedulo et fructuose incubuerint, Theses publicè coram hoc ordine propugnent, ex ea materia Theologica desumptas, quam per anni decursum in colloquiis tractaverint.

VIII. Quam utilis sit ad SS. literarum intelligentiam linguæ Hebraicæ cognitio nemo ignorat. Ad hujus igitur linguæ scientiam acquirendam (nam literas Græcas et Latinas eos jam perdidicisse supponimus) assiduè laborent.

IX. Quoniam vero instituendo hanc alumnorum classem, id nobis potissimum proponimus, ut ne desint qui Professoribus morte aut aliter decedentibus suffecti, docendi munus in Academia jugiter exequantur, quod quidem præstare non poterunt quantumvis docti, nisi facultatem expeditam doctrinam suam aliis impertiendi usu sibi comparaverint; volumus proinde ut suas etiam in docendo partes habeant Seniores Alumni.

CHAPTER SEVENTH:—Concerning the Senior Students.

I. We consider that this also would be most conducive both to the permanency of your College, as well as to attain the end of its establishment, if, by the number of Masters as it were, constantly growing up, there be not only found in its bosom persons capable of affording and propagating the most excellent instruction in every department for the students in the house; but that there should be others also, who, having gone through a more extended academic course, may be capable, whilst engaged in cultivating the vineyard of the Lord, to preside at the conferences of the clergy concerning ecclesiastical matters, through the several dioceses, and to expound questions pertaining to faith, morals, and discipline, which are usually discussed therein.

II. Wherefore since the course of studies which now prevails in the College, though sufficient to render the students, who have gone through it, capable of duly discharging the ordinary duties of the sacred ministry, though it is not sufficient to enable them to accomplish the end proposed above; for this reason we have determined to establish, with the approbation and assistance of the King's Ministers and Imperial Parliament, a more distinguished order of students, whom we will have called Senior Students.

III. But lest the advantages, which we trust will redound to religion and the state from this establishment, may be lost from the want of prudent government, we appoint the following observances to be scrupulously adhered to with regard to the number, qualifications, selection and duties of those, who are to be admitted to it.

IV. Whereas the annual revenue, whether by public grant, or as arising from the bequest of the most illustrious Baron Dunboyne cannot afford the necessary sustenance to more than twenty such students, the number of these can never exceed this limit. And let the distribution of this number, among the various provinces, be the same as that which we shall establish for all the other students in the following chapter. For thus it will happen, that from each of the provinces of Armagh and Cashel six will be appointed, from that of Dublin four, and the same number from that of Tuam. Moreover, let each of the dioceses within the same province, obtain the vacant places either together (provided the number of dioceses and places allows it) or in turns; on this condition however, that among the students of the diocese, to which the place regularly belongs, some individual can be found in every respect worthy; otherwise let it either continue vacant, or let it be granted to another person within the same province, who possesses all the necessary qualifications.

V. The appointment of the senior students we consign to the President and to his Council; to the Vice-President, Deans, Professors of Theology, and of Sacred Scripture. Wherefore towards the close of the academic year, the President having convened a Council will produce the names of the students, who are on the eve of completing their studies, and whom, being now initiated in holy orders, he shall deem worthy of being set down as candidates. The merits of these shall be regularly canvassed by the aforesaid judges; in estimating which we desire that they attend not more to the manifestations of talent and rewards of literary merit, than to the dispositions, piety, and demeanour of the candidates: since they ought to excel the other students, not only in knowledge and intellectual endowments, but likewise in the purity of their life and morals. The qualifications of each being duly considered before God, without partiality, let the President declare those to be successful, who shall have obtained the greater number of suffrages. But if it happen that these are equal in number, let him adjudge the palm to whomsoever he shall think fit of those candidates that are supported by an equal number of votes.

VI. As far as regards domestic discipline, let them be subject to the same laws as the other students, unless the nature of their establishment may obviously require it otherwise, or unless this body shall think fit to make some modification in these laws; a thing, however, which it is never to be presumed to have done; but that they may be deemed exempt from the law, a dispensation should be delivered to the President in a set form of words signed by our Secretary, that he may have it notified to those whom it concerns. In order then briefly to run over the leading heads, they should frequent the duties of piety in a becoming and devout manner; they should apply their minds to useful studies seriously and diligently; not to those forsooth by which they may seek after the vain glory of erudition, but such as befit the Directors of Souls and the future Ministers of the word of God. Let them finally always shew to their superiors prompt and cheerful obedience in the Lord, and no less good will and urbanity to one another and to the other students.

VII. Let them remain in the College three years after their appointment; let them attend ecclesiastical conferences twice at least in the week. But in order that it may appear at the end of every year, whether they have applied to their studies with assiduity and profit, let them defend Theses publicly before this body, taken from that department of Theology, which they may have treated of in the course of the year.

VIII. How useful a knowledge of the Hebrew language is to the understanding of the Sacred Scriptures, is known to every one. Let them therefore labour assiduously to acquire a knowledge of this language, (for the Greek and Latin languages we suppose them to have already learned.)

IX. But since in establishing this class of students, our principal object is, that persons may not be wanting who succeeding to the Professors whose places may become vacant, either by their death or otherwise, may execute without interruption the duty of teaching in the College, which, however learned they may be, they will not be able to discharge, unless they shall have acquired by experience a facility of communicating instruction to others; we desire therefore that the senior students also may have their share in the province of teaching.

Appendix, N^o 4.Statutes of the
Maynooth.

X. Horum igitur erit variarum classium discipulos de iis quæ Magistro præeunte disputata sunt, statutis temporibus interrogare; eorundemque Professorum vel negotiis vel gravi valetudine detentorum totum docendi munus excipere. Et quoniam discipulorum frequentia nimium excrevit classis Theologica, hac in plures distributa, singulis Præses præficiet singulos alumnos seniores, quos ad id muneris maxime idoneos judicaverit ipse, cum concilio superius memorato. Si vero de alia classe, Philosophiæ scilicet, aut Humaniorum literarum, sit quæstio, ad deliberationem adhibeatur etiam Professor ille cujus agitur negotium.

XI. Cum vero timendum sit ne apud seniores alumnos, si suo ipsorum ductui planè permitterentur, non adeo perfecta vigeret ac exoptanda esset aut disciplinæ observantia, aut in præscriptis studiis prosequendis diligentia, statuimus proindè, ipsis dehinc et imposterum præponendum esse Magistrum, quem alumnorum seniorum Præfectum volumus nuncupari. Ab hoc ordine, eodem quo Præses et Administri modo, eligitor.

Ipsius munus esto non solum moribus discipulorum et agendi rationi, salvo Præsidis et Administrorum jure, invigilare, sed et studiis et exercitationibus literariis præ esse. Caveat quoque ne aliud agant; et Præsidem, statutis temporibus aut pro re nata, de singulorum in virtutibus et scientia profectu certiores faciat.

Idem etiam, quamdiu huic ordini non aliter visum fuerit, Bibliothecæ præfecturam habeto; nec tamen ob id muneris novum stipendium accipiat. Inter Theologiæ Professores recensitus locum et vocem in Præsidis consilio obtineto.

CAPUT OCTAVUM:—De Alumnis.

I. Et quoniam Augusti Regis, S. Q. Hibernici munificentia effectum est, ut tantam pecuniam habeamus jam publicè addictam, quanta Alumnis ccl vitæ subsidia una cum doctrinarum instrumento suppeditare possit, idcirco quò tanti beneficii seminibus æqualiter sparsis ubique fructus modestiæ exsurgant, quæ propria est hujus instituti, simulque gratissima fama pervagetur optimè de nobis meritorum, ita jubemus;

II. Jurisdictionis Armacanæ et Cassiliensis, utriusque LXXV Dubliniensis et Tuamensis utriusque L. alumnos deferendi jus esto. Quod si horum numero postea augendo opportunitas accesserit, ex hac perpetuo comparatione enumerantor.

III. Is porro, qui in alumni petat, ad Præsidem literas ab antistite afferto, significantes quâ ætate iste sit, quo patre, quo domicilio, quâ indole, quâ commendatione.

IV. Tum ingenii doctrinæque, quæ in candidato sit, judicium habetor a tribus saltem Magistris, publico edicto, nullâ multâ a Præsede convocatis; nec is recipitor, quin præsentium suffragiis vicerit videri se idoneum, qui infimarum saltem classium in subselliis versetur.

V. Antea vero in Academicos ne refertor quam Præsidi tradiderit Scribæ publici libellum testantem hunc ritè in verba Regis Aug. sacramentum dixisse, itemque scripto pollicitus sit se nec ullum coire conjurationis secretæ societatem, nec ullam postea coitum esse.

VI. Denique candidatus, animadversis Alumnorum officiis, quæ in libro separatim describenda servandaque Præses ostendet, fideliter se obtemperaturum promittito, nomenque iis tabulis ipse adscribito quasi obsidem perpetuæ voluntatis.

CAPUT NONUM:—De Exercitationibus Judicationibusque Literariis.

I. Anni Academici uno mense confecto, proximo statim die non impedito, exercitatio literaria habetor; eaque, principio a Classe Dogmatum capto, menstruâ vice refertor, deinceps aliis classium disciplinis in idem munus succedentibus. Conventus hi fiunt continuo post scholam matutinam; temporis legem nec horâ longioris nec semihora angustioris Præses definit. Ea certaminis argumenta sunt quæ mense proximo disputata fuerant. Quæstionum defensores Professor ipse dato, adversarios Præses.

II. Qui Theologiæ annuam tractationem perceperint, ii omnes Alumni, a natu maximo initio facto, septimanis diebus vel fidei rudimenta sermone familiari tradunt, vel etiam nonnihil orationis declamant: usque ad finem anni Academici hic ordo perpetuus iterator; experimento locum et tempus Præses statuit; multam recusantibus imponit; actioni satis esto semihoræ spatiolum; Academici omnes adsunt.

III. Bina in annos singulos judicia literaria exercentor: primum initio anni communis, alterum versus finem anni academici. Quibus autem diebus incipere et quamdiu perdurare debeant arbitrio Præsidis et concilii definiendum relinquimus. Primis judiciis quæstio esto de interpositorum mensium studiis, ultimis de totius anni institutione.

IV. Si in illos Dies aut Sabbata aut Solemnia incurrerint, tot diebus judicia repetenda censemus, quot satis fuerit ut continua judicia fiant. Quod si per Alumnorum frequentiam, temporisque angustias fieri minus potuerit, ut de singulis omnes simul judices cognoscant, Præses, factâ partitione, alios aliis, quos quibusque volet, discipulos judiciis ita attribuit,

X. It will therefore be their business, at stated times, to question the pupils of the various classes concerning the subjects which have been discussed under the direction of their master; and when the Professors are prevented by business or ill health, to take on them the entire duty of teaching. And since the Theology class has increased exceedingly by the number of pupils, the President having distributed it into several parts, will appoint over each part one of the senior students, whom, he himself, in conjunction with the Council above named, shall judge most qualified for that office. But if the question be concerning any other class, that, for instance, of Philosophy or Humanity, let the Professor whose province it is, be also consulted.

XI. Whereas there is reason to fear, lest either regard to discipline, or diligence in the prosecution of the prescribed studies, may not be observed as strictly as would be desirable, among the senior students, if left entirely to their own guidance; we therefore appoint a Master to be placed over them for the time to come, whom we will have denominated Prefect of the Senior Students. Let him be elected by this body in the same way as the President and Ministers. Be it his province not only to watch over the morals and conduct of the pupils, without infringing however on the authority of the President and his Ministers, but likewise to superintend their studies and literary exercises. Let him take care also, that they misemploy not their time; and let him acquaint the President at stated times, or occasionally, concerning the proficiency of each in virtue and knowledge. Let the same individual hold the Prefectship of the Library, as long as this body shall not arrange it otherwise; let him not however receive an additional stipend for that duty; ranked among the Professors of Theology, let him obtain a place and a voice in the Council of the President.

CHAPTER EIGHTH:—Concerning the Students.

I. And since it has been effected by the munificence of our august Monarch and of the Irish Parliament, that we have as much money granted us as may suffice for the maintenance and education of 250, together with a suitable education; wherefore, in order that the seeds of so great a benefit being scattered equally, the fruits of decorum may spring up, which should particularly adorn the members of our Institution, and at the same time that the fame of our kind benefactors may be the more gratefully diffused, we command as follows:—

II. Let the jurisdiction of Armagh and Cashel have the right of presenting each 75 students, that of Dublin and of Tuam each 50. But if any opportunity should occur for augmenting the numbers on the Establishment, let them be distributed constantly in this proportion.

III. Let the candidate for a place bring a letter to the President from his bishop, signifying his age, parentage, residence, dispositions and character.

IV. Then let an examination be held of the talent and learning, which the candidate may possess, by at least three Masters convened by the President, by a public edict, without any fine; and let him not be received unless he obtain a majority of the suffrages of those present, that he appears qualified to be admitted at least into the lowest classes.

V. Let him not be numbered among the collegians before he has delivered to the President the certificate of a public officer, testifying that he has duly taken the oath of allegiance to our august Monarch, and has also made a written promise, that he neither belongs to, nor will join in any secret society.

VI. Finally, let the candidate after having considered the duties of the students, which are to be described and kept separately in a book, and to be shewn by the President, promise that he will faithfully comply with them, and let him insert his own name in the same register to serve as a surety of fidelity.

CHAPTER NINTH:—Concerning Literary Exercises, &c. Examinations.

I. At the expiration of one month of the academic year, the first day immediately following, being a class day, let a literary exercise be held, and let it be repeated every month, the class of Dogmatic Theology commencing the exercise, and the other classes following in order. Let these meetings be held immediately after morning class; let the President define the time which is to be neither longer than an hour, nor shorter than half an hour. Let the subjects of discussion be matters treated of in class during the preceding month; let the Professor assign the defenders of the questions, the President the opponents.

II. Once in the week, let all the Students who have finished their first year's Theology, commencing with the eldest, either explain the rudiments of faith, in familiar discourse, or even deliver a formal sermon; let this order be continually repeated to the end of the academic year; let the President appoint time and place for the exercise; let him lay a fine on those who do not comply; let a half-hour be sufficient; let all the Members of the College be present.

III. Let two examinations be held every year, the first at the commencement of the common year, the other towards the end of the academic year. On what days they ought to commence, and how long they ought to last, we leave to be defined by the discretion of the President and Council. Let the subject of the first examination be the studies of the intervening months, that of the last, the instruction of the entire year.

IV. If either Sabbaths or Holydays shall fall on those days, we decree the examinations should be resumed for so many days, as that they may be successive. But if by reason of the number of the Students, or shortness of time, it should be impossible for all the examiners at the same time to examine each; let the President, having made a division, so buito, ut totum, intra legitima tempora, negotium concludatur; attamen de prima tantum cognitione dictum intelligitote.

V. Judicibus Professores præbent scriptas argumentorum exceptiones, quas syllabos vocant. Judices ii classium sunt, quibus earum classium Magistros examinandi jus dedimus.

VI. Interea Alumnorum si quis visus fuerit, ex sui Judicis sententiâ, ignaviter se expedisse, eam rem Judex ad Socios Quaestionis referto. Hi, citato Reo, causâque conjunctim recognitâ, si aut cuncti aut certe melior pars Secundum delata judicaverint, Præses delinquentem conceptis verbis admoneto, Magistris circumstantibus: hæc verò admonitio ad eam rem valebit, ut si judiciis proxime secuturis idem æque turpiter se gesserit, extemplo amoveatur, aut deploratæ ineptiæ aut nequitiae impudentis manifestus.

VII. Tandem ultimis judiciis, quæ solemnia sunt diligentiae præmia et honores, iis a Præsede tribuuntur, qui pluribus suffragiis vicerint se meruisse.

CAPUT DECIMUM:—De Bibliothecæ Præfecto.

I. Frustra tamen legibus sancientis vel ipsa sapientia conaretur doctrinas elicere, ni librorum copia, ex quo fonte omnia præclara haurienda sunt, et abunde suppetat et diligenti custodia servetur: ut huic igitur causæ provisum sit, hæc decernimus;

II. Curiarum majorum una ad Bibliothecæ formam accommodator, eique solum usui obligata maneto, donec Curatoribus facultas oblata erit augustioris loci excitandi.

III. Eò libris qui nunc habentur translatis, compositisque, Præfectus indicem omnium in bibliotheca servandum de-scribito, ejusque exemplum Præses possideto. Ad singularum Literarum titulos interstitia sunt, quò locari possint aliorum auctorum nomina, novosque, si præterea accedent, Scriptorum Libros diligenter ac maturè Præfectus curato, ut magnæ recensionis adscribantur, nominaque officio trimestri ipse Præsidi dato.

IV. Libros quam integerrimos decenter asservato, operamque dato, ut eorum quotidie pars aliqua detergatur, situsque obsoletus excutiat, adeoque totus iste locus munditie niteat.

V. Bis omnibus annis Præses, vel si hic sæpius noluerit, saltem semel, Propræses, Decanus et si quos e Professorum ordine Præses adsumserit, Bibliothecam seriò recensento. Libros observanto quâ formâ, quâ conditione sint. Pro Libris quos vel abesse viderint, injuriâve vitiatos esse, aut alios a Præfecto reponi intra VII dies jubento, aut, si illud fieri non poterit, multam hi vel eorum plures irroganto: de reliquo Bibliothecæ instrumento eandem legem tradimus.

VI. Diebus negotiosis Bibliothecæ aditum patere volumus per eas IV horas, quas Præses, Præfecto conveniente, daturus est, ita ut nihil detrimenti studia publica capiant.

VII. Hi soli commentandi causâ in Bibliothecam admittuntur; I. Magistri. II. Qui Academicas IV annorum disciplinas perceperint, si, Professore aliquo commendante, Praeside approbante, impetraverint. III. Qui, Praeside permittente, Magistrum aliquem Præfecto sponsorem dederint.

VIII. Præfectus vigilato, ne librum quis omnino ex Bibliothecâ, ullamve suppellectilis partem auferat. Qui fecerit, ablatum reddito, simulque duplo tenetor, ejusque multae Præses, Decanus, Præfectus, plures, ambove recuperatores sunt. Si bis fecerit, ei multa altera irrogator, posteaque Bibliotheca clausa esto in omne tempus.

IX. Si quis librum conscribillando, lacerando, obliterando, maculandove corruperit, idem duplo tenetor. Quòd si hic malo animo fecisse convictus erit, par esto culpa ac si librum abstulerit; nempe si bis convictus eo crimine, exclusus perpetuo maneto.

X. Qui levius peccaverint, libris suo loco non repositis, silentio rupto, gravitate neglectâ, his multam Præfectus ipse irrogato eadem qua Decanus potestate; omnisque ex hisce multis collata pecunia ad Bibliothecam ornandam impenditor. Qui verò multam admiserit, ei denuò Bibliothecæ copia dator, si prius Præfecto a Procuratore tradiderit scriptam confessionem multae dissolutae.

XI. Harum rerum tabulæ pro Bibliotheca suspensæ ac facile spectabiles exstare debent.

XII. De Bibliothecæ Præfecto creando ea lex tota valitura est, quam in causa Magistri officii sanximus, absenti pœna quoque similis imponenda, eademque com meatui impetrando et conditio et tempora. Præfecto Administri sunt quos hic legerit, Præses concesserit, hique muneris diem perpetuò obeunto, Præfecto vel æquissimè absente.

CAPUT UNDECIMUM:—De Procuratore.

I. Quæ pro muniendâ pietate, provehendis moribus, artibusque in Academiam vestram deducendis hactenus decrevimus, ea nos cuivis facile confidimus probare posse. Superest ut jam de Academicis possessionibus dicamus, omnique domesticæ administrationis ratione, quâ sublata, inanis omnis ille noster labor in Disciplinis constituendis futurus sit.

distribute the students to the different examiners, that the entire business may be concluded within the proper time; this, however, is to be understood of the first examination only.

V. Let the Professors give to the examiner written copies of the subjects, commonly called a syllabus; let those persons be the judges of the classes to whom we have given the right of examining the masters of those classes.

VI. In the mean while, if any of the students shall be deemed in the opinion of his examiner to have acquitted himself badly, let the examiner lay the matter before the assessors. The accused being summoned, and the case being revised by them conjointly, if all, or at least the majority, shall decide according to the report of the examiner, let the President admonish the delinquent in distinct terms, the masters standing around; the effect of the admonition will be, that if at the following examinations the same individual shall acquit himself in the same disgraceful manner, let him be forthwith removed, as being manifestly convicted either of hopeless stupidity, or of barefaced idleness. At the final examination, let the rewards of diligence and the usual honours be bestowed by the President, on those who have obtained the greater number of votes.

CHAPTER TENTH:—Concerning the Prefect of the Library.

I. In vain would wisdom itself endeavour to promote learning by the enactment of laws, unless a store of books, whence instruction is to be derived, be supplied and carefully preserved; to provide for this, then We decree as follows:—

II. Let one of the larger halls be fitted out for a library, and let it remain destined to that use alone, 'till the Trustees shall be enabled to build a more spacious place.

III. The books which are now possessed, being transferred thither and arranged, let the Prefect write out a catalogue of all, to be kept in the library, and let the President have a copy of it. At the titles of each letter let interspaces be left, where the names of other authors may be placed, and let the Prefect carefully and betimes take care, that the new books, which may subsequently be brought in, may be annexed to the general catalogue; and let him give the names to the President every three months.

IV. Let him keep the books in the best possible condition, and take care that some part of them be cleaned every day, and let them be well dusted, and the entire place be kept clean.

V. Twice every year, or once at least, let the President, Vice President, Dean, and such of the Professors as the President may select, let them review the library with serious attention; let them observe in what state and condition the books are. In the room of the books which they may find wanting or injured, let them either order others to be replaced by the Prefect within seven days, or if that is not possible, let them, or the majority of them, impose a fine. With regard to the remaining furniture of the library we make the same law.

VI. On days of business we wish the library to be open for those four hours which the President, with the consent of the Prefect, shall appoint, so that the public studies may sustain no injury.

VII. Let the following persons only be admitted into the library for the purpose of reading;—1st. The Masters. 2d. Those who have passed through four years study in the College, if they shall obtain it by the recommendation of some Professor, and with the approbation of the President. 3d. Those, who with the permission of the President, shall give some of the masters as security to the Prefect.

VIII. Let the Prefect be watchful that no one shall take away a book, or any of the furniture out of the library; let the person who may have done so restore it, and let him at the same time be fined in twice the value, and of such fine let the President, Dean, Prefect, all or two of them, be the recoverers. If he shall do so twice, let a second fine be levied on him, and afterwards let the library be shut against him for ever.

IX. If any person shall have injured a book by scribbling, or by soiling, or by tearing it, let him be fined in twice the value. If he shall be convicted of having done so with evil intention, let the crime be the same as if he stole the book; if he be convicted of the crime twice, let him continue for ever excluded.

X. Let those who shall commit a more trifling fault, viz. by not restoring the books to their place, by breaking silence, by neglecting becoming gravity, be fined by the Prefect, with the same authority as if the Dean had imposed the fine; and let all the money collected from these fines be expended in furnishing the library. But to the individual so fined, let access to the library be again granted, if he first deliver to the Prefect, from the Procurator a written acknowledgment of the fine having been paid.

XI. It will be necessary that notices of these matters be suspended in the library and within view of the Students.

XII. With regard to the appointment of Prefect of the Library, the same law is to be observed which we have established in the case of the Deans; the same penalty is also to be imposed on him if absent, and let him be subject to the same restriction both as to the time of absence and as to the mode of obtaining it. Let the Prefect have as assistants such persons as he may select, and as the President may allow; let them give constant attention to their duty on each day, the Prefect however not being absent except for just reason.

CHAPTER ELEVENTH:—Concerning the Procurator.

I. What we have enacted hitherto for the preservation of piety, the promotion of morality, and the introduction of science into your College, we trust will readily meet the approbation of every one. It now remains to say something concerning the possessions of the College, and the nature of domestic administration, without which all our exertions for the promotion of learning would be unavailing.

XVI. Universim ne exito nisi rei Academicæ causâ, Præsidente annuente: commeatui impetrando tempora, conditiones, absentiae pœnam eandem quam Classium Professoribus adjungimus.

CAPUT DUODECIMUM:—De Magistratibus Academicis.

I. Magistratus Academicos hoc ordine rogamus; Propræsidem; Decanos; Bibliothecæ Præfectum; Procuratorem; S. Theologiæ Professores, uti quisque a creatione maximus est; Physicæ Experientiæ Professorem; Dialecticæ et Metaphysicæ; Rhetoricæ; Græcarum Latinarumque literarum; Anglicanæ Elocutionis; Ling: Vern: Hibernicæ. Linguarum quæ nunc vigent.

II. Hi omnes intra XXX. quisque a creatione diem Præsidi tradunto Scribæ publici testimonia testantia se fidem jurejurando Regiæ Majestati obligavisse, itemque Professionem sua uniuscujusque manu scriptam, se nec ullam conjurationis latentem societatem coire, neque aliâs coituros; animadversisque domesticis legibus, coram Præsidente affirmanto se dicto audientes futuros; denique propositi monumentum nomen quisque suum tabulis iis adscribunto, in quibus et ipsas leges, Professorum Administrorumque subscriptiones, testimonia scribarum, nec plura comprehensa Præses asservaturus est.

III. De his legibus, utrum pareatur necne, Comitibus Ordinariis Præsidentem referre volumus, abdicationis pœnâ, ni fecerit, propositâ; idemque tabulas ipsas, cum jussus erit, Ordini representato.

IV. Eadem conditione ceteri quoque sunt, quicunque procurationem, ministerium, domiciliumve stabile in Academiâ habuerit.

V. Magistratus omnes strenuè hortamur, ut in munere quisque suo fungendo, non solum constantes, verum etiam alacres sese præbeant; inhumanitatis vel minimam speciem reformident, quum patriæ magis conciliationem potestatis una cum optimo urbanitatis colore illorum auctoritas habeat, qui et munere vitæ præceptores, vitæque ipsius consuetudine socii sunt, comitesque perpetui: ne ulla inter Academicos dissidia patiantur, ipsique memores personæ et dignitatis eam, quæ nostræ Religionis una propria est, benignæ

II. For these reasons a Procurator is to be added to the College officers. He can either hold a separate office, or may discharge the duty of Procurator and Vice President at one and the same time, which is at present the case.

III. In either case let the Procurator be appointed by the Trustees, with the same qualifications as the Dean; let him likewise give securities.

IV. Be it the Procurator's business to arrange the expenses of the College, so that wholesome provisions may be procured, and exactly furnished according to the prescribed standard.

V. Let him direct the necessary money to be furnished him by the banker, and an acknowledgement for the receipt of this shall be signed conjointly by the President and Procurator.

VI. Let him clear off debts as soon as possible, receiving the proper acknowledgements, as the law directs.

VII. Whatever money he may have exacted in the way of fine, or as due to the College, let him either transfer the sum forthwith to the banker, or an acknowledgement of the sum, signed by the President.

VIII. Proper books being prepared, let him arrange the accounts, both of debts and of payments, with all possible care.

IX. Let him be particularly careful, that expenses may not be incurred beyond what the revenues of the College can afford, and that no valuable furniture be lost by theft or negligence.

X. If either theft or injury shall occur, through the fault or negligence of the Procurator, let him make it good at his own expense.

XI. In the meanwhile, to relieve a person whom we have subjected to conditions so strict, in order that he may discharge his office with a suitable degree of independence, let the Procurator have the entire controul over the servants, whose assistance may be required for the management of the household, and, with approbation of the President, let him hire them, discharge them, punish them when negligent; let him give them leave to go out, and keep at home whomsoever he may think fit.

XII. Let him deliver over to the œconome, to the cook, and to the other persons hired, the utensils necessary for each, as also the vessels, first numbering them, and taking a list of them, and let them promise that they will keep them safe; at the quarterly payments, let each make a return to the Procurator of the furniture consigned to them; if any thing be missing, let them suffer the price of it to be deducted from their wages.

XIII. Every year let the Procurator produce before the President, the furniture committed to his care, which shall correspond to the inventory signed by himself at his appointment, and delivered to the President.

XIV. Let him make up his accounts every month, and have them audited by the President and senior Dean, within fifteen days after the quarterly payments; let him draw up the old accounts of those months, of which the President must submit copies to the inspection of the Trustees, after they have been copied out in a fair hand from the blotters, signed by the President and Dean, together with the receipts appertaining thereto.

XV. If the Procurator offends in a remarkable manner in the discharge of his office, or is foolishly lavish, let the President and Dean accuse him before the Trustees, who, if they convict him, will discharge him from his office.

XVI. To conclude, let him not go out, unless on the business of the College, and with the consent of the President. The time for obtaining leave of absence, the conditions, the penalty for absence, are to be precisely the same as for the Professors.

CHAPTER TWELFTH:—Concerning the Officers of the College.

I. We appoint the Officers of the College in the following order; Vice President, Deans, Prefect of the Library, Procurator, Professors of Sacred Theology, according as each may be longer elected; Professor of Physics; of Logic and Metaphysics; of Rhetoric; of Greek and Latin Literature; of English Elocution; of the Irish Language; of modern Languages.

II. Let all these, each within 30 days from his appointment, deliver to the President, the testimony of a public officer, vouching that they have taken the oath of allegiance to His Royal Majesty, and likewise a declaration, written in the hand-writing of each, that they neither are concerned in any secret societies, nor will they be so at any future time; and having considered duly the laws of the house, let them avow before the President, that they will be observant of them; finally, let each, as a pledge of his purpose, enter his name in those books, in which the President is to keep the laws, the signatures of the Professors and Ministers, the testimonies of the civil officers, and nothing else.

III. Concerning these laws, whether they are obeyed or not, we desire that the President should state at the meeting of the Board, the penalty of abdication being held out, unless he shall do so; and let him likewise produce the books themselves to the Body, when he shall be directed to do so.

IV. Let all the rest likewise be subject to the same regulation, who may hold the Procuratorship, a ministry, or a permanent residence in the College.

V. We strenuously advise all the superiors to show themselves not only constant and steady, but even cheerful in the discharge of their duty, to avoid even the slightest appearance of harshness, since the authority of those who are teachers by profession, and associates and constant companions by their habits of intercourse, should possess the conciliatory qualities of paternal jurisdiction, and be rendered pleasing by urbanity; that they should not suffer any dissensions among the members of the house, and mindful of their benignæ pacis concordiam communi alant spiritu: quos præceptionibus erudiunt, iisdem claro virtutum exemplo præluceant; hominumque invidiam et contemptum, quæ res in Academiæ forte interitum, infamiam certè redundabunt, vitæ innocentiam, famæque præstantiam deprecentur.

VI. Si quid scriptorum suorum Magistratus, alumnusve edere voluerit, id facito, Præsidente concedente, a quo Curatores jus repetituri sunt, quidquid improbè positum in istis lucubrationibus exstiterit: si Præsides intercesserit quin edatur, alteri provocationem ad Curatores habento. Judices hi dabunt in causâ non pessimâ Magistratus, Academicos a se delectos, qui si rectè fieri posse statuerint, causamque receperint, liber editor, Judicium ipsorum periculo.

VII. Neque tamen ab iis Judicibus stipulamur, ut pœnæ culpæve proximi videantur, nisi liber iste ab egregia doctrinâ sapientiâve commendatus erit, verum si quid extulerit Religioni, Moribus, Disciplinæ, Reipublicæ, Regiis honoribus contrarium.

VIII. Cubicula Administris iisdem eadem sint perpetuè. Quæ Professorum Ordini mancipata sunt, uti erit quisque a creatione major, ita prior optionem habeto. De Alumnorum cubiculis Præsides Decano consulto, statuito; gratum certe nobis fecerit, si antiquitatis ordinem potiore duxerit; propterea quod hic certâ aliqua ratione, eaque nec difficili, neque molestâ comprobetur.

CAPUT DECIMUM TERTIUM:—De Præmiis et de Pœnis.

I. Decanus in tabulas ad eam rem confectas rejicito, si quid memoriâ dignum adeptus erit, discipulis quotidie recensendis, ipsasque tabulas Præsidi recognoscendas tradito, mensibus exactis: porro tertio ante solemnia certamina die, Decani, Præsides, Propræsides, communi auctoritate, illorum nomina fastis Academicis adscribunto, qui morum integritate præcipuâ, officiisque religiose colendis, honorem fuerint commemorabilem assecuti.

II. Professores Classium commentariis notanto, si qui Discipulorum industriâ, profectibusque magnopere præstiterint, horumque nomina trinis mensibus deferunto ad Præsidentem, qui in fastis iisdem suo quæque loco commemoraturus est.

III. Post solemnem Quæstionem, atque priusquam docti Victores in Concilio renuntientur, ii fasti recitantur; deinde Præsides hortabuntur, ut illius quoque laudis digna ratio habeatur in præmiis adjudicandis.

IV. Iisdem fastis describitur judicii quoque sollemnis eventus; hoc titulo—QUI DEFENSORES ANNUO CERTAMINE; eaque scripto testata nobilitas præcipuam auctoritatem obtineto in reddendis (post absolutum studiorum cursum) alumnorum a Præsidente commendationibus, tum etiam ad præmia et honoris gradus consequendos, si præter ea quæ nunc sunt, alia novæ dignitatis insignia Patroni aut aliunde impetraverint aut ipsi constituerint.

V. DE PœNIS quæ hactenus a nobis dicta sunt, in iis crimina perpetuo cum Actoribus conjunximus; reliquas inviti cunctas, necessariò tamen decernimus.

VI. Fraus ea maxima est quæ exauctorationem habet. Fraude maxima tenentur ALUMNI.

1. Si quis malo animo publicèque Præsidi jubenti parere denegaverit.

2. Si quis Academiæ septa transierit, nec prius exorato aut ipso Præsidente, aut cui Præsides eam mittendi potestatem fecerit.

5. Si quis graviter per injuriam corpus percusserit.

6. Si quis libros in Academiam scriptave comportaverit, ad Religionem Catholicam Romanam maledictis violandam pertinentia, moresve labefactandos, seditionesve concitandas: etiamque si quis iis libris, quibus omni Domo a Præsidente vel Decano interdictum sit, nihilominus utatur.

own character and dignity, that they cherish in common that harmony and kind feeling which is the prominent feature of our religion; that they should outshine by the bright example of their virtues, those whom they instruct by their precepts; and that by the purity of their life, and the excellence of their character, they should be exempted from the hatred and contempt of men, which may redound perhaps to the ruin, but most certainly to the disgrace of the College.

VI. If either a superior Officer or a Student be inclined to publish any of his writings, let him do so, with the consent of the President, from whom the Trustees will demand an account, for any thing immoral or incorrect that may be found in such works; if the President shall oppose the publication, let the other party have the right of appeal to the Trustees. If the case is not obviously a bad one, they will assign officers of the College selected by themselves as judges; if these shall determine that the thing can be done with propriety, and shall judge favourably of the case, let the book be published at the peril of the judges themselves.

VII. Nor do we, however, exact from the Judges that they should be deemed liable to penalty or censure if such book shall not be commended for its distinguished learning or wisdom, but only if it contain any thing contrary to religion, morals, discipline, the State, or to the honour of his Majesty the King.

VIII. Let the same Ministers constantly retain the same rooms. With regard to those assigned to the Professors, according as each shall be prior in his appointment to the professorship, so let him have priority of choice. Let the President with the Dean determine concerning the chambers of the students: he certainly will act agreeably to our wishes if he give the preference to those of longer standing, inasmuch as this can be established by a certain fixed and very easy rule.

CHAPTER THIRTEENTH:—Concerning Rewards and Punishments.

I. Let the Dean enter in a book, prepared for this special purpose, any thing he shall find worthy of notice in the daily inspection of the students conduct, and let him at the end of the month deliver the books to the President for his inspection. Besides three days before the general examinations, let the Dean, President, Vice President, by common authority, enter in the records of the College the names of those persons who may have attained distinguished honour by the especial purity of their morals and their religious observance of duty.

II. Let the Professors of the different classes note in their memorandums such of their pupils as may have distinguished themselves for their industry and progress, and let them submit the names of those persons every three months to the President, who is to note down each particular in the same records in its proper place.

III. After the yearly examination, and before the learned victors shall be declared in the Council, let these records be read out; then the President will advise that due regard be paid also to the commendation contained in his records, in the decision and distribution of the premiums.

IV. In the same records let the result also of the general examination be entered under this title, QUI DEFENSORES ANNUO CERTAMINE; and let this distinction testified in writing have peculiar weight in the President's recommendations of the students, to be given after the completion of the course, as also to obtain premiums and honourable degrees, if in addition to those which now exist, the patrons of the College shall either obtain from another source or themselves establish other literary honours.

V. In what we have hitherto said concerning penalties, we have constantly joined the crimes with the doers; such as remain we now decree from necessity, and with reluctance.

VI. The greatest crime is that which is punishable with expulsion. Let the students be deemed guilty of such offence—

- 1st. If any one shall perversely and publicly refuse to obey the orders of the President.
- 2d. If any one shall pass the boundaries of the College without having first obtained permission, either from the President himself or from a person to whom the President may have given the power of granting leave.
- 3d. If any shall indulge in banquets or revelling privately in the College, and shall either himself bring in wine or any liquors which cause drunkenness, or shall be privy to such offence.
- 4th. If any one shall have drunk to such a degree as manifestly to exhibit the turpitude of intoxication.
- 5th. If any one shall strike another severely, and for the purpose of injuring.
- 6th. If any one shall bring into the College, books or writings tending to calumniate the Roman Catholic religion, or to relax morals, or to stir up seditions, and likewise if any one shall use books forbidden to the entire community by the President or Dean.
- 7th. If any one shall designedly withdraw himself from the body of the students on the public walk, or from the eyes of the person to whose charge he may have been committed.

VII. If a Professor shall be absent from class on a lecture day, let him be deprived of the maintenance and stipend of that day, and that by the Dean's report to the President and Procurator; let them enter it in a book prepared for such purpose. Let the Procurator enter the amount of the day's stipend to the account of credit; at the time of payment let him first deduct the fine, and pay off the remainder.

Maynooth.

VIII. Quod si Professor id sæpius admiserit, hunc Præses Decano adstante admoneto, isque si denuo admonitus securè et obfirmato persisterit in istâ fraude, ad hunc ordinem a Præsidente deferatur. Curatores, causâ cognitâ, pertinaciæ convictum vel exauctorabunt, vel aliis remediis Academicæ saluti consultum facient.

Eadem judiciorum forma Professoribus, Administrisque omnibus expectanda est, quicunque vel datâ opera, vel per insinuationem impia, invereconda, in jus domesticum seditiosa, aut in summam Regis Reique publicæ Majestatem maledica tractationi, sermonibusve admiscuerint, etiamque qui gravis cujuscunque criminis infamiam contraxerint. Comitibus statim insequentibus Curatores judicium recognoscent, reumque, si appareat, in crimine deprehensum, non solum munere privaturi sunt, sed etiam ab Academico domicilio perpetuâ exclusionem submoturi.

X. Si quis omnium libros scriptave evulgaverit, edentibusve conscius fuerit, Præsidente et inscio et improbante, exigitur.

XI. Si quem in ferendo suffragio judicii corruptelam de munere publico admisisse Socii Quæstionis deprehenderint, convictus abdicato.

CAPUT DECIMUM QUARTUM:—De veteri Jure Academico.

Quæ in primis legibus de Religionis Studiis et Cæremoniis sancita erant, novâ rogatione referimus: ceteras leges rescindimus, abolemus.

Ultima Sanctio.

I. Experimento constat jussorum mole atque infinitâ vi hominum citius obrui mentes quem actiones dirigi: idcirco, quum ab alacritate vestra, legibus haud ita multis, justis tamen et exquisitis, potissimum spes affulgeat fore, ut recens in lacem prolata famamque hominum Academia vestra ad confirmatam virilis quasi ætatis laudem possit adolescere, pluribus jubere abstinemus, hanc quam videtis circumscriptionem arbitrati utilitatibus vestris non deesse, vestraque, quod longe maximum est, innocentiae etiam superesse.

II. Quod reliquum est, ut omnes Academici percalleant, quid quemque facere, quid vitare oporteat, ad principia anni perpetuò academici hæ leges a Præsidente in ædiculâ recitantur, aut a Magistratu, Præsidente jubente, posteaquam SANCTO SPIRITUI sacerdotes ad altare implorantes fecerint lege atque more sacrosancto.

III. Item post semestrem Quæstionem hæ leges recitantur: locum publicum ipse Præses destinato. Legum recitationi intersunt Academiae familia tota, Magistratus, Alumni, Discipuli tam ii, qui nomini Academico jure adscripti sunt, quam qui annuâ pensione nomen redimunt.

IV. Si

VIII. But if the Professor shall commit this frequently, let the President admonish him in presence of the Dean; and if he having been again admonished, shall heedlessly and obstinately persist in this offence, let him be reported to this Board by the President. The Trustees having examined the case, will, if he be convicted of obstinacy, either expel him or provide for the interest of the College by other remedies.

IX. The same form of trial is to be submitted to by the Professors and all the Ministers, whoever either directly or indirectly shall in their discourse utter expressions, impious, immodest and subversive of the regulations of the house, or expressions which may be calumniating or offensive to the Sovereign Majesty of the King and State, as also those who may have contracted the infamy of any heinous offence. But in order that such evils, if, which may God forbid, they are ever to exist, may be the more speedily obviated, and that the poison of bad example may not continue to infect the establishment, let the President forthwith, or in case of his absence or connivance, the Vice President and the Deans summon a Council, at which the President, Vice President, Deans, and Professors of Theology are to attend, or such of these as may not be implicated, and thither let them cite the accused and interrogate him with regard to the crime, information having been laid before them, or grounds of suspicion having come under their own observation. But if the accused shall either prove contumacious, or be considered guilty by the majority, let him be prohibited from his office in the house, another person being appointed in his place, if these laws have not provided for the absence of the accused. At the ensuing meeting of the Board, the Trustees shall revise the decision, and if it appear that the accused person is really guilty, they shall not only strip him of his situation but even remove him for ever from any residence in the College.

X. If any one shall publish books or any writing whatsoever, or be a party with those who may do so, without the knowledge and the approbation of the President, let him be expelled.

XI. If the Assessors shall detect any person giving a corrupt decision in his public capacity, let him, being convicted, abdicate his place.

XII. If any of the higher functionaries shall incur censures for unbecoming levity, let the President admonish him; if the admonition be in vain, let him submit the matter to the Trustees.

XIII. If any person shall excite the bitterness of party zeal, the Trustees already denounce against such person the severest penalties.

XIV. If the President shall be accused of such crimes, let the Vice-President and Dean lay the matter before some Trustee; by his direction let the Secretary call a meeting. A full assembly of the body shall decide.

XV. Now since the penalty established for absence is so severe and so necessary, in order that this offence may be most satisfactorily proved, let the President appoint a Porter on the gate, who shall know how to read and write, and let him set down in a book as well the names of the Students, as the times of going out and coming in. Every evening let the Porter, when returning the keys, deliver the book to the President; let him, having read over the names, subscribe, Vidi, I have seen; let him also add both name and surname.

XVI. Finally, in order that no one may go out without being perceived, let the Porter keep the gate locked; let him carry the key about with him: thus whosoever may be absent without the knowledge of the Porter, we judge such to be absent criminally and without leave.

XVII. At the right hand gate, which is near to the old buildings, let carriages, cars and horsemen be admitted; let there be two keys for this, one for the President, the other for the Procurator.

CHAPTER FOURTEENTH:—Concerning the former Statutes of the College.

The regulations enacted in the original laws concerning the Studies and Ceremonies of Religion we again re-establish, all the other regulations we rescind and abolish.

The final Sanction:

I. It is proved by experience that the minds of men are oppressed by the mass and number of commands rather than their actions directed; for this reason, whereas under these laws, not numerous to be sure but just and apposite, a hope is afforded that by your ready obedience it will come to pass that your College, which has been recently established and introduced to public notice, may attain lasting praise; we abstain from a multiplicity of laws, considering that the present limited number will be sufficient for your interests, and what is of most importance, more than sufficient for the preservation of your innocence.

II. As to what remains, that all the Collegians may thoroughly understand what it behoves each to do and what to avoid, at the commencement of the academic year let those laws be always read by the President in the chapel, or by an officer by the direction of the President, after the Priests shall have implored the Holy Ghost at the altar, according to the prescribed holy rite and custom.

III. Likewise let these laws be read out after the half yearly examination; let the President mark out the public place; let the entire household of the College be present at the recital, the Officers, Students, Pupils, as well those who have been enrolled in the College books by right, as also those who are pensioners.

IV. Si quid in his legibus obscurum abiguumve videbitur, illud de Præsidis Consiliique sententiâ, (Propræsidem dicimus, Decanos, Professores Theologicos,) definitur. Si præterea fiet, ut horum aliis alia significatio placuerit, causam ipsam reservandam esse dicimus ultimo hujus ordinis auxilio; medio tempore, ei definitioni acquiescendum, nisi pœnæ irrogationem habeat, quam Præsides attulerit.

V. Itaque Nos Curatores vestri et Patroni, quibus ea solum spes eaque ambitio insedit animo atque oculis obversatur, ut ista Domus humanitate, religione, doctrinis excolendis, disseminandis benefica sit, utque pace pacatissima, innocentia florentissima, virtutibus beatissima prædicetur; deinde certa jam nunc vestræ omnium MODESTIÆ præcipientes gaudia, Præsidis primum fide appellatâ, qui ordinis princeps, idemque Legum defensor est; postea Magistratum, ipsorumque aded alumnorum studiis, alacritate, obtemperantia, ope, quam religiose præstabunt, advocatâ; Legis denique publicæ imperio et voce jubentes hasce leges, hoc jus domesticum, disciplinam, judiciaque Academiae Manutianæ proponimus, præscribimus, declaramus, uti jure quam optimo rogatas, perlatas, indicatas Academiae Manutianæ, pœnarum scriptis sanctionibus, si quis contravenerit, dehinc adhibendis.

REGULA PIETATIS et DISCIPLINÆ DOMESTICÆ in Collegio R. C. Sancti Patritii
Ab Alumnis Observanda.

OMNES qui ad Ecclesiastica munera obeunda destinari cupiunt, ad eam vitæ perfectionem contendant, ad quam præcipuè vocantur Ecclesiæ Ministri qui cæteros ad pietatem et sanctitatem verbo et exemplo allicere atque excitare ex munere tenentur.

Nemo proinde, qui in hoc Collegio vivit, muneri huic, suæ et divinæ vocationi, atque hominum expectationi satisfecisse se putet, nisi divinæ plusquam humanæ sapientiæ studiis, eo potissimum tempore quo degit in Collegio, vacaverit. Idcirco quæ ad pietatis disciplinam spectant, non perfunctoriè, sed prompto alacrique animo omnes Alumni adimplere studeant et peragere.

Singulis diebus, horâ statutâ, signo dato, et Benedicamus Domino audito, quilibet Deo Gratias respondeat, statimque e lectulo assurgat, ac sanctissimo Crucis signo munitus, suis induatur vestibus, et simul ac fuerit indutus, per semihoræ spatium abluendis manibus, aptando lectulo, componendoque cubiculo sedulò incumbat. Si quid supererit temporis, id ad animum orationi præparandum impendatur.

Ad campanulæ signum omnes in oratorium convenient, ibique Sancti Spiritus imprimis ope imploratâ, orationem Domine Deus Omnipotens qui ad principium hujus diei, &c. cum reliquis, quæ ad Primam in Breviario Romano reperiuntur, devotè recitent, ac insuper meditationis argumento repetito, per horæ dimidium orantes, ad splendorem æternæ lucis oculos mentis aperiant, quo veluti divino alimento accepto, et sæpius per diem repetito, spiritus saginetur. Statutâ postmodum horâ, incruento Missæ sacrificio omnes pariter religiosè intersint, cui eorundem duo Clerici, superpelliceis induti, reverentè ministrent.

Quotidie ante prandium, facto signo ordinario, in Sacellum convenientes S. Sacramentum, per octavam horæ partem, piè ac devotè adorent; deinde ad Cœnaculum rectâ in silentio pergant: ante cœnam pariter in oratorium convenientes, genuflexi, peculiari examine conscientias suas excutiant. Denique priusquam cubitum eant, in idem Oratorium iterum convenientes, vespertinæ orationis incenso Omnipotenti Deo humiliter oblato, generali examine conscientias suas scrutentur; ac præsertim inquirent quid labis totâ illâ die contraxisse videantur: necnon privatæ meditationis materiæ pro sequenti die percipiendæ incumbant, donec a Decano habito signo, per silentium rectâ ad cubacula pergant. Statutâ horâ, dato scilicet signo, Benedicamus Domino, extinctis lucernis, nec iterum durante nocte, ullâ ex causâ, accendendis, singuli decumbant.

In cœnaculo nemo audeat ad mensam discumbere, nisi ab eo qui præest benedictione peractâ. At vero, nisi cogente necessitate, atque annuente Decano, abesse a communi mensâ Alumnorum nemini liceat. Facto denique edendi fine, datoque signo ab eodem qui præest, omnes assurgant, at ad Breviarii præscriptum, Immortali et Invisibili Deo, debitas persolvant gratias, statimque ex Aulâ decorè discedant. Mensâ autem durante, perpetua lectio fiat; ac primò quidem totum ferè Sacræ Scripturæ caput legatur: Reliquum vero temporis impendatur in lectione alicujus Religiosi libri, qui simul intellectum foveat, atque dirigat voluntatem: ut, cum cibus præbetur corpori, aliquod etiam tanquam pabulum

IV. If any thing shall appear obscure or ambiguous in these laws let it be defined by the decision of the President and the Council (we mean the Vice-President, Deans, Professor of Theology). If moreover it shall happen that these shall interpret differently, we say that the interpretation is to be reserved for the Trustees; in the interim that that interpretation which the President may have given is to be acquiesced in, unless it implies the infliction of punishment.

V. Wherefore, we your Trustees and Patrons, whose sole ambition and desire it is that this establishment may be beneficial by the cultivation and dissemination of kindly feeling, religion and learning, and that it may be extolled for its peaceful conduct, its distinguished purity of morals and pre-eminent virtues: and anticipating the joy that we shall experience from your general decorum, joy we deem now as certain; calling to our assistance the co-operation which the superiors will religiously contribute, and appealing also to the zeal, alacrity and obedience of the Students themselves; finally commanding with the authority and voice of public law, we propose, prescribe, declare these laws, this domestic code, discipline and rules to the College of Maynooth, as having been duly passed, enacted and made known to the College of Maynooth, together with the written sanction of penalties hereafter to be resorted to if any one violate them.

Given at Maynooth, at a general meeting of the Board, on the 25th of May 1820.

Bartholomew Crotty, President of the College.

Andrew Dunn, Secretary to the Trustees.

The RULE of PIETY and of DOMESTIC DISCIPLINE.

ALL who destine themselves to discharge Ecclesiastical duties, should aim at that perfection of life to which the ministers of the church are particularly called, who are in duty bound to entice and excite all others to piety and sanctity by word and example. Let no one therefore, who lives in this College, consider that he has discharged his duty, that he has answered his own calling and that of God, as also the expectation of men, unless he has applied himself to the study of divine, more than of human wisdom, particularly during the time he lives in College. Wherefore let all the Students endeavour to fulfil and discharge, not superficially but promptly and cheerfully, those duties which regard the discipline of Piety.

Every day at the hour appointed, on the signal being given, and the Benedicamus Domino being heard, let each person answer Deo Gratias, and immediately let him arise from bed and making the most holy sign of the Cross, let him put on his clothes, and as soon as he has done so, let him employ himself sedulously for the space of a half hour in washing his hands, adjusting his bed, and in making up his room. If any time shall remain, let it be spent in preparing his mind for prayer.

On the ringing of the bell let all assemble in the prayer hall, and there having implored particularly the aid of the Holy Ghost, let them devoutly recite the prayer Domine Deus omnipotens, qui ad principium hujus diei, &c. together with the other prayers which are found at Prime, in the Roman Breviary; and moreover, the subject of meditation being repeated, praying for half an hour, let them open the eyes of their mind to the splendour of eternal light, by which received as divine aliment, and repeated frequently during the day, the spirit may be nourished. Afterwards at the hour appointed, let all attend at the same time religiously at the unbloody sacrifice of the mass, at which, let two clerks from among the same body, clad in surplices, minister with reverence.

Every day before dinner, the ordinary signal being given, assembling in the chapel, let them piously and devoutly adore the Blessed Sacrament during the eighth part of an hour; then let them proceed straightway in silence to the dining-hall; in like manner assembling in the prayer-hall before supper, on bended knees let them search their consciences by a particular examination. Finally, assembling a second time in the prayer-hall before they go to bed, humbly offering the incense of night prayer to Almighty God, let them search their consciences by a general examination, and especially let them inquire what sin they may consider themselves to have contracted all that day; in like manner let them apply themselves to the subject of private meditation for the following day, until the signal being received from the Dean, they proceed straightforward in silence to their chambers. At the appointed hour, the signal Benedicamus Domino being given, the candles being put out, which are not to be lighted again during the night under any pretext, let them all retire to rest.

In the dining-hall, let no one presume to sit at table until the blessing has been given by the person who presides. Moreover, let none of the Students be allowed to absent themselves from the public table, unless from urgent necessity and with the consent of the Dean. Dinner being ended, and the signal being given by the same person presiding, let all arise and according to the direction of the Breviary, let them give due thanks to the immortal and invisible God, and let them immediately depart from the hall with due decorum. During the meal let some one read continually, and first let ordinarily an entire chapter of the Holy Scriptures be read; let the remainder of the time be spent in reading some religious book, mentis suppetat; quæ ut obtineant, silentium in cœnaculo semper servetur: martyrologium Romanum sub finem prandii legatur.

Sint horæ statutz ad animi relaxationem corporisque sanitatem, quæ in exercitiis extra cubicula agantur: spatiisque communibus nemini liceat abesse.

Præcipuis anni solemnitatibus, et rursus singulis quindenis diebus, ad sacrum pœnitentiæ tribunal accedant Alumni, et post missam privatam auditam, nisi aliter confessariis visum fuerit, angelorum pane se reficiant. Singulis autem dominicis, festisque diebus de præcepto, missæ solemniter cantandæ, et vespers pariter ad modum chori decantandis, in sacello intersint; veste canonica talari et superpelliceo Clerici sint induti.

Cum experiëntiâ constet ad pietatem fovendam spiritali recessu nihil pleniùs inservire, ideo statutis temporibus in hisce exercitiis toti sint Alumni; animos et sensus diligenter custodiant, corda et cogitationes sedulò perscrutentur; et sacris concionibus instituti quid in iis loquatur Dominus attentè audiant, et fideliter custodiant.

Cum summoperè cavendum sit, ne adolescentes otio se unquam dedant, omnis cura adhibenda est, ut intellectus eorum indesinenter vel pietatis vel literarum studiis occupetur, nisi cum relaxare animum, certis diei horis, unicuique eorum est permissum. Considerantes ergo cujus gratiâ, et quâ mercede, ab iis qui in sortem Domini sunt vocati, laborandum sit, indesinenter a Patre Luminum postulent sapientiam et ejus ad gloriam omnem laborum fructum referant. Alumni omnes, lectionibus ac studiis communibus, horis statutis, in respectivis scholis habendis, interesse debent: interim classium suarum Præfectis obtemperantes, ingenio suo nunquam nimis indulgeant, nec aliis utantur libris, quam qui a Præsidente et Professoribus fuerint approbati.

Etsi habitus non facit Monachum, oportet tamen Clericos vestes proprio congruentes ordini semper deferre, ut per decentiam habitûs extrinseci, morum honestatem intrinsecam ostendant. Uniformiter igitur vestibus nigri coloris utantur Alumni, diebus Dominicis, et festis in populo, tam intra quam extra Collegium; aliis vero diebus habitu fusco vel sub-nigro utantur. Præter vestes seculares, habeant singuli togam, pileumque Academicum quibus, tum intra tum extra mœnia, indui teneantur.

Silentium ad pacem pietatemque fovendam, ad nutrienda studia, et animi perturbationes sedandas avertendasque maximè conducens, sanctè omnes statutis temporibus servant. Nulla igitur colloquia studiis admisceantur; neque ante vel immediatè post orationem, missam et sanctorum Sacramentorum perceptionem, confabulationes ullæ habeantur, ne diebus quidem relaxationi assignatis, quorum horæ reliquæ de rebus utilibus, modestis sermonibus, sine clamore transigantur; et Alumnorum verba, vultus, oculi, motus denique omnes decorem teneant, redoleantque pietatem atque disciplinam. Tempore quo singuli privatis vel publicis studiis incumbere debent, caveant ne per Collegium ultrò citròque vagentur, et quando secùs necessitas postulet, teneantur licentiam impetrare. Horis studiis assignatis, altum silentium per totum Collegium obtineat.

Alumnis in aliena cubicula ingredi non liceat. Ministrorum, famulorum cubicula, coquina, promptuarium, aliaque hujusmodi loca ingredi nemo ex iis audeat; colloquia, confabulationesque cujuscunque generis cum famulis Alumni vitent. In his omnibus, si quid aliud necessitas suadeat, Decani judicio fiat. Singuli, qui a Præsidente, vel Propræsidente exundi veniam obtineant, ante exitum, et statim post reditum, coram alterutro ex Decanis sese sistere teneantur.

Et cum in omnibus nitor et mundities apparere debeant, non erit hîc alienum præscribere, ne alumnorum vitio, cubiculorum parietes seu pavimentum sordescant, neve ipsi vestibibus dilaceratis in publicum prodeant, ut agrestem fugiant negligentiam.

Tandem, in domesticis officiis et actionibus, in colloquiis inter se, vel cum externis, in eis denique omnibus quæ ad pietatis disciplinam, doctrinæ institutionem, ac recti ordinis conservationem spectabunt, omnes obedientiam Præsidi, aliisque ipsi subjectis Ministris religiosè exhibeant, eosque semper observent, ac reverenter et modeste cum iis ubique colloquantur. Ferant patientèr se ab illis admoneri vel etiam reprehendi, aut si quando opus fuerit, prævaricantes aliquâ affici pœnâ.

Fit quandoque ut animi juvenum, rerum utpote expertes, ultrò conturbentur, nec desunt aliquando turbulenti, atque factiosi, qui non solum cæteris, sed nec sibi quidem acquiescunt. Omnes ergo communem cum cæteris vitæ rationem sequantur, seque ad Collegii instituta et consuetudines accommodent: neque quicquam peculiare in mensâ, aut aliâ quâcunque re usurpent, ut omnis querelarum occasio, teterrimum illud vitæ socialis venenum, prorsus tollatur. Sint semper in arbitrio Præsidis aut Ministrorum qui ipsi subjiciuntur, vel locorum ad mensam, vel scholarum distributio, vel alia hujusmodi similia; qui communi bono cum semper debeant consulere, rectiùs quam adolescentes, quorum singuli vel nimium ingenio suo indulgere, vel sibi tantummodo consulere vellent, quid faciendum servandumque sit, in Domino judicabunt.

which may both nourish the understanding and direct the will, that when food is given to the body, some nourishment may also be administered to the mind; to attain these objects, let silence be constantly preserved in the dining-hall; let the Roman martyrology be read towards the conclusion of dinner.

Let there be hours appointed for the relaxation of the mind and health of the body, which should be passed in exercises without their bed rooms, and let no one be permitted to absent himself from the public walks.

On the principal holydays of the year, and also every fifteen days, let the Students approach the sacred tribunal of penance, and after having heard private mass, let them, unless their confessors think otherwise, strengthen themselves with the bread of angels. Every Sunday and on holydays of obligation, let them attend the singing of high mass, and in like manner at the chaunting of vespers in choir in the chapel; let the Clerks wear a lutan and surplice.

Whereas it is proved by experience that nothing is more conducive to cherish piety than spiritual retreat, let the Students therefore devote themselves to this exercise at stated times; let them diligently guard their minds and senses; let them sedulously search their hearts and thoughts, and instructed by holy sermons, let them attentively hear what the Lord may say in them, and faithfully keep it.

Whereas there is the greatest necessity to beware lest young men may give themselves up to idleness; every care is to be used that their understanding may be unceasingly occupied in the studies either of piety or of learning, unless when it is permitted to each of them to relax their minds at certain hours of the day. Considering therefore with what object and for what hire those must labour, who are called to the work of the Lord, they should unceasingly ask for wisdom from the Father of Lights, and refer all the fruit of their labours to his glory. All the students are bound to attend the public lessons and studies at the stated hours, in their respective classes; in the mean while obeying the Prefects of their classes, let them never be too indulgent to their own disposition, nor use other books than those approved by the President and Professors.

Though habit does not constitute a Monk, it is necessary, however, the Clerks should wear clothes corresponding to their station, that by the decency of their exterior habit, they may shew the interior purity of their morals. Let the Students, therefore, uniformly wear black clothes on Sundays, and on holydays of obligation, as well within as without College; but on the other days, let them wear a grey or dark dress. Besides their secular garments, let them have a gown and College cap, which they are bound to wear as well within as without the walls.

Let all religiously preserve, at the stated times, silence, which is so conducive to cherish peace and piety, to promote study, and to appease and avert perturbation of mind. Let there be therefore no conversation during studies, and let there be no discourse entered into before or immediately after prayer, mass, or receiving the Holy Sacraments, not even on the days allotted to relaxation, the remaining hours of which should be passed without noise in useful occupations and modest conversations; and let the words, looks, eyes, in fine all the movements of the Students, preserve decorum, and be redolent of piety and discipline. At the time when each should be employed in private or public study, let them beware of wandering to and fro through the College, and when necessity demands otherwise, let them be bound to obtain permission. During the hours allotted to study, let profound silence prevail through the entire College.

Let not the Students be allowed to enter the chambers of others. Let none of them attempt to enter the bed-chambers of the attendants, servants, the kitchen, pantry, and other such places. Let the Students shun conversations of every kind with the servants. In all these cases, if necessity require differently, let it be done with the approbation of the Dean. Let each person who obtains permission to go out from the President or Vice-President, be bound to present himself before going out and after his return, before one or other of the Deans.

And whereas neatness and cleanliness should appear in all, it will not be unseasonable to direct here, that the walls of the chambers or the floors should not be disfigured by the Students, and that they should not appear in public with torn garments; that they should shun rustic negligence.

Finally, in their domestic duties and conduct, in their conversations among themselves, or with externs, in all those matters which will regard the discipline of piety, the promotion of learning, and the preservation of good order, let all scrupulously show obedience to the President, and to the other officers subject to him; let them always look up to them, and speak with them on all occasions with reverence and modesty. Let them bear with patience that they should be admonished by them, or even reprimanded; or whenever it may be necessary, that they should be punished when guilty of any offence.

It sometimes happens that the minds of young men, from inexperience of the world, are disturbed without reason; nor are there wanting on some occasions, turbulent and factious individuals, who are dissatisfied not only with others, but likewise with themselves. Let all then follow the same course of life with their fellows; let them conform to the usages and rules of the College; and let them not use any thing particular at table, or in any other circumstances, in order that all occasion of complaints, that worst bane of social life, may be entirely removed. Let the distribution of the places at table, or of the classes, or other matters of this kind, be at the discretion of the President or of the officers subject to him; who, bound as they are to consult for the common good, will judge in the Lord, what should be done or observed, more correctly than young men, who might be disposed to indulge their own caprice too much, or to consult only their own convenience.

Rule of Piety
in the College of Maynooth.

Omnes denique intelligant, tantò se aptiores huic futuros esse Collegio, et ad finem præscriptum consequendum magis idoneos, quantò ad pietatem comparandam alacriores, ad obtemperandum promptiores, et ad disciplinarum studia capessenda diligentiores se exhibuerint. Unusquisque igitur Apostoli vocibus obediens, quâ vocatione a Deo vocatus est, in eâ Domino pacifice, et alacriter inserviat. Mutuam omnes inter se charitatem et benevolentiam in vinculo pacis, nemini dantes ullam offensionem, diligenti studio foveant: modestiam atque humilitatem colant, contentiones et æmulationes vitent, quæ cum opera carnis sint, eodem Apostolo testante, maximorum sæpe malorum causa existunt. Æmulantes igitur charismata meliora, quas in aliis virtutes cernunt, eas in semetipsis exprimere contendant, et eximiæ virtutis exempla vicissim sumant: vitia autem si quæ forte in aliis conspexerint, vitare omnino studeant, et quæ sibi in aliis displicent, admittere reformident.

Cum sequens S. Congregationis de Propaganda Fide Epistola, ad Curatores Ecclesiasticos Regalis Catholici Collegii S. Patricii, Reipublicæ Ecclesiasticæ in Hibernia plurimum intersit; illam typis edendam sanxerunt Curatores prædicti, simul cum eorundem Responso.

Per illustres ac Reverendissimi D. D.

EA semper fuit firma, constansque hujus S. Congregationis in Ecclesiam Hiberniæ, avitæ Sanctitatis laude spectatissimam summa cum existimatione conjuncta dilectio, ut quemadmodum ex adversis, quæ quandocunque ipsi acciderint, magnam semper tristitiam, magnamque dolorem corde hauserit, sic nunc vicissim vestræ consors lætitiæ summopere gaudet, nec sibi minus quam Vobis de optatissimo nuntio gratulatur, quod litterarum Vestrarum significatione nuper accepit; Potentissimi nempe, Clementissimique Regis, Augustique Senatus eximia liberalitate, ac munificentia, copiam Vobis, facultatemque factam esse instituendi, erigendique per amplum Seminarium pro Adolescentibus ad Sacrum Ministerium informandis. De quo tali tamque prospero eventu, cum ante omnia immortales largitori bonorum omnium Deo. Opt. Max. gratias habere debemus, tum et istud vehementer expectandum, quod sedulo a Vobis præstitum iri non dubitamus, in hoc tam insigni accepto beneficio, omni qua par est, grati et obsequentis animi significatione dignos Vos fuisse comprobetis. Quod si nefas debito huic officio erga eos deesse, quos adversarios patimur, quid non iis debeamus, per quos dat Nobis Deus, ut horum benignitate sublevati quietam, et tranquillam vitam in omni pietate degere valeamus?

Atque id quidem eo felicius cessurum Vobis, propitiante Deo, confidimus, quo pro perspecta jamdudum, planeque cognita præstanti Vestra virtute certiores sumus, nunquam vos desituros, in hæc duo potissime Pastoralis vestræ sollicitudinis munera incumbere; primum ut Juvenes in fortem Domini vocatos curetis dignis hac sacra vocatione præceptis, et moribus imbuendos, ut quemadmodum præcipit Apostolus, proficiant in fide, et dilectione, discant sobrii esse, prudentes, pudici, modesti, non cupidi, non vinolenti, non litigiosi, nemini dantes ullam offensionem, solliciti servare pacem in unitate Spiritus, tum insuper sæpe seduloque admonendi principibus, et potestatibus subditos esse, ut nunquam istos poeniteat, immo sibi potius eo magis in dies plaudendum existiment de insigni hoc suo in Catholicos collato beneficio, quo certius ipsis constiterit insitum illud erga sublimiores potestates inviolatæ fidelitatis obsequium, Catholicæ Professionis maxime proprium, quod Apostolico mandato Divinitus præscriptum, probe nostis, quam sancte, quam sedulo fuerit a S. Congregatione Alumnis suis ubivis terrarum degentibus omni tempore commendatum.

Alterum

In a word, all should be sensible, that they will be the fitter for this College, and the better qualified to attain the end prescribed, in proportion as they shall exhibit themselves more willing to acquire piety, more prompt to obey, and more diligent in the prosecution of their studies. Let each therefore, obedient to the words of the Apostle, peacefully and cheerfully be subject to the Lord in that calling in which he has been called by God. Let all carefully cherish mutual charity and good will in the bond of peace, giving offence to no man: let them cultivate modesty and humility, let them shun contentions and disputes, which being the works of the flesh, according to the testimony of the same Apostle, are oftentimes the cause of the greatest misfortunes. Emulating, therefore, the better gifts, let them endeavour to form in themselves the virtues, which they see in others, and in their turn, let them adopt the examples of distinguished excellence; at the same time let them study to shun the vices, which they happen to see in others, and let them dread to commit what displeases them in others.

Declarations of the Students of the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth.

I, the undersigned, promise and engage, That I am neither at present concerned in any latent conspiracy, and that I will not be concerned at any other time in such, and that I will carefully and faithfully preserve all and every one of the statutes and regulations of this College, as long as I shall remain in it, and that I shall not intentionally say or do any thing, by which the said statutes and regulations may sustain any detriment, or by which the other Students may be led to their violation or contempt; to the truth of which I have here subscribed.

“For he that rejecteth wisdom and discipline is unhappy; and their hope is vain and their labours without fruit, and their works unprofitable.” Sap. chap. 3. v. 11.

I consider this Translation of the Statutes and Regula Pietatis, &c. of the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth, to be perfectly correct; and to render faithfully the sense of the original.

Alterum est, in quo summo semper studio cura evigilavit Pastorum Ecclesiæ, ut qui Sacris Disciplinis addicti sunt Adolescentes, bonæ, sanæque doctrinæ verbis erudiantur, quæ dein ubi opus fuerit, potentes sint, aliis, ut monet Apostolus, fideliter tradere, quæ etiam diligenti cautione, ut et omni alia ope providendum est, ne in gregem irrepant aliquando, aut serpent latius perniciosarum opinionum, seu potius errorum portenta, quæ miseris hisce præsertim temporibus insana quædam philosophandi libido in humani generis perniciem invexit, quam ea mox consecuta est flagitiorum, scelerum, impietatum generis cujusque fæda, tetraque colluvies, jam ut nemini obscurum esse queat, quin dilapsa semel ex hominum mentibus notitia Supremi Numinis, simul cum extincta religione sensus omnis humanitatis extinguatur.

Neque minus curandum, ne sint inter Vos, qui falsa zeli specie inducti, licere sibi putent Sacra Dogmata, Dogmatumve consecrata vocabula emollire, quo facilius discissas Sectas ad concordiam cum Catholicis ineundam allicere valeant, quasi non secus ac si de forensi lite ageretur, fas esset de Verbo Dei transigere, cujus depositum Ecclesiæ creditum est incorrupta fide custodiendum: Imprudentes sane, qui non advertant in mundanarum rerum omnium perpetua inconstantia, et mutabilitate, hanc plane unam Catholici Dogmatis inviolatam ab origine integritatem, non nisi una quoque Divini Sui Conditoris admirabili virtute sustentari potuisse, in qua una proinde immutabili constantia Digitus ipse Dei patentem omnium oculis, eandemque splendidissimam notam impresserit, qua una Divina Religio se sua luce a ceteris Sectarum quarumcunque variantibus commentis secerneret.

Quo majori reprehensione digni se produnt, qui Catholicos sese profitentes, dum suo nutu, et arbitratu, sprete communi Ecclesiarum auctoritate Doctores Legis esse volunt, in profana, et vaniloquia convertuntur, quibus etiam dum agnoscunt, ultroque fatentur dissensiones, jurgia, contentiones oriri, in his tamen obfirmato animo persistunt, haud satis attendentes, quo instinctu concitetur spiritus iste contentionis, cujus consuetudinem non habet Ecclesia Dei, per quem turbata Ecclesiæ pace Spiritus veritatis contristatur, Spiritus Dei, qui Deus est pacis, et non dissensionis.

Cui gliscenti malo comprimendo cum alia multa, tum et istud pro Vestra Sapientia intelligitis, quod paullo ante indicatum est, valde profuturum, si Juvenes, qui Vobis commendantur, sanæ doctrinæ pabulo enutriendi, discant in primis non altum sapere, sed sapere ad sobrietatem, ne et ipsi juvenili quodam impetu animi elati, sese cupidius illis implicant peregrinis, noviter inductis, ad exquisitoris cujusdam eruditionis fallacem speciem compositis, et adornatis opinionum commentis, quibus non paucos reprobæ, suspectæve notæ Scriptores audiant ad aliquam ut nemini certe Catholico invidendam nominis, et famæ celebritatem pervenisse. Miseri, qui sese Auctoribus temere committant, quos scire debeant et falli, et fallere potuisse: Sæpius proinde admonendi, quod præclare dictum est ab Augustino, doctrinam veritatis positam esse a Deo in Cathedra Unitatis; ut qui tutum se ab omni errandi periculo præstare velit, ad illius Apostolicæ Cathedræ auctoritatem se conferat, quam sciat sic a diebus antiquis dispositam esse, ut per Os Petri perpetuo in ea victuri audirent Gentes Verbum Evangelii, et crederent. Absit propterea, ut Catholicus quispiam satis sapiens sibimetipsi videri velit, ut eum pudeat ex ejus Sedis Magisterio pendere, a qua una maximus Doctor Hieronymus, ut sentiendi ita et loquendi normam dari sibi summis precibus efflagitabat.

Verum cum et nonnullæ ad huc supersint quæstiones, quæ in Scholarum disputationibus in utramque partem salva fide, et pace versantur, magni quoque refert statuere, quibus potissimum Ducibus, ac Magistris in earum explicatione utendum sit. Quo in delectu ne diutius hæsitandum sit, faciunt duo illa, quæ se statim omnium oculis offerunt splendissima Ecclesiæ lumina, et ornamenta Augustinus et Thomas, quorum excellenti doctrinæ Orbem prope totum Theologicæ Disciplinæ complectenti, eo tutius fidere quisque valeat, quo ampliora illis omni ætate, Sapientium omnium consensu, Summorum Pontificum notissimis Decretis tributa sunt plena laudis, et commendationis insignia.

Horum ductu nimia quorundam, nimiumque dissoluta in tradendis morum regulis facilitas ita vitabitur, ut Evangelicæ Caritatis mansuetudo, et suavitas ab ea quæ propria est Christianæ institutionis salutaris severitate nunquam disjungatur.

His tot tantisque adjumentis cum Pastoralis Vestri Ministerii viva vox accesserit plena gravitatis, et sapientiæ minime profecto dubitandum, quin ex florente ista lectissimorum Adolescentum corona, quos in spem Ecclesiæ Curæ Vestræ commendatos Sacra Congregatio amantissime complectitur, quam plures, juvante Deo idonei prodituri sint Ministri CHRISTI JESU, qui providentes bona coram Deo, et hominibus, doctrinæ veritatem Sanctitate vitæ illustrent, et comprobent: Quorum conversatio e Cœlis in terram deducta vel ipsos nostros Obtrectatores in sui admirationem rapiat, eosque ad glorificandum Deum in veritatis agnitione facilius adducat.

Interea dum Sacra Congregatio sua Vobis omnia Studia, et officia defert ex animo, Deum Opt. Max. summis precibus rogare non desinit, ut Vos Vestri semper simillimos Sibi, Ecclesiæque universæ quam diutissime servet incolumes.

Archiepiscopis, et Episcopis Præfectis, seu Commissariis
REGALIS COLLEGII CATHOLICI S. PATRICII in Hibernia.

RESPONSUM.

Eminentissime et Reverendissime Domine,

POST acceptam ab Archiepiscopo Dubliniensi pergratam Eminentiaæ tuæ nobis inscriptis Regalis Collegii Catholici S. Patritii Curatoribus, ad diem 9 Mensis Julii, proximè præteriti inscriptam Epistolam, nonnisi hisce diebus una convenire potuimus. Nulla interposita mora, perlecta est in ipso præsentis nostri Conventus exordio, cum omnium nostrum lætitia et plausu singulari. In illa namque cognovimus tum consiliorum gravitatem summam, tum eximiam prudentiam doctrinæ sacræ et eloquentiæ luminibus ornatam, denique caritatem illam, qua S. Congregatio sibi semper constans et par rebus nostris studere et patrocinari non cessat.

Pro tam insigni E. E. P. P. in nos et hanc Hiberniæ Ecclesiam Studii et Amoris monumento, gratias agimus quam maximas, simulque spondemus ac pollicemur, nihil nos, opitulante Deo, pro viribus nostris non acturos, ut quæ tam sapienter et opportune ab Eminentia tua nobis commendantur, pro religionis bono, et sacri nostri Ministerii decore, ad effectum perducantur.

Hoc a nobis exigit misera, qua utimur, temporum conditio, siquidem compertum est, divinas humanasque leges ab impiis fæderatis hominibus philosophorum titulo proterve abutentibus jacere palam spretas et conculcatas, illorumque conatus et molimina eo omnia spectare, ut oblitteratis, si fieri possit, in hominum mentibus religionis principiis, quibus vel ipsa totius civilis Societatis fundamenta innituntur, corruptæ Naturæ cupiditatibus liberius indulgeant, et obsequium spiritualibus et terrenis potestatibus debitum omnino excutiant. Quæ inde secuta sint omnis generis Calamitates et Mala quis ignoret? Quis neget? Quis bonus non defleat?

Nostrum profecto est præcipue, immo cujusvis ordinis Ecclesiasticorum, hisce ingentibus malis ex novorum errorum portentis scaturientibus, agmine facto et in aciem instructo, quantum possumus, occurrere Verbo Vitæ in doctrina sana, et exemplo irreprehensibili; ut eos qui contradicunt efficaciter arguere valeamus.

Ad juvenes in sortem Domini vocatos atque sacris disciplinis in Collegio imbuendos quod attinet, maxime interest, uti sapienter monet Eminentia tua, ut sanæ doctrinæ pabulo enutrientur, atque a noxio vel suspecto arceantur: Cavendum item ab inutilibus et stultis quæstionibus quæ lites generant. In dubiis vero de quibus salva fide et pace in Scholis hinc inde disputatur cum Nobis exploratum sit quot, et quam eximiis præconiis Summi Pontifices et Ecclesia universa omni ævo exornaverint doctrinam S. Augustini, et S. Thomæ fidelissimi ejus interpretis, hos tanquam duces et Magistros in ejusmodi quæstionibus amplectendos et sequendos curabimus.

Neque minus nobis cordi erit, omni qua par est grati et obsequentis animi significatione, dignos nos comprobare insignis accepti beneficii a Serenissimi Regis nostri Augustique Senatus liberalitate et Munificentia; itemque pro tali tamque prospero eventu bonorum omnium largitori Deo. Opt. Max. immortales gratias habere.

Ingemiscimus profecto vel inter eos qui Catholicos se profitentur, nonnullos reperiri, qui vel falsæ pietatis specie vel ingenii luxuriantis illecebris adducti, dogmata dogmatumque ab Ecclesia Dei sancita vocabula emollire et extenuare conantur; et spreta communi Ecclesiarum omnium auctoritate, Doctores legis se exhibentes, ad vaniloquia et profana convertuntur; non satis attendentes concitari inde Spiritum Contentionis cujus consuetudinem non habet Ecclesia Dei. His constanter opponemus præclarum Augustini effatum—doctrinam Veritatis positam esse in Cathedra Unitatis—proindeque vere Catholicorum Nemini licere a Sedis Apostolicæ Magisterio se subducere, a qua una Maximus Doctor Hieronymus ut sentiendi ita et loquendi normam dari sibi summis precibus efflagitabat.

Hanc salutarem sentiendi et loquendi regulam a Majoribus nostris accepimus, quibus nulli priores unquam fuere in agnoscenda tuendaque Romani Pontificis suprema in universos Christi fideles divinitus instituta jurisdictione et auctoritate: Cujus, ut et cæterorum Catholicæ fidei dogmatum sacratissimum depositum nobis commissum, fideliter custodiemus inviolatum, Successoribus nostris tradendum.

Interim, Nos et Collegium cui præsumus S. Congregationis patrocínio enixè commendantes necnon Deum Opt. Max. indefinenter exorantes ut EMINENTIAM TUAM, ad Ecclesiæ bonum et decus, quam diutissime sospitet servetque incolumem, singulari cum obsequio ex animo subscribimur.

Minutes of Evidence taken before the Commissioners of Education Inquiry, at their Office, in Dublin.

Examination of the Very Reverend Bartholomew Crotty, D. D.
Thursday, 19th October 1826.

YOU hold the situation of President of the College at Maynooth?—I do.

Were you appointed President at the first institution of the College?—No; my appointment took place in November 1813.

Whom did you succeed?—I succeeded the Most Reverend Dr. Murray, the present Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, who, on the resignation of Dr. Everard, consented to act as president, until a fit person could be found for the place.

Did you hold any situation in connection with Maynooth before your appointment as President?—No.

Where did you reside previously?—I resided in the county of Cork for a few years. I returned to Ireland in the year 1811 from Lisbon, where I had been educated.

Have you a general superintendence of the College at Maynooth?—Yes, as far as any President can have it; to the full extent, determined by our statutes.

What degree of control does your situation enable you to exercise?—A general inspection over all the members of the house, whether students, professors, or other officers of the College, such as the Vice-President and Deans; when the Familia Academica is assembled, the President is the head of all.

Is the house itself regulated by statutes that were established at its first institution?—Not immediately at the first institution; there was what the present statutes call The Jus vetus; it was a body of laws for the government of the house, but not so regular and comprehensive as it was made afterwards; I think it was in 1800 that the first edition of the statutes was published; there were some changes made, with the sanction of the Lord Lieutenant and the Board of Trustees, at the time that this second edition was given; which were deemed necessary for the good government of the house.

Before those statutes were finally arranged, what standard had the President to go by, in regulating the management of the house?—The present statutes were printed in 1800. During the few years that intervened between the establishment of the College and that period, the President was directed by the Jus vetus, which consisted of the present "Regula Pietatis et Disciplinæ domesticæ," together with a few additional regulations, that never were printed. They were meant to be in force only until a more regular and comprehensive code could be formed; and accordingly, when the present statutes were published the former laws were abolished, with the exception of the Regula Pietatis, which received a new sanction on that occasion, as appears from the statutes, (c. 14.) There is a copy of the old regulations in the College, though they are no longer binding.

In what manner was the law you now abide by, formed?—I believe it was formed principally by the late Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, the Most Reverend Dr. Troy, and perhaps two or three other persons to assist him in drawing it up.

Did he take any former set of statutes of any other college or university as a model in forming it?—The "Regula Pietatis et Disciplinæ domestica," was in a great measure extracted from the laws of the Irish College at Rome, the Collegium Ludovicinum.

When drawn up, were they submitted to the Trustees for their decision and approbation?—The Act of Parliament requires that any regulation that is intended as a statute for the College, should be first submitted to the Trustees, or rather drawn up under their inspection. To have the force of law, it must be presented to the Lord Lieutenant, and have his approbation either expressly given, or if no answer be given to it within a month after it has been submitted to him, it is then considered to have his tacit approbation, and that is, by Act of Parliament, sufficient.

Will you be so good as to state who are the Trustees, and by what authority they are appointed?—The Trustees were originally appointed by Act of Parliament, and under the Act of Parliament there is a power given to the Trustees whenever the place of any one becomes vacant, to appoint another in his stead.

They fill up their own number?—Yes.

Is there any particular qualification necessary in order to enable a person to be a Trustee?—In the original nomination or appointment made by government, there were eleven Roman Catholic Bishops and six Noblemen and Gentlemen, and the understanding I suppose was, that the same number of each should be constantly kept up; so that we have always had eleven bishops and six laymen. Dr. Hussey, the first President of the College, was also a Trustee, though not a Bishop at the time of his appointment.

Have the goodness to name the present Trustees?—The Earl of Fingall, the Earl of Kenmare, Viscount Gormanstown, Lord French, Sir Edward Bellew, Mr. Hussey, the four Catholic Archbishops, Dr. Curtis, Dr. Kelly, Dr. Murray, and Dr. Laffan; and the following Bishops, Dr. Murphy, Dr. Plunket, Dr. Magauran, Dr. Doyle, Dr. Marum, Dr. Kelly, and Dr. M^cLoughlin.

Do particular bishops hold the office of Trustees ex officio, or are the respective bishops who hold the office, selected according to the pleasure of the Trustees?—They vary, with the exception of the four Roman Catholic Archbishops, who are always Trustees.

Is it a matter of right that the four Archbishops are always Trustees?—I cannot positively say; the four Archbishops were named in the original Act of Parliament, and I suppose it was understood as the wish of government that the same should be always kept up.

What other duties have the Trustees?—The Trustees are, I may say, along with the government of the country, the legislative body of the house, and have an inspection over the conduct of the President and of all the members of the College; they meet generally twice a year, in January and in June; the meeting in June is generally held at the College; they inquire into the state of the house, with regard to the discipline and studies; and particularly inspect, at both meetings, the accounts of the house.

Will you be so good as to state in what way you consider the government as forming a part of the legislative body of the house?—I mean that no law made by the Trustees is binding unless it be approved by the Lord Lieutenant, with the exception however of laws appertaining to Catholic doctrine or discipline.

Have the government any cognizance of the law, before it has actually received the sanction of the Trustees?—No; the Trustees draw it up, and present it to the Lord Lieutenant.

In point of fact, have the government ever expressed any opinion about any law of the College?—Both editions of the printed statutes had the express approbation of the Lord Lieutenant before they were printed. I saw the letter of the Right hon. Charles Grant declaring this with regard to the second edition; the other was printed long before my time. I remember on one occasion I had to refer to Mr. Grant, when he was here as Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, and my reason for applying to him was, to endeavour to get a statute sanctioned, or re-enacted rather, which had been abrogated by the Visitors. The statute was of this nature; it had been drawn up by the Board, and approved of by the Lord Lieutenant at the time that the present Lord Maryborough was Secretary in Ireland. It was a statute to enable the President, after consulting with the council of the house, to remove from the College any young man whose longer residence in it was considered to be incompatible with the good order and discipline of the College, without assigning to him any specific reason for doing so, but merely after consulting the council of the house. That statute was in force for some time, and I had occasion to act on it in one particular case, and to remove a young man from the College in virtue of the statute; he appealed to the Visitors, and the Chief Justice, Lord Downes, was of opinion that the statute was abusive; that it was contrary to the law of the land that any subject who had a vested right in the College, as he said, should be removed from it without being tried, and confronted with the persons that brought charges against him; and as that was not supposed to be done when that statute was acted upon, he declared that the statute was null and void, though it had been drawn up by the Trustees, and received the sanction of the Lord Lieutenant: the consequence was, that the young man was restored to his place in the house. I however took the liberty, as I thought I was bound to do, of mentioning to the Lord Chancellor, that as the Visitors did not find fault with the removal of the young man from the house, on the the merits of the case, but merely because the mode of proceeding that ought to have been adopted was not observed, I would proceed in the way they directed on the same day, and remove him again after the visitation was over. The Judges made no observation whatever on the remark I made, but after the visitation was over, the Lord Chancellor told me, that he not only approved of my doing what I then said I would do, but strongly recommended me to pursue that mode of acting. The young man himself, that evening, before the proceedings against him could take place, wrote me a note, and said that he had accomplished the only object he had in view, which was, to be restored to his place in the house, but did not intend to profit of it by remaining any longer, and therefore he resigned his place, and went off that evening. This is the only instance I know of a statute confirmed by the Lord Lieutenant having been declared invalid by the Judges. There was lately a statute presented which had only the tacit approval of government; it is the only one I know of.

What persons constitute what you call The Council of the House?—The council of the house, or the President's council, consists of the Vice President, the two Deans, and four Professors; that is to say, the Prefect of the Dunboyne establishment, two of divinity, and one of the sacred scriptures.

Have they a general superintendence with you of the affairs of the house?—The council does not interfere in the ordinary business of the house; they are assembled only on the appointment of Professors, and Senior, or Dunboyne scholars, and in some cases of expulsion. In other matters, the President is assisted in the government of the house by the Vice-President and Deans; they aid him in the enforcement of discipline.

In what manner is this council constituted; do those persons whom you have named belong to it ex officio, or are they nominated by yourself?—It is regulated that the council shall consist of those persons, by one of the statutes of the house. In page 19, of the Statutes, paragraph 5, an additional statute, lately enacted, constitutes the Prefect of the Dunboyne scholars a member of the council.

Who are the Visitors?—The Visitors are the four Chief Judges, the Lord Chancellor, the Chief Justice, Lord Norbury, and Chief Baron O'Grady, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer; there are besides three Roman Catholic Visitors, Lord Fingall, the Most Rev. Dr. Curtis, of Armagh, and the Most Rev. Dr. Murray, of Dublin.

What duties have they to perform as Visitors?—They attend with the other Visitors at every visitation, and if there be any case regarding Roman Catholic doctrine or discipline, which is made the subject of appeal, the Judges leave the matter entirely to the Roman Catholic Visitors for decision.

Is there any appeal from the Trustees to the Visitors?—Certainly.

Might there not be an inconvenience from the same persons discharging the duties of Visitors and Trustees?—I suppose it was in consequence of that inconvenience, that a change was made in the first Act, by a second Act of Parliament, by which the Chief Judges and the Chancellor of the Exchequer are no longer Trustees; they are only Visitors, and it is to them, almost entirely, that the decision of any case is left, except it regard Roman Catholic doctrine or discipline; then the Act of Parliament says they are not to interfere.

Would it be thought desirable, on any vacancy occurring, to prevent in future any persons holding the double office of Trustee and Visitor?—No, I do not think it would be convenient.

What examination is made by the Visitors at their annual visitation?—The Lord Chancellor is the person who opens the visitation, he calls upon the President to state whether since the last visitation there has been any infraction of rule, or any thing irregular in the College which will require the assistance of the Visitors to remove or suppress; he afterwards calls upon the Students to know whether they have any complaint to make against the President or other Superiors. On some occasions there may be some particular business. I remember at the visitation before the last, the Lord Chancellor thought proper to call upon us for a disclaimer of certain doctrines that he thought we might be supposed to hold, from what had taken place in the county of Kerry a short time before, where a Roman Catholic clergyman felt a difficulty in coming forward as a witness against one of his parishioners, who was in danger of being tried and hanged for murder. The Roman Catholic clergyman did not come forward, but I believe it was because he shewed very clearly to His Majesty's Attorney General that his coming forward would be rather prejudicial than serviceable to the advancement of the cause of justice, and he consequently was dispensed from it; but the Lord Chancellor thought it was necessary that we should disclaim any thing like a right in a parish priest to refuse to come forward whenever he was called upon, though it were his own parishioner that was accused; and we did disclaim the doctrine on this ground, that according to the rules of the Roman Catholic church, a parish priest has no such right; we never allow a Roman Catholic clergyman to offer himself as a voluntary witness in any case where blood may be shed, that is, where the person accused may have to suffer capitally; but if he is ordered by the laws of the country or the established authorities, to appear as a witness, he is bound to comply.

Was not the objection of the priest, in the case to which you refer, this? That he obtained the only information which he could give, by means of going at the risk of his life amongst a body of men to prevent their committing an outrage; and did he not state, that if he were to disclose the names of the persons, it would inevitably lead to the murder of any priest who attempted a similar interference again?—Yes, that was the case, as far as I recollect; and I recollect that the murder did not take place at that time, but that the priest actually prevented it and prevailed on the people to disperse, but they afterwards reassembled at some distance, and attacked the man again.

The objection therefore of the priest, was not an objection arising out of any law or discipline of the Roman Catholic church, but an objection arising out of his own sense of expediency in the particular case?—So I had the honour of explaining it to the Lord Chancellor when he referred to me upon the subject; the Lord Chancellor said he was perfectly satisfied with the explanation.

Are the duties of the Visitors prescribed in the Act of Parliament?—I believe in a very general way.

How often do those Visitations take place?—Once in three years.

What do you consider the ordinary duration of the ceremony of visitation?—A visitation properly speaking (I mean when there is no appeal) never lasts I believe more than an hour and a half; the last was concluded in a much shorter time. The Lord Chancellor proposed the questions I have mentioned; there was nothing serious that the President thought was worth giving the Judges the trouble of waiting to hear. I mentioned to the Lord Chancellor that there had been some little irregularity committed by the Students the Christmas before, in consequence of some disagreement among themselves about their places in the halls. His Lordship said it was a thing of no consequence, and he concluded the visitation, I suppose, in half an hour or forty minutes.

How many visitations do you recollect, that have exceeded half an hour's duration?—I have assisted at four visitations. That which I have just mentioned was the shortest; of the other three, one lasted an hour and a half, and the other two, from two hours and a half to three, in consequence of various appeals; the merits of which were discussed by counsel on both sides.

In what year was the College founded?—I believe the first Act of Parliament for its establishment passed in 1795.

Do you happen to know why Maynooth was pitched upon as the situation most eligible to fix it in, or why it was decided that it was better to have it in so small a town, rather than in a situation connected with a larger population, where it might perhaps be more easily supplied with what was wanting?—I believe the general reason for not wishing to have it near Dublin, for instance, was because the retirement of it was considered more favourable to the morals and to the studies of the house; that the Students were less liable to be distracted by not being in the neighbourhood of a great population; and the reason, I believe, why Maynooth was preferred, was that the Duke of Leinster was very anxious to have the College there, and gave every encouragement to its establishment on his estate.

Does it appear from experience that the situation was well chosen?—I think that in general the house is as healthy as it would be in any other situation that I could mention. It is subject in winter, more perhaps than some other parts of the country, to damps. From this circumstance, and from there being no means of airing the linen of the Students, pulmonary complaints are frequent, and often prove fatal.

The Commissioners understand that part of the buildings existed at the time the College was placed there?—Yes, the middle part of the present front existed at that time.

On what tenure is the land held?—By a lease for ever from the Duke of Leinster.

What extent of land have you?—Before the Lay College was annexed to the establishment, we had about fifty-four acres, including the ground on which the College and its Offices stand. We then acquired about twenty additional, making seventy-four acres at present.

Do you pay rent for it?—We pay a yearly rent of 72 l. to the Duke of Leinster, and we pay 140 l. a year for the other portion, which is much smaller.

On what tenure do you hold the smaller portion?—A lease for ever.

From whom do you hold it?—From a Mr. Stoyte.

What is the amount that has been expended upon the buildings, from the first institution of the College down to the year 1825?—£.41,913. 3*s.* Irish; there were considerable sums laid out in repairs, and in some changes that were made in the buildings after their first erection.

Does that sum include the expense of building a wall to inclose the College grounds?—No, the wall is not included.

Is that wall completed?—It was finished last week.

Do you consider the buildings as completed?—I think if we had a separate building for the library it would be very desirable; for the present place is rather inconvenient, and there is also danger from fire.

Is there any intention of removing it?—I believe the Trustees would, if they had the means of doing it. The chapel and refectory too, are too small for the accommodation of our present number.

You stated that the building in which the lay college was held has lately been added to the general establishment; will you have the goodness to state what was the nature of the establishment of the lay college?—The lay college was taken, and some additional building made thereto, for the purpose of educating the children of the Catholic nobility and gentry of the country; they were first established in what is now the infirmary of the College; then the establishment was connected in some way with the ecclesiastical college; but I understand from those who have been longer than I in the house, that on a visitation—I believe it was Lord Chancellor Fitzgibbon had expressed a wish, that the two establishments should be separate and independent, and they accordingly were separated. The lay college from that hour continued quite independent of the other establishment, until the Trustees, in whom the right to it was vested, thought proper to give it up, and dispose of it to the Trustees of the ecclesiastical college, which I think was done about eight years ago.

On referring to the account of money expended on the buildings, it appears that the largest sum ever expended in one year was in 1825, 6,500*l.*; how came it that so large a portion of the expenditure was so long deferred?—It was in consequence of the previous low prices of provisions that we were enabled to lay by more for the purposes of building than we had for some time before; and those buildings, though they were paid for in 1825, had been going on, I believe, for two or three years before; but the office of Imprest Accounts will disallow money paid on account; there must be a bill for it, and therefore though we paid various parcels of that sum in the preceding years, it all came into the account of 1825.

It appears that in 1821, only 100*l.* was accounted for as having been expended in building?—Yes, I believe we suspended any further buildings for some few years about that period.

Do all the Professors live in the house?—They do.

And all the Students?—Yes.

What number of Students are there now within the walls of the house?—Three hundred and ninety-one or three hundred and ninety-two.

Is there any intention on the part of the Trustees to extend the accommodations of the College, or to increase the number of persons educated there?—I cannot say whether it has been their intention; I think it would be very inconvenient to extend it more than it is.

Do you think that the College is sufficient to supply Ireland with Roman Catholic clergy?—No, I do not think it is sufficient by any means to supply Ireland with the number of Roman Catholic clergy that is necessary; but I think it would be inconvenient to have a greater number in one establishment.

How many young men are admitted into holy orders, in the course of one year, from the College?—The first of the holy orders is Sub-deaconship. I suppose the number admitted into Sub-deacon's orders in a year may vary from forty-five to fifty-five, or perhaps sixty; our number has been increasing; the number of students this year and the last is greater than ever it had been before, in consequence of the additional accommodation afforded by the new buildings; formerly the number was not near so considerable, and the number ordained was less of course than it is at present; but I suppose that on a fair average at present, and for the time to come, if the total number continues the same, we may state it at fifty admitted to holy orders every year.

Before that extension of the buildings, what number might have been ordained?—I should think that thirty-five would have been a fair average about five years ago, and for a good many years preceding.

Assuming that the buildings could now hold about 400 Students, and that the Students continue there five years, about a fifth part would be supplied annually to the church?—I think we may state on an average, that two thirds of the Students make a course of six years, and many of them seven. There must be an allowance made too, for deaths and removals, voluntary or otherwise, from College.

Have you the means of knowing the number that is annually required for the supply of the Roman Catholic priesthood in Ireland?—I think that not fewer than from eighty to ninety will be sufficient annually.

What total number do you calculate that the parish priests and the secular clergy amount to?—The curates and others, not parish priests, I should think may be taken to average double the parish priests, because there are many of the parish priests that have two curates, and some three. Some few have none I believe; something more than doubling would be necessary, because there are very few parts of Ireland where the great bulk of the priests have not one curate; if the parish priests be 900, I think the curates might be taken at about 1,800. On further consideration, I recollect that the parishes in all the large towns have three curates besides assisting priests; and I think, therefore, that the total number must be greater than what I have mentioned.

If you have any document to refer to, that can enable you to state this more accurately, will you have the goodness to furnish such corrected statement to the Commissioners?—

The most certain way of ascertaining the exact number would be by applying to the four Roman Catholic Archbishops, who would furnish the lists of their own clergy and of those of their suffragans.

Have you any means of knowing where the young persons are educated who are admitted into the Roman Catholic priesthood, who are not educated at Maynooth?—I believe the greater part of those that are educated in Ireland study in Carlow; there are other smaller seminaries, such as Kilkenny, Waterford, Tuam, and Wexford.

Can you state how many persons are admitted into holy orders in the Roman Catholic church in Ireland, who receive their education abroad?—I have not exactly the means of ascertaining, but I should think it would be a fair average to say that there are about 140 Students on the Continent in different parts, preparing themselves for the Roman Catholic ministry of this country; I think that is the lowest amount; the number is probably greater.

Do you know in what country they are receiving their education?—I believe they are principally in Paris, Rome, and Salamanca.

Have you any means of knowing the proportions at those different places?—In the Irish college in Paris, the number of Students at present is about seventy; in Rome there are very few, perhaps not more than a dozen altogether, and about the same number in Salamanca; the number at Salamanca never was great; before the invasion of Spain by the French armies in 1807, they had never more than thirty; we had in Lisbon not more than twelve on the establishment of the house; there were from the commencement of the French revolution up to 1807, between twenty and thirty externs. Besides the seventy I have mentioned, who belong to the Irish community in Paris, there are at least forty more who live as pensioners in French seminaries; some of these latter are ordained priests before leaving this country.

Are those included in the seventy you have mentioned?—No, I should think that all the Students on the Continent might be estimated fairly enough at about as many more as study in Ireland in the seminaries here; that is, I should think there are 120 in Ireland, independently of Maynooth, and 140 more on the Continent; I know there are a good many that go abroad without any certain destination.

Can you say out of what funds the expense of their education is defrayed?—In Paris there is a considerable fund, which however was curtailed a good deal in Buonaparte's time, or rather I believe before Buonaparte's time; it consisted principally of foundations made by Irishmen, who either sent money from this country, or when in France, funded sums of money there for the support of young men for the ministry of the Roman Catholic church in Ireland; Burses we call them; most of those burses belonged to particular families, and they have the nomination or appointment to them still; in some instances the nomination is vested in the Bishop of the diocese for which the fund was originally established.

Do you know the present amount of those funds?—I cannot say exactly, but I should think that they may be probably sufficient to support about sixty students, allowing about 800 francs a year for each. I mean to say that the entire income, were it all applied to the support of Students, would suffice for the number mentioned. The actual number is about seventy, half of them bursers and half pensioners.

Is there any such fund at Salamanca or in Portugal?—The Salamanca funds, and the funds that belonged to the house in Lisbon, were derived entirely from those countries, not from Irishmen resident in them, but from native Spaniards or Portuguese; or from the Spanish or Portuguese government, with the exception that at Salamanca they had a portion of their property from a person that was styled the Count Beerhaven; he was of an Irish family, and was born I believe in Spain.

Was the contribution made by the government specifically for the education of persons coming from Ireland, or was it generally for all persons admitted into those colleges?—It was specifically for persons going from Ireland for the purpose of becoming ecclesiastics.

Is there any similar contribution made by the government of France?—The government of France I believe did give something formerly to one or two of the Irish colleges; that of Bourdeaux, I believe, had something from the government, but nothing of any consequence. I suppose not more than 100*l*.

Has there been any increase of the contribution lately in consequence of the diminution of the funds from other sources?—I am not aware that there has.

Will you have the goodness to state from what sources the funds at Rome are derived?—In Rome there was formerly an Irish college which had some funds of its own, sufficient probably to support a dozen Students, and as that establishment was entirely destroyed, even before the French invaded Italy; the government at present supports a certain number of young men in the College of the Propaganda. I suppose there may be about six or eight.

Can you state what is the expense which a young man is put to who receives his education either in Salamanca or in Paris, if he pays for it himself, and does not receive any benefit from any of those burses or funds you describe?—I think the pension there is higher than it is in this country. I suppose a young man could not be supported in Salamanca for less than thirty guineas a year at the lowest. To this sum must be added his travelling expenses out and home, and about fifteen pounds a year for necessaries not supplied by the college.

What would be the expense of a young person educated at Carlow, supposing he paid the whole expense of his education?—At Carlow the charge is twenty-five guineas a year, besides the extra expenses just mentioned; with the exception of those incurred by travelling.

Are all the young men who are received into the College at Maynooth, educated gratuitously?—They are; they pay nothing for their education.

Do they pay for their maintenance?—Those that are on the establishment, and are supported by the Parliamentary grant, pay nothing directly for their maintenance, so far as their diet is concerned; but their clothing and washing, and other expenses they are obliged to defray themselves.

What proportion of the whole number of Students are maintained by the Parliamentary grant?—Two hundred and fifty. There is besides an allowance for 20 senior scholars on the Dunboyne establishment of 60*l*. a year for each, 30*l*. of which they receive, and the other 30*l*. is for their maintenance. The total amount is 1,200*l*. per annum, of which 700*l*. is supplied by the Parliamentary grant, the remaining 500*l*. comes from the Dunboyne estate.

On what footing are the remainder of the Students?—The other Students are supported either on burses, that is, the interest of money deposited in the public funds for the purpose, or they support themselves as pensioners.

How many burses are there?—The number of burses, I think, is 19 or 20.

By whom were they founded?—There were six of them founded by a Doctor O'Sullivan, a physician, who died some years ago, I think in Halifax, North America.

Was the money by means of which they were founded, bequeathed to the College?—He sent a part of it during his life time, and the remainder was left by his will.

Into

Into what portions is his bequest distributed?—There are six Students supported on it, and each of them, besides his commons, is allowed 12*l.* a year to supply himself with clothing and books, or other necessaries.

Is that according to the directions of the will?—I never saw the will.

Has that application of the money been directed by the Trustees?—I suspect that the application of the 12*l.* a year was made by the Trustees, in concurrence with the Roman Catholic Bishop of Kerry. The burses were supposed, originally, to be 30*l.* a year, or something very near it; but in consequence of the change in the funds from five to four per cent, they are now so much less of course; there is one-fifth taken off.

Can you state what number of pensioners there are who receive no aid, either from the government fund or from the burses?—I think there are about 110.

Do these 110 pensioners provide the whole of the expense of their education, or is there any contribution made to them from any other source?—They provide entirely for themselves; they receive their education free; but they are obliged to provide themselves with every thing else, except their education and rooms in the College.

Is the money that is distributed from those burses invariably given in equal portions to each individual, or is there any division or participation amongst them?—It is given in equal portions to all, with the exception of the Kerry bursers; they receive no money, but are all supported by the College.

In what way is the government money applied to the maintenance of the 250 persons who are stated to be on the establishment; is it in portions alike to all?—Alike to all certainly; they receive none of that money of course, it is given them in the diet they receive, and in the other accommodations provided for them by the College.

Is there not a certain class of the Students whom you denominate Half Pensioners, that is, who are partly maintained at the public expense, and who also contribute a certain portion of the expense of their maintenance?—Certainly.

Will you state what number there may be of those in the institution?—Thirty-four, two more or less.

In what cases does the division take place?—The division takes place in cases where the bishops give to young men belonging to their respective dioceses an half place; we do not refuse them that accommodation when they call for it; if they know that two young men are able to pay an half pension each, and that their merits are equal, instead of giving an entire place to one, they send two of them, and tell them to pay each his half pension.

And the government allowance is divided between these two?—Yes, they pay one pension between them; they have one place between them free.

What is the amount of the annual Parliamentary grant?—That has varied in different years; since 1813 it has been 9,673*l.* Irish, but in 1808 it was 12,000*l.*

What was the cause of the increase of the grant that took place in the year 1813?—The only addition that I recollect was, when our Trustees appropriated the produce of the Dunboyne estate, which was 500*l.* a year, towards the Dunboyne establishment; the government made an additional grant of 700*l.* a year in order to make up the sum of 1,200*l.*, which would be sufficient to support *twenty Students at 60*l.* a year each*, allowing them 30*l.* besides their commons.

It appears from the account before the Commissioners, that in the year 1808 the grant was increased from 7,000*l.* to 12,000*l.*; was that on account of any particular sum being wanted for building?—I believe it was in consequence of the change of the ministry at that time. The administration of the Duke of Bedford, I believe, was very favourable to the establishment, and I believe it was for the purpose of building that the additional sum was granted. I do not know whether they intended to keep it up to the same sum afterwards; but when Mr. Perceval was applied to in the year following, instead of granting them the sum that had been granted the year before, he lowered it to what it had been.

Will you be so good as to state what bequests and donations have been made to the College since its first establishment?—Those which are mentioned in the statement before the Commissioners, are not properly donations to the College; they are foundations for particular dioceses, and the funds arising from them are not applicable to the general purposes of the College, but are exclusively for the support of young men from those dioceses. I will direct that a list of donations and bequests be made out for the Commissioners.

What is the Dunboyne fund?—The Dunboyne fund consists of 500*l.* a year, arising from the rent of a portion of the Dunboyne estate, and 700*l.* a year given by government.

By whom was the Dunboyne estate left?—By Lord Dunboyne; he was Roman Catholic Bishop of Cork; he had conformed to the established religion, and when he was dying, he left that property to the College. There was a law-suit about it; it was contested by the heirs at law; and by the recommendation of the judges who tried the cause, the College compounded with the heirs at law, and took half the property, leaving the other to them.

Has the application of the funds from the Dunboyne estate been directed by the Trustees?—There was an understanding between the Trustees and His Majesty's government at the time, that it should be applied exclusively for the Dunboyne establishment, and they gave the 700*l.* additional, in order to make up the necessary sum for having twenty students on that establishment.

That was not appointed by Lord Dunboyne himself, in his will?—No; Lord Dunboyne left it to the establishment, to be disposed of as they the Trustees thought best.

What is it that you call the Dunboyne establishment in the College?—The Dunboyne establishment should consist of twenty students, who are supposed to have finished and actually have finished the ordinary course of studies in the house; and in consequence of

Appendix, N° 8.

Examination of

having exhibited more than ordinary talent and good conduct during their time in the house, are allowed to remain three years additional, in order to qualify themselves better for the duties of parish priests and masters of conference, or to be professors in the College, if they should be chosen for that purpose.

What additional annual payment do they receive when they are elected to that establishment?—£.30 a year, besides their commons.

What additional privileges have they?—They are in general bound by the same laws and statutes as the rest of the Students; their studies are conducted in somewhat a different way; they have only four lectures to attend in the course of a week, two in Divinity, one in Church History or Canon Law, and one on the Hebrew language.

What examination do they undergo previously to their being admitted to the establishment?—Their merits are ascertained by the previous examinations they have made during their ordinary course, by the distinctions and premiums they may have got, but more particularly by their getting three distinctions, that is, either premiums or accessits, in the last year of their divinity.

May any Student of a certain standing, become a candidate for the Dunboyne class, if he pleases?—No; a list is made out by the President, of those that he thinks may become candidates; he can take in none but those that have got the distinctions before mentioned, and also have the approbation of the administration of the house as to their conduct.

After this list is formed by the President, what examination do the young men undergo?—The proceedings afterwards are regulated by the statute; the council of the house meet, the President proposes his list, and he and the council conjointly make choice of those on the list, that they think most deserving of being advanced to the vacant places.

Without any future examination after the list has been formed?—There is no future examination; it is entirely decided by the previous examinations that have taken place.

Do they dine at the same table with the common Students?—They dine in the refectory with the other Students; but they have a separate table or tables to themselves.

Do they lodge in the same part of the institution?—They have a portion of one of the wings allotted for their lodging.

Are they distinguished by their dress?—There is a distinction in dress.

Are they allowed more liberty as to their studies?—They are; as they are not obliged to attend so many lectures as the ordinary Students; they have more of their time to themselves, and consequently can apply themselves to other studies, that are not perhaps immediately connected with their profession.

Will you be so good as to state, whether they are at liberty to pursue their studies according to their own discretion, or whether there is a strict restriction over the books they read?—They are under the instruction of a Professor of their own, who is obliged to give them lectures three times a week on Divinity, Ecclesiastical History, and Canon Law.

Is he called the Dunboyne Professor?—Yes.

Does he lecture to them only?—He does; and besides, they are obliged to attend the Hebrew lectures of the Professor of Sacred Scripture.

Are there any other distinctions that apply to the Dunboyne class?—There is one regarding their diet, which is, that they are allowed to have tea for breakfast, but at their own expense; they are also allowed to walk out twice a week in a body; the other Students go out only once a week.

Outside the walls of the College?—Yes, to walk about the country.

Are they under any particular control or superintendence during their walks?—No, they are not; except that among their own body there is a Prefect or Monitor, who is answerable for their conduct while abroad.

Are they limited either as to distance or as to hours?—They are limited with regard to the hours, but not as to distance; they can go out at twelve o'clock, and they must be at home at three for dinner.

Are all the other Students allowed to go out once a week?—Yes.

Under what superintendence do the other Students go?—One of the Deans always accompanies them.

It appears that the sum of 21 £. a year is paid to the College for what is called Cormack's Farm; how did that come into the possession of the College?—It was a portion of the land annexed to the former Lay College, and being cut off by the canal from the rest of the ground, it was not so convenient to hold it in our own hands; we let it to a yearly tenant.

Do the same observations apply to what is called Smith's Farm?—Yes.

It appears that 42 £. a year are applied to the foundation of an Irish Professor; from what source does that money arise?—It arises from a legacy of 1,000 £., which was left a good many years ago, but was for some time litigated. The interest, by the will of the founder, goes towards paying the salary of a Professor of Irish.

Was there a Professor of Irish previously to that bequest?—There was.

What is the Ivory fund?—The Ivory fund consists of the interest of 1,000 £. which was left by a physician of that name, for the support of two Students, who are appointed by the representatives of Doctor Ivory, with the concurrence of the Roman Catholic Bishop of Armagh or Meath. I believe they are sometimes taken from Meath.

Are those two Students now regularly appointed?—Yes.

From whence is the O'Reilly fund derived, which amounts to 22 £. 8s. a year?—It is the interest of a bequest made by the late Roman Catholic Archbishop of Armagh, Doctor O'Reilly, for supporting a Student from that diocese.

What was the origin of the Sawey fund?—It results from the interest of 1,000 £., that was was left by Patrick Sawey, of Downpatrick; the money at the time of his death was in the hands of Colonel Leslie, whose bond he held; and his wife was to have the benefit of the interest during her life-time; after her death it devolved to the College, and the College is bound to support one Student on it.

What are the Clogher and Raphoe funds?—The Clogher fund was established by the late Bishop of Clogher, the Right Rev. Doctor Murphy, who has five places in the house, for which a pension is paid from the interest of money left by him; and the Raphoe fund in like manner has been founded by the present Roman Catholic Bishop of that diocese; but neither the one nor the other has been transferred to the Trustees of the house. The representatives of the late Bishop of Clogher hold the funds in their own possession, and pay the College so much a year.

Ought the money to be transferred to the Trustees?—The Trustees cannot require it, I believe.

Will you be so good as to state, why the number of persons at present upon the Dunboyne establishment only amounts to eleven?—One reason is, and a principal one, that from the scarcity of priests in many of the dioceses, the bishops cannot leave their subjects for the three years that they ought to leave them; another is, that we do not find at the close of each academical year, a sufficient number of young men who come up to the standard that we require, to make them eligible on the score of distinction in studies.

Then it does not arise from want of funds?—No, we receive the funds regularly for them; and as we do not keep up the entire number, a portion of the fund is applied to the general purposes of the house.

The Commissioners understand, that a specific sum was granted by government as an aid to the Dunboyne establishment; seeing that the establishment is not kept up to the full number, in what way do you apply the money granted by the government for the maintenance of that establishment?—The portion of the money that has not been required for that establishment, has gone principally towards erecting the buildings got up in the College of late, a large portion of which was necessary for the accommodation of the Dunboyne Students.

Is that with the knowledge of the Trustees and Visitors?—Certainly, with the knowledge of the Trustees.

Is the sum which is voted by Parliament one gross sum to the College generally?—It is.

Without specifying any particular purposes?—Yes, it is voted generally for the use of the Roman Catholic Seminary in Ireland.

Is not that grant founded every year upon a detailed estimate of the manner in which the College intend to apply it?—It is; the expenses of the Dunboyne establishment, even when the number of Students happens to be low, as it is at present, always exceeds the 700*l.* granted by Parliament.

Have you copies of those estimates?—I have not here, but there certainly is a copy.

Did not the College last year furnish to the government a detailed statement of the sums that would be wanting for the College, and the application they intended to make of those sums?—It does every year.

Does the estimate distinguish the sum that it is proposed to expend in building from other sums?—No, there has been no account for building; there is regularly an item for repairs every year, but no item for building.

Does the estimate consist of a single item, or does it divide the gross amount under different classes of expenditure?—It divides it under different classes of expenditure.

Under what class of expenditure does it rank that proportion of the grant which is in fact afterwards expended in building?—It comes partly under the item of the establishment for twenty Dunboyne students at 60*l.* a year each, and it comes partly under the provisions for the Students, which are estimated at 25*l.* a year each. There may be some saving on that in cheap years, and it is from the savings on those heads, and likewise in consequence of our having but a small number of Students in the College during the time of vacation, that we have been able to save so much for building.

But it follows, that the money, which, in point of fact has been expended in building, has been submitted to Parliament in the estimate under the head of provisions and the maintenance of Students?—Partly so, and partly from the Dunboyne establishment, or rather from the Dunboyne estate.

Could you state from recollection, or from any document you have, what is the annual distribution of the Parliamentary grant; what portion of it goes to the Students, and what portion to the Professors?—I could not do it without referring to the accounts; I can furnish the Commissioners with the parchments that are returned by the Imprest Office to us.

What do you estimate to be the expense of each Student?—I should think the expense of each Student, including every expense that the College goes to on their account, will be very nearly 25*l.*, which is the sum that Parliament allows.

Are the Commissioners to understand, that in the distribution of the fund, Parliament is allowing 25*l.* a year for 250 Students?—Yes.

In the discharge you have carried in before the Commissioners of Imprest Accounts, have you taken credit for the sums expended in building, as sums expended in building, or as sums expended in the support of the Students?—As sums expended in building every year; we always mention the particular purpose for which the sum is expended.

It appears that 2,420*l.* was the amount which arose in the last year from pensions and deposits paid by the Students; will you state in what way that fund arose?—Each pensioner on entering the College is obliged to pay us an annual pension of twenty guineas, and to continue the same per annum as long as he remains a pensioner.

Does every pensioner alike, whether upon the government establishment or not, pay that sum?—I do not call those pensioners that are upon the government establishment; besides that, he pays an half deposit.

Have the goodness to state, what is the amount of the deposit and the object of it?—The whole deposit is eight guineas for Students who are received on the establishment or on the Parliamentary grant; each pays as entrance eight guineas; the half of this sum only is paid by pensioners at entrance, but when they get a free place, that is, when they are put on the establishment, they are obliged to pay the remaining half, four guineas more. The object is to supply the deficiency of the Parliamentary grant, which is always much short of the actual expenditure.

Of the total number admitted to the establishment, are the greater number admitted in the first instance as pensioners, or do they come in at once to the government establishment?—I conceive that about half the number that are admitted enter as pensioners, and continue so, one, two, or three years, some few during their entire course.

Is there any particular application of the sum of money that is derived from deposits and pensions?—It goes into the general fund, for the support of the establishment.

Applicable alike to all its purposes?—Yes, and is accounted for in the office of Imprest Accounts as the other funds of the College are.

At what age can a young man be admitted?—The usual age for admittance is seventeen, but there are occasional instances of their admission at sixteen, or even fifteen.

Will you state, why the rule has been broken in those cases?—There is no statute or bye-law of the house to determine it; it is merely usage, and in some instances, the Superiors conceive that they are justified by peculiar circumstances in receiving Students under the age of seventeen.

Will you state, what have been the peculiar circumstances that have induced the Trustees to decide upon admitting particular individuals at as early an age as fifteen?—It is generally done at the instance of the bishop who sends such young persons to the College.

In making the application, does it appear that the bishops have generally been influenced by motives of charity, or by the particular talents of the individual?—I believe that the motives for sending persons under seventeen are generally founded on the superior talent of the persons so sent, because in many dioceses of Ireland the Roman Catholic bishops hold a concursus, or competition for places, in Maynooth, and it sometimes happens that the youngest of the candidates are those that display the most talent, in which cases the Superiors of the College conceive themselves justified in acceding to the wish of the Bishop.

Must not those persons who come to the College at the age of fifteen remain a longer period in the College than those that come at the age of seventeen?—Yes.

They do not leave the College, it is presumed, in any case, till they are fit for taking orders?—No; the youngest are put into the lowest classes, and by that means make a more protracted course of studies.

Is there any regulation as to the exact time they should stay in the College?—No, the course may be either five, six, or seven years, according to the proficiency of the Students in classical knowledge at the time of their entrance.

Do they not generally remain till they are upon the point of receiving orders?—Certainly.

At what age can they receive the order of deacon in the Roman Catholic church?—They can receive the order of sub-deacon at twenty-one, and the order of deacon at twenty-two.

Are any persons employed in the ministry of the Roman Catholic church in Ireland who are only sub-deacons or deacons?—No; we allow deacons to preach, which is done in Catholic countries, in some instances, but it seldom or never happens in this country.

Are not the several orders of Sub-deacon, Deacon, and Priest, generally conferred upon the same person within a few days of each other?—No; the general rule is to give the order of Sub-deacon to Students who have finished the first year of their divinity; Deaconship to those who have finished the second; and the order of Priesthood, when they have finished the entire course.

Do young men remain in the College after they become Sub-deacons?—Generally.

Do they after they become Deacons?—And after they become Deacons, but not after they become Priests. The Dunboyne Students, however, are allowed to take Priesthood at the end of their second year, and to remain a year after in College.

Do they generally remain in the College till they are Priests?—If a young man were to finish his studies before he was twenty-three years of age, and were not fit to be appointed to the Dunboyne establishment, he should leave the College, unless his bishop might request that he may be allowed to make a fourth year in divinity; which is not unfrequently done, by the direction of the Trustees.

Will you state, what examination the young men undergo upon their admission?—The examination is determined by the Trustees; the books in which they are to be examined are stated in the cards that have been printed by the direction of the Trustees, one of which I now hand in.

[The same was delivered in and read, as follows:]

It appears that certain books are set down as necessary to be known by any young man, who is a candidate for admission to the second class of Humanity ; will you state whether a young man may be admitted into any of the classes, or whether he must of necessity begin at the lowest class of the Institution?—It is not required that he should begin at the lowest class when he is found qualified to examine for the upper classes of rhetoric or logic.

It appears that, in order to be admitted into the lowest class, which is the second class of Humanity, a young man must be able to construe Cæsar's Commentaries, the works of Sallust, Virgil's Eclogues, and the first four books of the Æneid, Horace's Epistles, and Cicero's Orations against Catiline. He must also be conversant with the Greek Grammar, and he must be able to read the Gospel of St. John, the first book of Lucian's Dialogues, and the first three books of Xenophon's Cyropædia?—He is liable to be examined in all those books.

Can you state what would be the probable expense that a young man must have incurred in his education, previous to his admission into that class?—I should think they are generally three years at a Latin and Greek school.

What is the general price of instruction at such a school as they must attend?—The general price of instruction in such schools at present, is a guinea a quarter ; but as the schools are not numerous in this country, the young men that go to school, or rather their parents, are obliged, in many instances, not only to defray the expenses incurred with the schoolmaster, but likewise to pay for their diet and lodging, very frequently at a considerable distance from the residence of their parents.

Is the expense of the education which it is necessary to obtain, previously to a young man's being admitted to Maynooth, so great as to make it impossible for persons of a very low order in society to be admitted into the College at Maynooth?—I think it is ; and more particularly the expenses they are subjected to on entering, and after entering the College.

What expenses do you allude to?—The expenses of a pensioner entering the College, including his outfit, with all the articles of clothing necessary for him ; the furniture of his room in College ; the providing his college dress ; paying half deposit, and paying for the text books that he has to read during his course, together with the pension of one year, cannot, I think, be less than 70*l.* ; that is the estimate I have made of his expenses for the first year. During the succeeding years, I think that the expenses of a pensioner are about 34*l.* a year, as long as he continues a pensioner.

Appendix, No 8.

Is the expense as great as you have stated, if the young man is admitted at once to the establishment?—If the young man be admitted at once to the establishment, we must deduct from the above sum 20 guineas a year, which the pensioner pays, but which he who has a free place does not pay to the College.

That reduces the expense to about 50*l.* for the first year?—Yes.

What is the expense afterwards?—He cannot continue in the College for less than 12*l.* a year. He has to provide his clothes and washing, and any books besides those read in the college course, which he may wish to procure, and which they always do procure.

Do any of the persons who are upon the establishment receive any advantage from the burserships which you have described?—None on the establishment derive the least advantage from burses; and of the bursers, only the six from Kerry receive any thing in money; the others only get their commons.

Will you be so good as to particularize in what manner you conceive the sum of 70*l.* you have mentioned as the expense of a pensioner for the first year, is made up?—I estimate his outfit in clothes, with the average of his expense of coming to college, at 17*l.*; the furniture of his room and college-dress at 10*l.*; his deposit, which I suppose to be paid entire, though it may happen that only half is paid at entrance, at 9*l.*; for though the deposit is only eight guineas, there are 15*s.* additional paid by each Student for making themselves more comfortable in the refectory, and there are twenty guineas for a year's pension; then there is 12*l.* allowed him for the expenses of the year, with which the College has nothing to do, his washing and repairing his clothes; and he has besides to pay something more than 4*l.* for books furnished him by the College, at entrance.

Does it not sometimes happen that the Students admitted at Maynooth have been educated as what are called poor scholars; that they have had their education supplied to them purely from sources of charity?—I believe there is hardly an instance of it at present. I remember the time when there were poor scholars in almost every Greek and Latin school through the country.

Are there not schools in Cork, Limerick, Kerry, and elsewhere, where Greek and Latin are taught to day-scholars, and in a very sufficient manner for so low a rate as 2*s.* a quarter?—I do not know; I never heard of any. I recollect when only 5*s.* a quarter was paid in some good schools; that is forty or fifty years ago.

From what class of life, in point of fact, do you find that the persons admitted to Maynooth are actually taken?—Our Students are generally the sons of farmers, who must be comfortable in order to meet the expenses I have already mentioned; of tradesmen, shopkeepers; and not a very small proportion of them are the children of opulent merchants, and rich farmers and graziers.

Have you any instances of the sons of what you would call Roman Catholic gentry?—We have a good many from time to time.

Do you think that any change has been made in the class of persons from whom the priests have been taken, since the establishment of Maynooth; or do they arise pretty nearly from the same class as they used to arise from before the establishment of that Institution?—I think the description of Students we have been getting these few years past is better than what they were for some years before the establishment of the College.

The question refers rather to the time when the education was foreign?—I think there is a general improvement in the state of the Catholics of Ireland with regard to property; that consequently the children that are destined for the ecclesiastical state may be supposed to partake of the improvement that has taken place in the population at large.

Upon the whole, do you think that the course of education now is less expensive than it was when it was foreign?—No, I do not think that it is less expensive now than it used to be formerly.

Do you think that the present expenses of resorting to Maynooth are on the whole greater or less than the old expenses of resorting to the Continent?—The circumstances of the individuals are very different now from what they were formerly; in Maynooth the great bulk of students, that is, 250 of them, are supported on the government fund. Of those that went abroad formerly, a portion were destined for regular Catholic colleges, where many of them were supported by foundations, and those that were not, and could not get appointments to burses, were generally ordained before they went abroad, and the circumstance of their being ordained, supplied them with means which they would not have otherwise.

It appears by the list of the Students who are at present in the College, that eleven persons are upon the establishment, who appear to have come from the diocese of Armagh, and that there are three bursers from Armagh, and ten pensioners from Armagh; will you be so good as to describe in what way they have any connection with that particular diocese?—The three bursers are supported on the foundations of Ivory and O'Reilly; the pensioners of course pay for themselves, as I mentioned before.

That being the case, in what way are they described as connected with Armagh?—They are connected with Armagh by having been sent to the College by the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Armagh, and being destined for the ministry in that diocese.

Does the same observation apply to the eleven young persons who are stated in the list to be upon the establishment, and connected with Armagh?—Yes.

Can you explain in what way the Archbishop selects persons whom he recommends?—There generally is a meeting in each diocese once a year of the young men intended for the ecclesiastical state; the Bishop appoints examiners to inquire into their respective literary merits, and a preference is given to those that are found best qualified to enter College.

Does a recommendation from the Bishop, and a certificate, accompany each person upon his admission?—Certainly; we cannot receive them without a recommendation from the Bishop.

In what way does a Bishop know the number that he is entitled to recommend in each year?—The number on the establishment has been fixed for many years. With regard to pensioners, we have no certain rule for the number to be received from each diocese; we take those that come first, so that the number from different dioceses is very different. Our time of receiving Students is from the 25th of August to the 1st of September.

Do not the pensioners bring a recommendation from some Bishop, in the same manner as those admitted upon the establishment?—They must; precisely the same.

Can a pensioner be ordained, and connect himself with any other diocese than that from which he has been originally recommended?—He cannot, without permission from the Bishop of his nativity.

Does it frequently happen that they do so?—Not frequently; it is rather uncommon in Dublin; it has happened more frequently elsewhere.

It appears that there are now eleven on the establishment for Armagh; if one vacancy happened out of that eleven, would it be filled up from Armagh?—Certainly.

Would the same observation apply to the ten pensioners from Armagh?—No; if a vacancy happened on the establishment, it would naturally be filled by one of the senior pensioners already in the house, and a new pensioner would be sent in his place the following year; the same may be said with respect to two or three, if so many vacancies occurred.

Is there any particular reason why so large a number as eight are on the establishment from the diocese of Clogher, and five bursers, and fifteen pensioners?—It arises from the great want of clergymen in that particular diocese of Clogher, owing, I believe, in a great measure to the mortality of young priests, who have died there in a greater number than in any other part of Ireland of late years.

To what do you attribute that remarkable mortality in the diocese of Clogher?—There was a very considerable deficit occasioned in the year 1817, by the typhus fever, which caused the death of the greater part of 13 or 14 priests that died that year in that diocese.

Did that arise from their being so much exposed to contagion in their attendance upon the sick?—I have always understood that it did.

Has any thing of the like nature happened in any other part of Ireland?—More or less in other dioceses, but Clogher and Kerry were the two where the greatest number died. I think there were 14 died in Kerry in one year.

Does it ever happen that a young man, after having received his education at Maynooth, is unable to get ordained?—It does occasionally happen.

From what cause does that arise?—When the Superiors of the house have reason not to be satisfied with his general conduct during the course of his studies, or when in consequence of any particular violation of rule they find themselves under the necessity of removing him from the College.

Does it ever arise from the want of a situation to which to appoint him?—Never; it has sometimes happened that the services of a young clergyman were not immediately required in his own diocese, but he is always sure to be received in some other, if his Bishop will either allow him to go for a time, or to transfer his obedience altogether to another diocese.

Is any person admitted into the establishment excepting he avows an intention of becoming a Priest?—No; it is always supposed that they enter with that intention.

Do they ever change their minds?—It does happen, not unfrequently, that they do change their minds, and of course leave the College; we never think the worse of them for doing so.

Can you state in what number of instances that has occurred in the course of the last few years?—I suppose on an average for the last eight or ten years there might be six each year.

Do you know what has become of the individuals to whom that has happened?—I cannot just now point out any individual, but I believe numbers of them become very worthy members of society, as they may be very good men, and yet not think themselves called to the ecclesiastical state.

Do any of them become regulars?—I do not think they do, when they leave the house voluntarily; there may be a few instances of such.

Have you any book that contains an entry of the names of all the Students, and the particulars of how they are disposed of finally?—Not of how they are disposed of; we have a book containing an entry of all the Students, and we know which of them persevere to the end and receive orders in the house; but we do not keep any thing like a regular biography, if I may so call it, of those that leave the house without receiving orders; we do not keep any note of how they dispose of themselves.

Do you keep any book that contains entries of any thing remarkable that happens with respect to the life or character of each individual, so long as he continues in the Institution?—No, that has not been done; but some of the Bishops have lately expressed a wish that such a book were regularly kept, and I think we shall very soon endeavour to get a person to do it.

Have you any book for instance, that would show the number and the names of the persons whom you have found it necessary at various times to remove from the Institution?—

Appendix, N° 8.

Examination of
Rev.B. Crotty, D. D.
19 October 1826.

We give in to the Trustees every year an account of the persons and the names of the persons that are removed from the Institution; and we can, by referring to our documents in the College, find out the names of those persons.

Do you specify the causes for which they are removed?—We generally do; not in writing to the Trustees, but we give an account verbally.

Are there any documents in the possession of the Institution, that would show the causes for which any particular individuals were removed?—I do not think there are; they are sometimes removed, because they are found at the close of their years studies deficient in talents; at other times for the violation of particular rules. It has happened in my own time, in I believe three instances, that they were removed for introducing spirits into the College.

Can you state what is your general impression as to what the total number may have been of those that have been removed from the College since you became President?—I should think, on an average, they do not exceed three in the year; sometimes the number is greater and sometimes less. I think three would be the fair average; then there may be four, or five, or six, that go off voluntarily, and decline the ecclesiastical state.

Is any young man at liberty to leave the College if he pleases?—Perfectly so.

He enters into no engagement?—No; the only persons that are bound to stay, are those on the Dunboyne establishment; the rule is, that they should remain for three years, but it does not appear in half the instances of persons appointed to that establishment, that they do finish that entire course.

Are the Commissioners to collect, that few or none of the present regular clergy in Ireland, have been educated at Maynooth?—I do not know any scarcely, I know of one man that was there before my time, who though he was called a regular, was a very irregular clergyman; he was educated partly at Maynooth, expelled from it, and received into a regular order, for which they who received him had afterwards cause to repent.

Where do you conceive that the present regular clergy of Ireland have in general been educated?—They are educated generally in Spain, Portugal, and Italy; that is, a proportion of them, but I believe there are some that never left Ireland.

Where are such persons educated before they are received into the regular orders?—The regulars have a few establishments of their own; there is one near New Ross in the county of Wexford, another in the town of Wexford; the former belongs to the Augustinian order, and the other to the Franciscan.

By whom are such persons ordained?—By the Bishops of the different dioceses, to whom they get testimonial letters from their immediate superiors.

Do they become enrolled in the order before they are ordained?—Certainly; they make their religious profession before they are ordained.

According to the practice of the Roman Catholic church in this country, does the Bishop ordain, as a matter of course, any person who brings him such a certificate from the superior of a regular order?—The Bishop has a right to insist upon the person being examined before him, and I suppose in some instances it has been done; because I have known Bishops to refuse ordaining persons in that way.

Are the Commissioners to understand that a great majority, amounting nearly to the whole of the present regular clergy who are in Ireland, have been ordained by Irish Bishops?—No; by far the greater part were ordained on some part of the Continent.

It has been stated in a pamphlet, published by Mr. Keogh, that between the period of the foundation of Maynooth College, and the year 1810, not fewer than ninety Students had been expelled from the Institution; do you consider that to be true?—I cannot say, not having been in the house nor in the kingdom at the time.

Are there any records in the house which will show how that fact may be?—I do not think we keep those things as regularly as ought to be done; we every year give an account to the Trustees of the number that has been removed.

Is there any minute made when a person is expelled?—None; except for the purpose I mention of letting the Trustees know at the end of the year.

Is not there a book in which a minute is made for that purpose?—No.

Who would be the proper officer from whom to inquire more particularly on that subject?—The Vice-President keeps a list of those that are ordained, and I should not be surprised if he could make out from the papers of the house, a list of those that have been removed.

Suppose it were to happen that a young man who had been expelled, should present himself again for admission, would there be no means of detecting him?—Yes; we would know that he had been there before and was sent away; we always acquaint his Bishop with his removal from the College. There is no danger of his being sent back.

Are the Ecclesiastical Students ordained at the College?—Yes; there is an annual ordination held by the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin.

Will you state, as nearly as you can, what number you think have been expelled since you have been President?—I have been President now nearly thirteen years, and I think on an average, that the number expelled might amount to three or four each year.

For what reasons chiefly have they been expelled?—For violations of the College rules.

What rules were generally those which were violated?—The violation of rule took place in various ways; first, introducing spirits into the house, contrary to the statute; two or three were removed for disobedience to Superiors; an equal number probably for having been outside the College bounds without permission; and two for introducing improper books.

Have

Have you any objection to mention what the books were?—Roderick Random I believe was one of them, and another still more objectionable, was the Emile of Rousseau; but I believe neither one nor the other of the two persons concerned in it well knew, unless in a general way, what the book was. We could not however let it pass.

Have any persons been expelled since you were appointed President, on account of their political principles?—Not one.

Or for any political cause?—None whatever.

If you were to find that any of the Students in the College were active in diffusing political opinions through the College, should you deem it your duty to expel them?—If those political opinions were against His Majesty's person, or His Government, I certainly should.

By the Government, do you mean the established order of things in the United Empire, or do you mean the Executive Government?—If there was any thing bordering upon treason, or disaffection to government.

Are newspapers admitted into the College?—The Superiors and Professors are allowed to receive newspapers.

Are the Students allowed to receive them?—No; it is strictly prohibited.

Is there any statute upon the subject?—We consider the 6th section of the 13th chapter to apply to that case; it is as follows; "Si quis libros in Academiam scriptave comportaverit, ad Religionem Catholicam Romanam maledictis violandam pertinentia, moresve labefactandos, seditioesve concitandas: etiamque si quis iis libris, quibus omni Domo a Præsidente vel Decano interdictum sit, nihilominus utatur."

Do you understand that as prohibiting newspapers?—We do not understand that as directly prohibiting newspapers, but it gives the President a power to prohibit any books that he thinks ought to be prohibited; and as newspapers are prohibited, the person that brings them in, subjects himself to expulsion.

In what manner are newspapers prohibited by the President?—Every year, when we read the statutes, there are a few bye-laws which have not been printed, but are sanctioned by the Trustees, and which are read for the Students; the prohibition of newspapers and periodical works is the object of one of those bye-laws; the Students are informed twice a year that they shall not be introduced without particular leave, which for newspapers is never granted.

Are those bye-laws in writing?—The few I have mentioned are; but our bye-laws are principally contained in the printed book, intitled, "Regula Pietatis et Disciplinæ domesticæ."

Can you furnish the Commissioners with a copy of those bye-laws which are in writing?—Certainly; they are very few, and in general relate to things of no particular moment, directing the Students when they are to be in their rooms, and when they may go to the pump to supply themselves with water; that no letter shall be received into the College or sent out of it without going through the Deans hands, &c.

Will you be so good as to state how any boy that brought in Roderick Random or the Emile of Rousseau, not knowing what they were, was to be conscious that he was doing that for which he was liable to expulsion?—One of the persons declared, that he did not know what the book was, and the other did not make any such declaration; but we did not conceive that we were bound to receive the mere assertion of either one or the other. We believed they must have known the character of the books, though they should never have read them.

Seeing that he never could have read any part of the books, and probably never could have heard any part of them read, how was he to know that they were prohibited?—He must have heard of Rousseau, because there is no one of our young men that has not heard of Rousseau and Voltaire, as authors with whose works he should have nothing to do.

Have you, in point of fact, a list of prohibited books?—We have in the College Library a list of prohibited books, which was printed in Rome; but we do not consider ourselves bound by it in this country; the President is supposed to have the right of prohibiting any books that are immoral, or against the Christian religion.

Has the President prohibited any books by name?—We have; Gibbon's History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, for instance; no Student can read that without leave of the President, which is seldom given, except to those who are near the end of their studies.

Is any list of the books they are forbidden to read, furnished to them when they come in?—No list is shown to them, but they get a knowledge of the few books that we insist upon not being introduced; there is a general order that they shall introduce no books without letting the Dean know what they are; if they show the book to the Dean, they will be told, that is not a proper book for them to have, if it happen to be a work of that description.

Are the books that each Student brings in, examined by the Dean?—Yes.

You spoke of letters to the Students passing through the Dean's hands, of course they are never opened by him?—They are not, though it is understood in most Roman Catholic Colleges, that the Superiors have a right to inspect, if they please, the letters of the Students, or the letters they receive, but it is a right never exercised at Maynooth; I never knew an instance of a sealed letter being opened, and, in point of fact, though the letters that are sent out of the College all go through the Dean's hands, those that are brought to the College by the postman are given immediately to the Students themselves by the postman.

By that means, might not the Students, if they chose to disobey the regulation, receive newspapers without the Dean's knowledge?—Certainly they might; any law that could be made on the subject might be eluded, and I will not say that this is not in some instances; the most that we can expect is to keep down the thing as far as diligence will enable us to do; the Students too, in general, observe the regulation from motives of conscience.

Is it your belief that within the last week there has been no newspaper within the walls of the College of Maynooth in the hands of any Student?—I can hardly form a belief; I should not be surprised if such had been the case; indeed I heard of an instance, where a Dunboyne Student had a newspaper; but they conceive, that as they have finished the usual course of studies, they should be allowed a greater range in their reading; and I heard lately of one or two instances where it was strongly suspected that other Students had got newspapers from Dublin.

Will you state to the Commissioners any regulation that may exist with respect to the communications of the town's people of Maynooth, or other strangers, with the Students?—The town's people of Maynooth, that have communication with the Students, are generally tradesmen, such as tailors and shoemakers, who are allowed to come to the gate at certain hours; the Students go down to the gate to meet them; but with regard to others, any decent person may come into the College, if he please.

When the friends or relatives of any particular Student have a desire to see him, are there any regulations with respect to the opportunities or mode of their intercourse?—There is no restriction whatever in that respect; except this, that if it be an hour of study, or of any other College duty, he must apply to the Dean for leave to absent himself from that duty to see his friends; but if they go at an hour when the Student is at liberty, the intercourse is quite free.

What is the form of expulsion?—The President calls the community together; they are assembled by a bell, and he always makes known to the person expelled, the crime or violation of rule for which he is expelled, and orders him to leave the house within a certain time, generally on the same day, allowing him a few hours to prepare for departure; in some cases the Student is called to the President's room, and directed to leave the house; if he refuse to go, the thing is then done publicly.

Is any communication made to the Bishop of the diocese from which the individual originally came?—We are not bound to consult the Bishop previously to the removal of the Student; but it sometimes happens, that though a Student be not guilty of any breach of rule, which shall authorize us to send him away, still we think he is an unfit person for the house; we are dissatisfied with his general disposition, and in that case we write to the Bishop and request of him to withdraw the young man.

Who writes that letter?—The President generally.

Is there any copy of that letter kept in the house?—No, the statutes do not require that such copy be kept.

When a Student is expelled, do you in all cases give notice of the expulsion to the Bishop?—Yes, in all cases.

Does it ever happen that you remove an individual, or recommend an individual to remove himself, on account of his want of proficiency?—It does; in that case if he has acquitted himself at the public examination unsatisfactorily, we always give him a private examination; he is then told that unless he give a better account of himself, at the next public examination, he cannot expect to be continued longer in the house.

Is that a case which has frequently occurred?—Not very frequently; it does not occur so frequently perhaps as might be wished; the reason is, that in some dioceses priests are so much wanted, that we must in many cases let young men go forward whom we know to be but poorly qualified for the ministry; we therefore do sometimes allow persons to remain in the house that are not as talented as might be desirable, but it is generally because we find that the person is peculiarly well conducted, and that he may supply the deficiency of talent by edifying behaviour.

Is inattention as frequent a cause of removal as the want of sufficient talent?—It sometimes proceeds from the one and sometimes from the other; an evident want, either of ability or of application, renders the person liable to be removed. In page 9 is the statute which enables the President to send away a person by recurring to the Bishop, or if the Bishop should not think proper, to call him away without his intervention.

What minor punishments are you forced to have recourse to?—By the statutes we are authorized to inflict fines, but it very rarely happens that we do; reprehension by the President is considered rather a severe punishment; the Dean gives me an account of any person guilty of a serious offence; such person is ordered to attend in my room where the other Superiors are assembled, and receives a reprehension from me; if he repeat the same fault, or be guilty of any other grievous one, he gets a second reprehension, and is told, that if he do not amend his conduct, and avoid a third, the next step must be to remove him from the house.

Have you recourse to confinements in any cases?—No, nothing of the sort; in Roman Catholic colleges on the Continent, it is the practice to inflict a sort of punishment that we have never had in use here, that is, obliging an irregular Student to kneel during dinner, and allowing him only bread and water, but we never have recourse to it.

Are there any written memoranda or entries of the several visitations that have been held at the College?—There are.

And of what has been done at each?—Yes, but most of them very imperfect.

Will you be so good as to state what is the nature of the College books, either account books, or registers of any kinds?—We have an account of the expenditure of the College, which is shown every year to the Trustees, and audited by them; and besides that, we show them the general abstracts of expenditure that are sent into the Imprest Office; one of the Trustees, generally the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, and the President, the Vice President, and the Bursar, attend at the Imprest Office to swear to the accounts once a year; we have also books in which we have an account of the Students that are received from each diocese; the name of each is taken down, his age, and the class he is admitted for; these books are kept by the Vice President. There is also a book in which are entered the names of the Students who take the Oath of Allegiance every year, for on this point we do not exactly adhere to the statute. By the statute it is supposed that no Student is received into the College, until he first produce a certificate of his having taken the Oath of Allegiance, but the practice for many years has been different; instead of having taken the oath before they come, all the Students received in the preceding September, go in January to the quarter sessions, and take the oath in the presence of the assistant barrister; there is another book, in which we enter the ordinations and examinations of each year.

What salary and emolument do you receive for your situation as President?—Three hundred guineas a year is the salary; a change was made by the board before my time, from two hundred to three hundred guineas. The addition was made in consequence of the President being exposed to considerable expense; there is no wine or spirits allowed by the College to the President or any of the Superiors; but in lieu of that, an allowance was made of a hundred guineas a year to enable the President to provide whatever wine is necessary on public occasions, such as visitations, meetings of the board, for Visitors, or persons that come from abroad; the Masters are allowed 30*l.* a year each to provide themselves with wine and groceries. This allowance is included under the head Salaries in the college accounts, sent in annually to the Imprest Office. I am allowed besides the sum mentioned, stabling and forage for two horses, and groceries to the amount of 20*l.* a year, together with my washing and postage of letters.

Have you any duty immediately connected with the education of the young men of the College?—No, nothing more than a general superintendence of the classes; I am obliged to attend at their examinations; we have literary exercises every month, half yearly examinations of all the Students, and Theses defended by the Dunboyne Students once a year.

Are you required to reside the whole of the year at the College?—Yes, with the exception of six weeks during the general vacation of the house, which lasts for two months, July and August; if I require to leave the house at any other season of the year for any considerable time, I must apply to the board of Trustees for permission.

Do the Students take advantage of the vacation that is allowed them?—A considerable number have been allowed for some years past to go home during the vacation, but it would be desirable that the leave should not be so frequently given as it is; in many instances, however, it could not be refused, because a number of them get very much broken down in health towards the end of the academical year, by too close application to their studies; our discipline too is rather strict.

What hours do the young men keep?—They rise at five o'clock from about the 1st of March till the 1st of November, and are allowed half an hour to make up their rooms; they then go to chapel to morning prayer, which continues half an hour more; they have study then until eight o'clock, and at eight they go to the chapel, a second time to hear mass; after mass they have breakfast and recreation until half past nine, and then study until half past ten, lecture from half past ten to half past eleven, recreation for half an hour until twelve, study from twelve till two, lecture from two till three, dinner and recreation from three till five, from five till eight either study or attending the evening classes, at eight o'clock supper and recreation till nine, at nine night prayer and meditation till half past nine, they then retire to their rooms, and are all obliged to be in bed by ten o'clock, or a few minutes after.

What hours do they keep during the winter half year?—It is just the same routine of business, except that during the winter months there is one hour less for study before the morning lecture: they rise at six from the 1st of November till March.

Do you mean that they go to bed half an hour later?—No, the bed time is the same, and so is the supper time. There is no change in the division of time from half past ten in the morning; the morning lecture commences at that hour the whole year round; mass and breakfast are half an hour later during the winter months.

Then in winter they have two or three hours by candle light?—They have.

Are they locked into the building?—All the outer doors and gates of course are locked, but they are not locked into the rooms.

Is it understood that during the hours of recreation any of the Students may go outside the walls of the Institution?—Not at all, or even through all the College fields; there is a certain portion marked out for recreation.

What space is allowed for recreation?—They have the large square at the rear of the house, the avenue which extends up to the canal with a gravel walk on each side of about a quarter of a mile in length, and they have generally one or two fields besides, along the avenue.

Can you mention any particular mode of recreation besides mere walking, that they have recourse to?—They are allowed to play at ball; we have ball courts for the purpose.

Do they do it?—Yes, certainly, when the weather is favourable, but the number that can play is very limited, not more than eighteen at a time.

Is there any other mode of recreation resorted to by them?—The junior Students play prison bars among themselves; they were formerly allowed to play at foot-ball, but that was considered dangerous and not very decorous; they have a ball court likewise, but not so regular as those for the seniors.

Appendix, N° 8.

Examination of
Rev.B. Crotty, D. D.

Do they generally enjoy good health?—They do; at some seasons we have perhaps from a dozen to a score in the infirmary; pulmonary affections are the most common. Besides the recreation mentioned, we allow them also to play at certain hours (but not in the rooms) backgammon and chess. Cards are strictly prohibited.

As they are not allowed to play in the rooms, where do they play at those games?—In the corridor; they sit generally in the windows, but we insist as much as possible upon their being out during the hours of recreation, for the purpose of exercise when the state of the weather will allow it; we consider it much better for their health than any sedentary amusement.

In extremely bad weather how are the hours of recreation spent, and where?—They walk in the corridors when the weather is very bad; our corridors are very long, and there is plenty of accommodation for all the Students in the ecclesiastical college. In the former lay college they are rather badly off in that respect.

Will you state the regulations that prevail with respect to the silence of the Students at any and what hours?—There is a general law of silence in the time of spiritual retreat, which takes place twice in the year, and continues for five days.

Does that law bind the Superiors as well as the young men?—At one of the retreats it does; the Superiors are obliged to make only one retreat in the year, and that takes place early in September, at the beginning of the academical year; the other is a preparation for receiving orders, and as the Superiors are already ordained, they are dispensed with; but the retreat at the commencement of the year is common to all, and then the Superiors do keep silence, except so far as the discharge of the duties requires them to speak.

Does that regulation, with respect to the observance of silence at those periods, apply to all the Students?—It is for all the Students, but it is meant more particularly for those that intend to receive ordination.

Will you state what are the regulations with respect to silence at other periods of the year not included in the two retreats?—During the hours of study silence is always enjoined, and in class, as far as it is necessary for preserving good order, nobody speaks but he that is called upon by the Professor to give an account of his business; at meals they are all silent; in chapel they are silent necessarily of course; and on Sunday mornings the entire time before they go to communion.

Are those the only periods of the twenty-four hours in which silence is enjoined?—There is silence for five minutes before study in the evening, and five minutes that they spend in the chapel before dinner; they make a short prayer before dinner in the chapel.

Is that all the time during which they are obliged to maintain silence?—That is all; they are always silent, in fact, except at the hours of recreation.

Is not silence enjoined during the whole period that elapses between the evening prayer and the morning prayer?—There is but half an hour of that time during which they can be supposed to have any occasion to speak, as they are all in bed at ten o'clock.

Is not silence enjoined during that time?—It is implied, because after night prayer each person goes off to his room, and of course they do not meet again till the next morning.

There are several rooms in which there are two or three beds?—In those rooms they are supposed to be silent, or at least not to speak so loud as to be heard in the adjoining rooms or corridor.

Is not there a regulation to that effect?—There is.

What is the greatest number that sleep in any one room?—I believe at present we have not more than three in any one room; we used to have four and five, but in consequence of the accommodation being enlarged latterly, I think we have no more than three.

Is not there one room in which there are fourteen?—There may be that number in the long dormitory of the lay college, where the freshmen are; it is not a room properly, it is a dormitory; I dare say there are fourteen beds there.

Is not silence enjoined and enforced in that room; for instance, during the interval between the evening prayer and the morning prayer?—Certainly.

On the whole, then, in how many hours of the twenty-four is silence not enjoined?—We enjoin silence during the hours of study; during the hours of lecture; during the hours of meals, for the preservation of good order in the College, but that obligation of silence is not supposed to be a silence of a religious nature; it is enjoined for the purpose of preserving order, of obliging the Students to attend seriously to their own duties, and of preventing them from disturbing their fellow students. Where there is a reasonable cause for speaking they are never prohibited, provided they speak in such a tone as not to incommode their neighbours: it is not given to contemplation or meditation, or any thing of that sort. The hours at which the Students are at full liberty to speak, consequently, are those of recreation, and that may be about four hours in the day. On Wednesdays and Saturdays, and other occasional vacant days, the liberty of speaking is much more extensive.

Is the silence that is observed in the interval between evening prayer and the following morning prayer, a silence connected with religious consideration?—No; it is for the preservation of good order in the house. They are supposed to have complied with their religious duties in the chapel, to have finished their night prayer there; then they go to their rooms and make arrangements for retiring to rest, which is supposed to be done in silence; they are not bound to any prayer or meditation during that time.

The silence during the five days of spiritual retreat, is of a religious nature?—Entirely.

With

With reference to the rule of silence after the boys retire to their rooms, would you consider it a breach of the rule if any boy having occasion to speak to another, were to do so?—No, unless there was any thing like noise in the house; even in class, a boy may require to ask questions of the person next to him; we never consider any thing of that sort. When order is not violated, and the general discipline of the house is not interfered with, we do not consider it sinful or immoral.

During the period allotted to vacation, do the same rules with respect to silence prevail as relating to the young men who continue in the house?—No, they do not.

What degree of relaxation do they receive upon those occasions?—During vacation the hours of study are fewer. There is neither high mass nor sermon on Sundays; there are but few lectures, and consequently more time for talking if they feel disposed. Many of the Students spend a considerable portion of their time in the library. The rhetoricians and logicians of the preceding year are obliged to attend lectures in logic and mathematics once a day during about six weeks of the vacation.

Is the meaning of enjoining silence in short this, that when they are employed in any duty with the performance of which conversation might interfere, they are to be silent?—Unquestionably, that is the motive and reason of it.

Or when they retire to rest?—Or when they retire to rest.

Under what penalties is the silence enjoined?—The penalties are not specified by the rules of the College.

What penalties are inflicted in case of any breach of the rule?—No penalty, properly speaking, but a reprehension from the Dean or the President.

Which reprehension is given where the breach of silence takes place?—If a breach of silence takes place in the presence of either of the Deans, and tends to disturb the public order of the house, the Dean reprimands the Student; or if the Prefect of a hall reports any Student as habitually irregular, the Dean summons the guilty party to appear before the President, who reproves him, and points out the consequences of his persevering in his bad conduct. If the breach of silence be a slight one, it is frequently overlooked altogether. Nor do the superiors consider it necessary to inquire particularly into every trifling breach of rule in this respect. It is quite sufficient that the rule be generally observed; mere occasional violations of it do not disturb the general regularity of the house, unless in particular circumstances, then of course they must be animadverted on by the superiors.

What officer in the establishment is next in order to yourself?—The Vice-President.

Who holds that office?—The Reverend Michael Montague.

What is the salary of the Vice-President?—It was 121 l. Irish.

Will you be so good as to state generally what are the duties of the Vice-President?—The Vice-President has also the general inspection of the Students, under the direction of the President; he is obliged to report to the President from time to time, any observations he may have made on the conduct of the Students. When the President is absent, or unable by illness to discharge his duties, the Vice-President acts as his substitute, and has the same powers.

Has he any immediate superintendence of the education of the young men?—He has none that is a matter of obligation; but he does instruct the younger Students in the Catechism, or Christian Doctrine, and gives them moreover an insight into the Sacred Scripture, suited to their age and capacity.

Does he reside within the building?—He does.

What privileges or advantages does he enjoy in addition to his salary?—He has no other advantage whatever, no emolument but what is allowed him as Vice-President.

At whose expense is the table kept at which yourself and the Vice-President dine?—That is kept at the expense of the Parliamentary grant; there is an item every year in the Estimate presented to Parliament, for the commons of the President, Vice-President, Deans and other officers and Professors. That allowance furnishes the table, with the exception of the articles I mentioned before, which the College does not supply them with, but gives them an allowance for. I mean wine, spirits and groceries.

Are the apartments furnished which are inhabited by the President and Vice-President?—They are furnished at the expense of the College, as are likewise those of all the other superiors and professors.

Are they all found with coals and candles?—They are at the expense of the College.

What officer is next in authority to the Vice-President?—The next to the Vice-President are the Senior and Junior Deans.

Will you describe their situations and duties?—The Deans are employed altogether in enforcing the discipline of the house, and in giving the Students moral and religious instruction. The Spiritual Retreat twice a year, is generally given by the Dean; they are obliged also to accompany the Students on the public walks, to attend them at Morning and Evening Prayer, and at all their other religious exercises, to visit the rooms of the Students, and see that cleanliness and good order be properly attended to. The situation of Dean is a very laborious one, he rises at the same hour as the Students, and is later up at night.

What salary do they receive?—The Senior Dean has the same as the Vice-President 121 l. and the Junior I believe has 80 l. including the allowance of 30 l. It is a part of their business likewise to consult with the President and Vice-President, about the qualifications and dispositions of persons to be admitted to Holy Orders.

Who is the Librarian?—The Librarian is the Reverend Nicholas Slevin.

Appendix, N^o 8.

Examination of
Rev.

B. Crotty, D. D.
19 October 1826.

Does he hold any other situation than that of Librarian?—He is also the Professor of the Dunboyne or Senior Students.

With the two together, what is the amount of his salary?—I believe it is 121 l. Irish.

Be so good as to state generally what are his duties?—His duties, as Librarian, are to attend in the library during certain hours in the day, and if he cannot conveniently discharge that duty himself, to take care that it is done by one of his two substitutes, who are likewise Senior Scholars; to take care that the books be kept in proper order, and the library regularly cleaned; in a word, to do every duty prescribed for the Librarian by the College statutes.

What are his duties as Professor of the senior scholars?—He is bound to give them three lectures every week, to assist at their literary exercises, some of which are monthly, and others half-yearly examinations, and at the close of each academical year to preside at the Theses, supported by the Senior Students. He is likewise bound to attend to the general conduct of the young men immediately under his care, and to report to the President those that are distinguished either for remarkably good conduct, or for more than ordinary proficiency in their studies, as well as those who may be inattentive to their literary duties, or guilty of any serious violation of rule.

Who holds the office of Bursar?—The Bursar, ex officio, is the Reverend John Cummins; the delicate state of his health has prevented him for a considerable time from attending much to the out-door business of the College, such as purchasing provisions and making payments in Dublin or elsewhere; this part of his duty has been done, since his health became delicate, by the Vice-President, the writing part is done entirely by Mr. Cummins.

What are considered the duties of the Bursar?—The duties of the Bursar are to pay all debts contracted on the College account, to keep the annual accounts of receipt and expenditure, and prepare copies of those accounts, with the necessary vouchers for the Trustees at the end of each year; likewise to make out the account presented to the Imprest Office.

What salary does he receive for the discharge of those duties?—His salary is 121 l. a year, Irish.

There appears in the list of the officers connected with the establishment, an Agent; what matters fall under his cognizance, and what duties does he perform?—I do not know; during the few years that the Irish Parliament existed, after the establishment of the College, there was a person appointed as Parliamentary Agent, and on his death Mr. Knox was named his successor. I do not know the gentleman, he is a very respectable character, but I believe he has nothing to do for the College. I never saw him; he resides in Dublin; he has been once or twice at the College, but I had not the pleasure of meeting him.

Where does he live?—I do not know; his salary is paid in at Mr. Latouche's bank.

His salary appears to be 300 l. a year?—Yes.

What do you conceive is the meaning of the term Agent as applied to his office?—It meant originally a Parliamentary agent to carry on the business of the College with Parliament, as long as we had a Parliament in Ireland; and I suppose it was thought that cases might occur where his interference with government in England might be useful or necessary.

Will you be so good as to state what number of professors are connected with the Institution?—The professors, I think are ten; there is the Reverend Nicholas Slevin, Professor of Divinity, in the Dunboyne establishment; the Reverend Doctor William Higgins, Professor of Dogmatic Divinity; the Reverend Lewis Delahogue, Doctor of Divinity, superannuated and emeritus; the Reverend Francis Anglade, Professor of Moral Theology; the Reverend James Browne, Professor of Sacred Scripture and Hebrew; the Reverend Nicholas Callan, of Natural Philosophy; the Reverend Charles M'Nally, of Logic, Metaphysics and Ethics; the Reverend Jeremiah Donovan, of Rhetoric and Belles Lettres; the Reverend Patrick Carew, of Greek and Latin; the Reverend Christopher Boylan, of English Elocution and French; the chair of the Irish Language is at present vacant.

What is the distinction between dogmatic theology and moral theology?—Dogmatic theology, is the theology in which is taught whatever appertains to faith, and in the other is taught whatever appertains to morals; the one regards the credenda, the other, the agenda.

Are all those gentlemen in orders?—They are.

Are all their salaries alike?—No, there is a difference in the salaries.

Will you name the other officers of the College?—There is the Reverend Matthew Flanagan, Secretary to the Board of Trustees.

What salary has he?—£. 73. 10s. British.

Does he reside within the building?—No; he resides in Dublin.

Is the money paid into his hands as Treasurer?—He receives the Parliamentary grant, and lodges it in the bank, generally.

Does he give any security?—I do not think he does.

Has he any balances remaining in his hands from time to time?—He never has any balance in his hands; he gives a check occasionally on the bank for payment.

What duties does he perform as Secretary?—He is obliged to attend every meeting of the Trustees, to take down the transactions of the board during the time they remain together, and to transact any temporal business of the College in Dublin, such as recovering money at the Treasury, lodging it, and writing occasionally to those persons who owe debts to the College. The College also, or rather the Trustees in all law transactions, sue, or are sued, through the Secretary.

Who

Who is the Physician of the College?—The Physician is Doctor Thomas Lee.

In what way is he paid?—His salary is fifty guineas a year.

Is he paid for his attendance?—No; he is obliged for that salary to pay a monthly visit to the College, and to go whenever he is called on by the apothecary of the College.

Does he attend frequently?—Indeed he does; whenever he is sent for, he never fails to go; but it so happens that we do not call upon him very frequently; our apothecary is a physician also, and very intelligent; he knows the constitutions of the Students so well, that unless in dangerous cases, it is not necessary to trouble Doctor Lee. The visits of Doctor Lee (exclusive of the stated one every month) are, I think, one year with another, from fifteen to twenty each year.

Who is the Apothecary?—Doctor Edward Talbot Kelly.

Does he reside in Maynooth?—In the town of Maynooth.

Is he paid any specific sum?—He has half a guinea a year for every Student in the house, for medicine and attendance.

Who is the Surgeon?—The Surgeon is Mr. Cusack Roney.

In what way is he remunerated?—He gets three guineas for every visit he makes to the College; and receives no extra fee for the Students who come to consult him in Dublin.

Does he reside at Maynooth?—No, he resides in Dublin. He is an assistant, and has, I think, been President of the Royal College of Surgeons.

What office does Mr. Renehan hold under the establishment?—He is Junior Dean, at present.

What persons have you in the establishment for conducting the general business of it, as to the preparing food and taking care of the apartments of the house?—We have a Cook, with two assistant boys, and I believe about five who attend the refectory, and keep every thing in order there for the other department; for the professors and superiors, four servants; and one exclusively for the President; one is allowed the Dunboyne students; there are other persons employed as sweepers, and in different other departments about the house. I should think there are about 28 in all, including a carpenter, a baker, and his apprentice, and two women who attend in the infirmary.

Appendix, N° 9.

Further Examination of the Very Reverend Bartholomew Crotty, D. D.

Friday, 20th October 1826.

IN your examination yesterday, you stated, that it was necessary for any young man who was a candidate for admission into the second class of Humanity, to undergo an examination in certain books, Cæsar's Commentaries, Sallust, and some others that you named; will you be so good as to describe what is the course of instruction in the second class of Humanity?—In the second class of Humanity, the choice of the books is sometimes left to the discretion of the Professor himself; he generally teaches his pupils in Latin portions of Virgil, Horace, Livy, and some select Orations of Cicero; they read likewise in Greek, commonly the Anabasis, or some books of the Cyropædia of Xenophon, and a portion of Homer; and although they do not ex professo learn the rudiments of the Greek language, care is always taken by the Professors in both classes to preserve and to improve the knowledge the Students have already acquired of the rudiments of Grammar and Prosody in both Greek and Latin, before they enter College. It sometimes happens that they are not very perfect in the prosody of either language, but all possible care is taken by the Professors that they shall learn it in College, if they have not learnt it before.

Are those books varied from time to time?—They do vary. The books for instance which the Professor of Rhetoric teaches, are not exactly those that are mentioned for the examination on entering the College. In the second class of Humanity also, the books that are mentioned for examination on entrance into the class, are not supposed to be necessarily read; the Professor has it in his power to make such changes as he thinks most conducive to the improvement of the class; but generally speaking, the rule is to read at least a considerable portion of the books that are mentioned as necessary for admittance.

The Commissioners see from the card in which the books are stated, which are required to be understood upon a boy's first admission, that the first four books of the Æneid are named; is the whole of the Æneid read in this class?—No, it is not. They generally begin with the fifth book, assuming that they have read the four first books before they enter the College.

Does the same rule apply to the four Orations of Cicero against Catiline, are they not read in class upon the ground of it being supposed that they have been previously studied?

—There are three orations generally read; I am not certain whether they are always the same; I believe they vary in different years. I would beg leave to mention, that besides those books that are prescribed to be read in the classes for examination, the Professor of Humanity instructs his pupils in the composition of Latin verse, hexameter and pentameter, and the different measures of Horace; there are besides, compositions in Latin prose, and translations from Latin into Greek, and vice versa.

Do they compose at all in English?—Yes, but in another class; in the class of English elocution,

Do they commit to memory any portion of what they read?—They do, in Latin particularly.

Do you happen to know whether they commit any work composed in English to memory?—Yes; they are obliged in the English class to deliver portions either of their own composition, or extracts from English writers, such as the Speaker, and other works of that nature.

Do they compose what are called Themes?—They do.

Have the young men any instructors in the nature of tutors?—None, but their Professors.

They receive no instruction, except from the Professor of the class in which they happen to be?—Never, unless that Professor happen to be absent, and then one of the Senior Scholars is substituted in his place.

Beginning at Monday morning, can you go through what may be called the daily business of the week of this class?—I must observe that Wednesday is always a vacant day with us; it is a day on which the Students are allowed to take their walk through the country in a body, and on that day there is no class, except for the Professor of Sacred Scripture; we could find no other day in the week to give to his class but Wednesdays and Saturdays; half Saturday is vacant too.

Beginning at Monday morning, and confining yourself to the second class of Humanity, what is the course of their literary duties through the week?—They are obliged to attend two lectures each day in Greek and Latin; they read the Latin at the morning, and the Greek at the afternoon lecture; there is a Latin lecture of an hour's duration in the morning, from half-past ten to half-past eleven.

Can you state in what book they are now lecturing?—They are reading at present in Greek the Anabasis; and in Latin Cicero's Orations.

Are the Commissioners to understand that they have only one book in Latin and one book in Greek at one time, and that they finish that before they read another?—They do.

Having disposed of the Anabasis and the Orations of Cicero, they then take something else?—They sometimes read the Cyropædia in place of the Anabasis. After they have finished the Anabasis this year, they will take up the fifth book of Homer for Greek; and the 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th books of the Æneid of Virgil, with some of the Odes of Horace will be their business in the Latin.

Do they read them through without exception?—The editions of Horace which we use, do not generally contain the odes of immoral tendency; the Students would not be allowed to keep them.

In the card before the Commissioners, they see that among the Greek books which are read, the Gospel of St. John is included; does that form in succession a part of their studies?—It does generally, before they come to College; the card supposes it to have been read before.

Is it necessary for a boy to have gone through all the books that are studied in this class, before he is removed from it?—It is not; they go through as much as the time will allow, sometimes they do not take in the entire, and sometimes they take in portions of other works that are not mentioned there. At the Christmas examination, besides the Anabasis, Cicero, and Virgil, they will be examined in Nelson's Greek Exercises, and must produce a portion of the Greek and Roman Histories translated respectively into Greek and Latin from English.

In what way is it decided that a young man is fit to be removed from that class to the next in succession?—He passes, as a matter of course, into the next class, when he finishes his year in the class of Humanity, unless it be found that he is still so backward that a second year in the same class will be more for his improvement; but that very seldom is the case; it is very seldom allowed. We generally refuse admittance to those who are not likely to be fit for Rhetoric after their year of Humanity. If a boy is not able to give an account of the business he has been at during that year, he is generally supposed to want abilities; and we advise such persons to withdraw from the house.

About how many are there in that lowest class of Humanity at present?—Twenty-five; it is always the least numerous class in the house.

What is the name of the Professor who teaches them?—Mr. Carew.

Is that lowest class which is now taught by Mr. Carew, learning from any other person at Maynooth at the same time?—They are obliged to attend the English Elocution class every evening except Wednesdays and Saturdays.

Who is the teacher of the English class?—The Rev. Mr. Boylan.

Are those young men in that class under the literary instruction in any way of any other person except Mr. Carew and Mr. Boylan at present?—The young men, both of the Humanity and Rhetoric classes, are obliged to attend twice a week an instruction in the catechism, or the Christian doctrine given by the Vice-President.

Does that duty attach to him as Vice-President, or by virtue of some other Professorship which he may hold?—It is a duty which he voluntarily took up some years ago, and has continued to discharge up to the present time. It was necessary that somebody should do it, and there was no person particularly appointed by the Board for it; the Vice-President having some time to spare, does it himself; they generally account for a certain portion of christian doctrine, and besides that, they read Reeves's History of the Bible, and account for it.

In what way do they account for it?—They are interrogated, and answer from memory; having previously studied the matter appointed for the lecture.

Is

Is this catechetical instruction confined to this class, or does it extend to the higher classes?—It comprehends only the two classes of Humanity and Rhetoric.

Is not that the work of three years?—No, two years; the lowest class of Humanity one year, and the Rhetoric class another.

Are the Commissioners right in supposing that the several classes of Maynooth are as follows; the first and lowest being the Humanity class?—Yes.

The next in order above it being the Rhetoric class?—Yes.

The next in order above that, the Logic class?—Yes.

What is the next above that?—The Mathematics and Natural Philosophy; and then comes the Divinity.

And there are three classes of Divinity?—Each Student remains three years in Divinity, and therefore there are some first, some second, and some third year's Divines.

Altogether constituting seven classes, occupying seven years?—Those are what are called the principal classes; but we have a French Language and an English Elocution class, and a class of the Irish Language for the Students from a certain portion of the country.

Those last-mentioned classes constitute no addition of time, but they are merely incidental to certain periods of the other classes:—Yes.

Then the whole perfect course of education at Maynooth, putting the Dunboyne Students out of consideration, consists of seven years, the first year being given to Humanity, the second to Rhetoric, the third to Logic, the fourth to Mathematics and Natural Philosophy, and the three last to Divinity?—That is precisely the case.

In addition to which there are three years for the Dunboyne Students for extra studies in Divinity?—Yes, it sometimes happens that young men come from Carlow who have made their Logic there, and perhaps their Natural Philosophy; we receive these into Divinity, but they must have made their entire course either in Maynooth or in some other College.

Do you ever allow a remarkably clever young man to pass through one of those classes in a less period than a year?—No, never.

Does it ever happen that a young man who is rather remarkable for want of ability is detained more than a year in one class?—Very rarely; there have been a few instances of persons reading their Logic a second time, and others where they remained two years in the Humanity class; but very rarely does this happen.

Have the goodness to state what is the course of study in the Rhetoric class?—In the Rhetoric class they generally read a portion of the authors that are mentioned in the list for admittance; they read occasionally, and rather generally, two or three books of Tacitus. In other years they read a portion of Livy. Cicero's Offices, though mentioned in the card, is not commonly read in the class. Virgil's Georgics are read, and Horace's Art of Poetry, but neither of them regularly every year, but one, one year, and one, another: then in Greek, Demosthenes and Longinus are always read; and in addition to the Latin works mentioned, they always read a considerable portion of Quintilian, though it is not mentioned in the list. The Professor in this class, after Christmas, generally about the month of February or March, explains to them, either from English works which he chuses for the purpose, such as Blair's Rhetoric, or from Dictates compiled by himself, the principles of rhetoric, and obliges them to compose in Latin and in English. He gives them also instructions in Elocution and delivery, though this is more properly the business of the Professor of English Elocution, who does it likewise.

Are any of the Students in this class ever in the habit of composing Latin?—No, they have not hitherto; they do it in the Humanity class.

Do they compose in Latin at all in this class?—They do, Latin prose. It is more frequently translation from English than original composition.

Are they in the habit at all of composing in Greek, either in verse or prose?—Not, as far as I am aware, in the Rhetoric class; but I have got in my possession a good many compositions from the Humanity class in Greek verse; Greek odes principally.

Is that part of the regular college system, or was it some accidental occurrence that drew forth those Greek odes?—It was at my suggestion that the present Professor Mr. Carew, first introduced it. It is not a matter of obligation for the entire class, and is required only of such of the students as have most taste and talent.

Was Cicero's treatise de Officiis, formerly read in this class?—No, it never was made a regular class book in the College.

Is it occasionally read in either of the classes?—Not in the classes; I dare say many of the Students read it privately for their improvement.

Are the books in this class read in succession in the same manner as in the preceding class?—They are.

Will you be so good as to state in what way the young men prepare themselves for the lectures; do they study in their own rooms, or are they collected together in a public room?—During the winter months they study in the public halls; because at that time of the year, there are fires in the halls and they have none in their rooms; during the remainder of the year after the month of March, they are all allowed to study in their rooms.

What theological instruction is given to the young men in those classes?—None, but what I have mentioned; they are obliged to account for the catechism twice a week, and likewise to stand examinations on those same days, in Reeves's History of the Bible; the Deans also frequently in the course of the year, perhaps once a fortnight, give them moral instructions on their conduct and the dispositions necessary for the ecclesiastical state.

It appears that the Gospel of St. John forms a part of the study in the preceding class; does any part of the New or the Old Testament form a part of the study in this class?—No.

Appendix, N^o 9.

Examination of
Rev.

B. Crotty, D. D.
20 October 1826.

Neither in Greek nor in English?—No; because it is supposed that the Gospels of St. John and St. Luke are pure Greek, but too easy for the more advanced classes. It is more for the sake of the language than because they are the sacred writings, that they are read.

With respect to those two classes, is the study of the Scriptures in their translated form, by the young men of this standing, encouraged or discouraged?—It is encouraged regularly. They have all Bibles or Testaments.

Do they study them privately?—They do, but under the inspection of the Vice-President.

And under his direction?—Yes; they are not obliged to account for them to him in the very extensive way they do afterwards, under the Professor of Sacred Scripture; but they are constantly going over some portions of the sacred writings twice a week with the Vice-President, which he explains to them as far as their capacity and age will allow.

Is it upon the occasions of catechetical instruction, that they read those portions of Scripture with the Vice-President?—It is during the same lectures; but the objects of course are distinct, when one is finished the other is taken up.

Do they upon any other days of the week read any other portions, such as they may select themselves?—There is a chapter read every day in the refectory, at the beginning of dinner, by one of the Students.

Has any Student so long as he continues in the Humanity class and in the Rhetoric class, full permission to read the Scriptures in English, at his own private hours and apart from observation?—We never forbid him to read them whenever he pleases, if it does not interfere with his other duties.

Is he permitted to do it?—Certainly he is permitted; he can have the Testament in his room and read it whenever he pleases. During the hours of study, there are certain books pointed out for the Students, which they are obliged to read during those hours; but at other times of the day they can take up any book they please; and if they have a mind to read the Testament, nobody will ever interfere with them; they are even encouraged to do it.

Then in point of fact there never has been any dissatisfaction expressed to any young man in the Institution, on the part of any of the Superiors, on the ground of his reading the Scriptures in his own private room?—Quite the contrary; as far as I have ever been able to learn.

At any period of the course, however early?—At any period of the course, however early; on the contrary, we require that they shall have Bibles, every one of them.

The entire Bible?—Yes.

In English?—Yes.

Where is that Bible to be kept?—The Bibles are kept at the library until purchased by the Students; they pay for them with their other books at entrance, and keep them themselves.

Of the twenty-five persons that constitute the lowest class of Humanity, how many do you suppose possess Bibles and have them among their books?—I dare say nearly every one.

And they have purchased them from the library?—They have.

And they keep their Bibles not in the library, but in their own private rooms?—In their own private rooms. We never prevent any Student that pleases, from having a Bible either in Latin or English; the divinity students generally make use of the Latin Vulgate, because the commentator they study, quotes the Latin text.

If it has been said then that any superior at Maynooth, has ever forbidden any young man, however young, to read the Scriptures, the Commissioners collect from you that that is untrue?—Certainly; either it is untrue or he acted contrary to the general sense of the house*.

By the Scriptures, you understand those versions and copies, that are authorized by the Roman Catholic church?—Yes.

What edition is used?—The Donay, is the translation we use; the Vulgate and the Greek Testament are common among the Students; very few of them have the Greek Bible, it is expensive; but they have the Latin Vulgate complete.

Is the Version of the Testament in English, which is used, that which was published lately by Coyne?—Many of the Students had copies of the former editions before Mr. Coyne's was printed. The College has purchased from Coyne 300 copies of that edition, for the use of the Students.

Of the Testament or of the Bible?—Of the Bible.

About how many pupils may there be in the Rhetoric class at present?—Between forty and fifty.

Who is the Professor of Rhetoric?—Mr. Donovan.

Are those forty or fifty persons at present under the literary instruction of any other person than Mr. Donovan?—They are obliged to attend also the English Elocution class.

Do the young men change their class in a body, or successively?—They change in a body, because when they have finished their year, they all next year advance to a higher class.

At what period of the year does that change take place?—The academical year ends at the end of June; the following commences on the first of September; the two months of vacation intervening.

Is

[Subsequently added by the Witness.]

* We have not the same reason for restricting the use of the Bible in College, that holds good through the country; we apprehend danger, not from the Bible itself, but from the numberless commentators, who offer their services to explain, but frequently pervert its meaning.

Is there any particular examination as to the qualifications of each individual at the period of the change?—There is a public examination of every class in the house at the end of the academical year, and one also after Christmas, at the commencement of the year.

Are those public examinations numerous attended by persons, not immediately connected with the establishment?—No, there is very seldom any body from abroad. The Professors of the house are generally the only persons that attend, with occasionally some clergymen from the neighbourhood.

Would you admit any body that expressed a wish to attend?—Certainly, any gentleman that would give his name. We have had occasionally gentlemen from Dublin; but the examinations do not seem to attract much public attention. But the Theses of the Dunboyne Students seem to excite more interest.

When is the next public examination?—We generally begin them about the end of May, they continue commonly three weeks.

Will you have the goodness to describe the course of study in the Logic class?—In the Logic class the course is printed for the use of the College; the Professor uses this course as a text or class book, without being bound to adhere religiously to all the opinions that are contained in it; our logic, besides the purely logical questions, comprehends a good deal of metaphysics regarding ideas, motives of judgment, &c.; on some of those questions one may hold indifferently either side.

Who is the author of the book of logic in question?—The work was compiled originally in France, and was a portion of the course of philosophy called the Philosophia Lugdunensis. It was reprinted for the use of the College, and some changes made in it by Mr. Anglade, the present Professor of Moral Divinity. He had been, some years before the work was printed, Professor of Logic.

Who was understood to be the author of the Lyons work?—I do not know; it was compiled, together with a course of divinity, for the use of the Archbishop's seminary. The divinity is not considered perfectly orthodox; we make no use of it.

Does it consist chiefly of the ancient logic, that is, of such books as Aristotle and Burgersdicius?—It is better adapted for the use of schools than the works mentioned, and contains the substance of whatever is deemed useful in them.

Does it include within it, in its present form, the opinions of more recent logicians, such as Locke, or Reid, or Stewart?—It is principally taken, as almost all the courses of logic on the Continent, at least in the south of Europe, are, from a French work called the "Ars Cogitandi," or L'Art de penser, by Nicole, which we consider a very excellent treatise of logic.

Do you consider the work, in its present form, as perfectly unobjectionable?—I do.

Does it contain any opinions which the College of Maynooth would not adopt as its own at present?—I am not aware that it does. I think the work is perfectly orthodox. It contains nothing contrary or dangerous to religion or morality.

Is this the only book of logic that is taught in the logic class?—It is the only book that is used as a class book; but the Students have access to Mr. Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding, and any other good book on the subject which they may wish to procure.

What opportunities of access have the Students of the logic class to Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding?—They can buy, if they please, either the large work, or the abridgement.

They are not supplied to them by the College?—They are not.

In point of fact, are they bought frequently by the Students?—They are.

How many of the sixty or seventy Students in that class do you suppose may possess Locke's Essay?—I cannot say how many have it of their own, but they hand it about from one to another. A great many read it that have not purchased it. I must observe at the same time, that the Professor is not bound to adopt, in every instance, the opinions of Mr. Locke. There are some things in them that we consider erroneous, and we consequently hold the contrary doctrine. Whenever the Professor finds it necessary to touch upon those parts, he remarks, that Mr. Locke's doctrine is not considered quite sound.

Still you do not object to the Students of that class promiscuously reading Locke's Essay?—No; those two or three points that I allude to are so well known to them, that there is no danger of their being injured by reading it. I principally allude to Locke's opinion upon human testimony, as to its losing its certainty according as it is more remote from the facts to which it refers, and we do not think him quite so sound as he ought to be upon the spirituality of the human soul.

Or upon the resurrection of the body, perhaps?—I do not recollect what opinion he holds with regard to the identity of the body.

The Commissioners understand that no books are supplied by the College?—No. The Trustees have ordered different works to be printed at the expense of the College; but as the Students pay for them, the College is indemnified.

Is not the Latin work on logic you have mentioned, supplied to them?—They pay for it.

They are obliged to purchase it?—They are obliged to purchase the entire course.

Is there any book which the Students in the logic class are obliged to purchase, except the volume of Latin logic you have mentioned?—There is, besides, a volume of metaphysics, and another of ethics, and those form the studies of the logic year.

Will you be so good as to mention all the books that the Students in Maynooth College are obliged to purchase, from the time of their entering the College?—All the books that are taught in the different classes, from the time they enter until the end of their course.

Appendix, N^o 9.

Examination of
Rev.

B. Crotty, D. D.
20 October 1826.

Of these, some have been printed by the College, or purchased by it for their accommodation, such as the courses of philosophy (the first year) and divinity, the Sacred Scriptures, and the Commentaries of Menochius, with some books of piety; others, their classics, for example, and the works on mathematics and natural philosophy, they either bring with them from home, or buy in Dublin, or at the College after they enter. I shall supply the Commissioners with accurate lists of these different works.

Is the volume which is now handed to you, which is intitled "Institutiones Philosophicæ, Pars Tertia," the volume of ethics you have spoken of?—It is.

By whom is it composed?—By Mr. Anglade, a Professor in the College. It was part of the Philosophia Lugdunensis. It was revised by him, and some little changes made, but none of any great importance.

Do the Students go through that volume in the course of the logic year?—Not entirely. The want of time obliges the Professor to omit portions of it which are not considered necessary, or which the Students will have an opportunity of seeing again in the course of moral divinity.

Does the study of the book of metaphysics precede that of the work on ethics?—It does.

Is the volume now shown to you, intitled "Institutiones Philosophicæ, Pars Secunda," the volume on metaphysics to which you have alluded?—It is.

Is the book now shown to you, intitled "Institutiones Philosophicæ, Pars Prima," the book of logic to which you have referred?—It is.

Will you describe in what manner the volume on metaphysics was compiled?—It was compiled by the same Professor, the Reverend Mr. Anglade, and principally taken, like the others, from the Lyons course.

It is hardly necessary to ask, whether the three volumes, in their present form, are fully approved by the College at Maynooth?—We approve of them, and consider them as containing sound doctrine.

From what authors were the compilers of the Lyonesse course generally understood to have taken the subject matter of this book?—It is very difficult to say. In every university in France, the Professors of Philosophy were at liberty to compile, if they wished, a course of philosophy for their pupils; and a great number of such courses exist, such as the philosophy of Seguiz, Mazeas, Drouas, and a variety of others. They generally agree in substance, and as there is nothing very peculiar in the opinions which they inculcate, it is to be presumed that each Professor found the matter of his treatise in his general reading, or took it from courses written before his time. In the leading questions of metaphysics and ethics, such as the existence of God, his attributes, the spirituality, eternity, (ex parte post, as the schoolmen say) and liberty of the human soul, the existence of a future state, &c. they all agree. There are minor questions open to free discussion, on which a Professor may take whatever side he considers more probable. His pupils, of course, may agree with or dissent from his doctrine.

Were the three works in question all compiled and revised by Mr. Anglade?—They were.

Is he the person that teaches all the three books?—No; he was formerly Professor of Logic, but for the last eighteen or twenty years he has taught Moral Theology.

But the Professor of Logic, now Mr. M'Nally, does teach all the three books?—He does.

How long has he held that Professorship?—I think about thirteen or fourteen years.

Did Mr. Anglade precede him in that situation?—Not immediately.

Will you describe the manner in which the Professor lectures upon the subject of these books?—The Professor appoints for each lecture a certain portion of the author; he explains any thing in it that may be obscure to the Students, and they, at the following lecture or class, with the books closed, give an account from memory, and their intermediate study, of that portion which the Professor prescribed for the matter of the lecture.

The explanation which he gives to them in the lecture, is in Latin, is it not?—In Latin generally; they occasionally give it in English; there is no prohibition against their speaking English in the Logic class or in the Divinity class, when they find that they can do it with more ease and with more profit to the Students; though Latin is said to be the language of the schools, we do not adhere invariably to it.

Is the explanation given in the form of an extempore address, or is it read from written notes by the Professor?—It is given as an extempore address.

Is it understood that he is bound to conform himself to the opinions expressed in the text, whatever they may be; or does he suggest occasionally his own opinions as differing from those in the book?—He can whenever he thinks proper suggest his own opinion as differing from that of the book.

Do you conceive that he does so?—Not very frequently in the instance I am speaking of, because it is considered that the philosophical opinions contained in the treatises in question are generally sound, and we therefore adhere to them; there may be some particular opinions in the book, from which the Professor differs; he may for instance think that a certain proof regarding the spirituality of the soul, or the existence of God, was not so conclusive as the authority would seem to consider it; and he may in that case either amend the proof by explaining it more largely, or he may say that there are stronger and better proofs, and that that might have been omitted.

Is it the habit of the Students to take written notes of the Latin oral explanation given by the Professor?—No, they attend to the explanation given by the Professor, and retain of of course as much as they can of it, merely by hearing the explanation given. I would beg to state, that there are certain things omitted in this logic, such as certain artificial rules for the construction of syllogisms which the Professor supplies.

He explains them though they are omitted in the treatise?—He does.

Are the answers of the young men required to be in Latin?—They generally are; if the Professor thinks that a young man's not answering well proceeds from his not having a sufficient facility of speaking Latin, he will then allow him to explain himself in English; a tolerable Latin scholar will, after a little practice, find the Latin as easy as English.

Do you know what works are used in the College of Carlow?—I believe they are the same works that we use in Maynooth for philosophy.

Do you mean identically the same?—Yes.

Do these differ in any material respect from those works that were in use in the college in which you yourself were educated at Lisbon?—No; the work I read when I was a student, was the Philosophy of Seguy, which is much on the same plan with those that are before the Commissioners.

Not differing much in doctrine?—No.

Where was the "approbatur" of those works originally given?—In France; we never got any approbatus for them, except the permission of the Board of Trustees to have them printed for the use of the college. They may not be as perfect works as might be written on the subject; but they contain nothing that church or state can fairly object to.

Was the Lyonesse course of philosophy approved by the Sorbonne?—I do not think it was usual to refer books of that sort to the Sorbonne for approbation, unless perhaps when composed by a member of that body.

Did not the Sorbonne use books of this sort?—No; the Sorbonne had nothing to do with treatises of philosophy; they interfered only with theological works, or works containing erroneous opinions on religion, such as those of Voltaire, Raynal, &c. and I believe the theology of Lyons did not escape their censure. I do not recollect whether the faculty of Sorbonne, as a body, censured the work; but I am sure that some individual divines did write against it.

Do you mean as being too much or too little Jansenistical?—Too much of course; too little Jansenistical, means, in my mind, not sufficiently erroneous.

Was the Lyonesse course adopted in the University of Paris, or in that Institution, whatever it may be, which you consider in form most analogous to the College of Maynooth?—The philosophy was read in France, not only in the Bishop's seminary at Lyons, but in many others; they have I suppose fifty courses of this sort; every Professor in any of the Universities of France that had the means of writing a course of philosophy, consisting either of Logic, Metaphysics, or Ethics, or comprizing moreover matter of the second year of philosophy, that is, Natural Philosophy, was at liberty to do so; they are works that are generally considered as merely elementary, and the Sorbonne as far as they were purely philosophical, never troubled themselves about them; they were not within their province.

What number of young men are in the Logic class?—About seventy-five.

During the time they are in the Logic class, do they pursue any other study?—They learn French also.

Do all learn French who are in the Logic class?—They do; they are all obliged to attend the French lectures. Mr. Boylan, the Professor of English elocution, teaches French also.

The Commissioners observed that several young men appeared to be in possession of Italian books; what opportunities have they of learning Italian?—By their private studies.

Is there any teacher of Italian?—There are gentlemen in the house that know the language and that occasionally give them, without any obligation, however, instruction in the Italian; some of them also make a study of the Spanish language.

Do the Students in that class receive catechetical instruction from the Vice-President?—No, they are not obliged to attend his instructions.

Do they pursue any instruction in divinity at all?—No.

Having finished their studies in the Logic class, to what class do they proceed next?—They pass into the class of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy the following year.

Who is the Professor of that class?—The present Professor is Dr. Callan; the person who was Professor of it last year has left the College.

Will you describe the course of study in that class?—They commence their mathematics at the beginning of the accademical year, which is about the 10th of September, and continue to learn pure mathematics generally till the end of February.

Pray explain what you mean by pure mathematics?—By pure mathematics I mean mathematics not applied to the different branches of natural science; mere speculative mathematics.

Both geometry and algebra?—Yes; the course they learn in that time consists of arithmetic, algebra, geometry, trigonometry, both plain and spherical, and conic sections; under the late Professor, such of the Students as had more talent for this sort of study used to be occasionally instructed in fluxions.

Do you mean that the whole class were conducted through conic sections, or only some individuals of more talent than the rest?—They all read conic sections.

And all spherical trigonometry?—Yes; the instruction I have mentioned in fluxions was given privately by the Professor in his room.

That was given to individuals, but it was was not required from the class to learn that?—Exactly so.

Appendix, N° 9.

Examination of
Rev.

B. Crotty, D. D.
20 October 1826.

Will you state how far in algebra the whole class proceeded?—The whole class proceeded in algebra to the end of quadratic equations, and they sometimes read cubic equations; individual students in the way above stated have even gone further, but the entire class never did.

Are you speaking of the present practice in this respect?—We expect that the present Professor will continue the same plan; after the course of pure mathematics was finished, they spent the remainder of the year at natural philosophy, but the time being so short, it was impossible to go through all its branches; they read the laws of motion, mechanics, astronomy always, and generally something of either hydrostatics or optics.

What book of astronomy did they read?—They read as far as they can, for all, the Cambridge course of Vince and Wood.

Are they supplied with the works of Vince and Wood by the College?—They purchase them at their own expense.

Are they obliged to purchase them?—I got from Cambridge on one occasion fifty, and on another sixty sets of the Cambridge Course of Natural Philosophy, which were sold to the Students at the price they cost.

Are those the works that are used as text or class books analogous to the books of ethics and morals that you have been speaking of?—They are.

Is there any other text book that has been employed for astronomy or natural philosophy, except the Cambridge one of which you speak?—No; but there has always been for the use of the class of natural philosophy a collection of works, consisting of perhaps 150 to 200 volumes by different authors, kept in their hall, and given out by the Professor to such of the Students as he thought might profit by the study of them.

Which books they read in their own private apartments?—Yes.

Has the differential calculus ever become a subject of study with this class?—In the way I have already mentioned; that is, that a few of the more advanced or riper Students have been privately taught fluxions by the Professor, but not every year.

Where was the Professor himself educated?—The late Professor, the Rev. Mr. Denvir, was educated in the College of Maynooth; so was the present one also.

Have you a collection of apparatus for the exhibition of experiments in mechanics and natural philosophy?—We have.

Is it actually made use of in the lectures?—Not at this moment, because the time has not yet come.

In the course of the year is it used?—Yes, constantly; there are not only experiments in the branches mentioned, but also in chemistry, as far as the time will allow.

Exhibited by the same Professor?—Yes.

Is there any course of chemistry taught?—The Professor gave lectures on the days on which he exhibited the experiments; but the Students were not obliged to account for them afterwards.

In what manner did the Institution supply itself with this apparatus?—The Trustees purchased a considerable portion of it from a person of the name of Barclay, who formerly went through this country as a lecturer in experimental philosophy; he sold his apparatus to the College for I think 250*l*.

Was it worth much more according to the usual selling prices?—I believe it was; various articles have been added since that time at the expense of the College, and many were either originally constructed or improved by the Professor himself, who had a turn for mechanics.

Do you find that it is possible to conduct the major part of the mathematical class in the course of a year, through so extensive a course of study as that you have described?—The time is so short, that a large portion of the class cannot be expected to be very profound in this department of science, but many who have witnessed the progress they have made, at their examinations at the close of the year, have been surprized to find that one third, and often one-half of the class, have given astonishing proofs of industry and talent for those studies.

To particularize for instance, do you conceive that every individual of that third, or of that half, could solve a quadratic equation?—Certainly; the equation being given, I have no doubt but the full proportion I have mentioned could solve it; though they may not in all cases be able to put a problem involving such equation into, what I may call, algebraic language; but even that, if a fair time were given them, they would generally do.

And as to Geometry, do you mean that that third, or that that half comprehend perfectly the sixth book of Euclid?—We do not make use of Euclid as a class book; the geometry is a compendium, compiled many years ago by a French clergyman, the Abbé Darré, for the use of the College.

Is Newton's Principia, or any part of it read?—No.

But the truths which are contained in Newton's Principia, of course are comprised in the books of which you speak?—There must be a certain portion of them of course; it would be too extensive and difficult a work for our purposes.

During the time the young men are in the mathematical class, do they prosecute any other studies than those you have described?—Formerly; until within the last two years they learned French, at present they have no other literary duty to attend to but that of their own class, and the time is considered much too short even for that.

Do they demonstrate the propositions in Geometry as they proceed, according to the system you have described?—They are obliged to demonstrate every proposition they go through; through; they are not all called upon to demonstrate every proposition, it could not be done, but a certain number are called upon every day to account for the business of that day.

If at the end of the year's study a young man in this class was found not to have reached that degree of attainment which you think necessary or desirable, what course would be pursued with regard to him; would he be kept back, or would he be as in the earlier classes obliged to go away?—The study of mathematics we attend to more for its tendency to introduce correct habits of reasoning upon other subjects, than for any immediate value or necessity of mathematical knowledge to a clergyman. We consider that regularity of method, and correctness in proving other matters that may be more strictly within their province, will be gained by the study of the exact sciences; and we also consider that as clergymen cannot be constantly occupied with the more abstruse studies of their profession, a knowledge of mathematics affords them a rational mode of amusement, and of spending their time when their clerical duties will allow them to have recourse to it. If therefore a young man at the end of his course of mathematics and natural philosophy, show that he is tolerably well versed in the spirit of mathematical demonstration, the want of an extensive or profound knowledge of the subject is no bar to his advancing to his theological studies; but if he be absolutely deficient either from want of talent or want of application to the study, he is then liable to be sent away from the College, as he would be for inattention or want of talent in any other department.

Having completed the studies in this class, to what class are they next transferred?—Into the Divinity class, which consists of three years.

Does it consist of three parts also?—There is a certain course of divinity to be read in the house; and as this course consists of three years, the Students commence with whatever treatise happens to be read in the class at the time of their admission, and they continue till they finish the entire.

Does this class, comprehending three years, assemble in one body?—It does.

Of what number does it consist at this time?—The Divinity class of this year is about 170, perhaps a few more.

From whom does it receive instruction?—From the two Professors of Dogmatic and Moral Divinity, and from the Professor of Scripture.

Will you have the goodness to state how their time is apportioned to these three branches?—The Dogmatic and Moral Divinity Professors give, during alternate weeks, the morning and evening lectures. I mean that the Professor who this week lectures in the morning will next week lecture in the afternoon, an hour each.

Does each take the whole class of 170?—Yes; the Students have a certain time previous to each class, for studying the matter which has been pointed out, and explained, if necessary, by the Professor of the preceding class. They give an account of the matter of their lecture, as called on by the Professor; generally in Latin, but not unfrequently in English. They are obliged also to attend lectures on sacred Scripture twice a week, on Wednesdays and Saturdays. The lecture is for an hour, and we generally require that, in addition to their explanation of the text of Scripture, two or three of them shall on each day give a short explanation of the Epistle or Gospel of the following Sunday, which may last from a quarter of an hour to twenty-five minutes. Many of the Divinity Students from the south and west of Ireland, Munster and Connaught, and some from the other provinces, attend the Irish Professor from five till six in the evening, as it is known that without a knowledge of the Irish language, they cannot discharge the duties of Clergymen in many parts of those Provinces. The Hebrew class is open to all the Divinity Students; but as the other matter they have to study is very weighty, few attend the Hebrew class, and none are obliged to do so; besides attending the lectures above-mentioned, each of the Senior Divines in succession is obliged to preach a sermon on Sundays and holidays; the number of days not being sufficient for all, this duty seldom extends to the first year's divines.

What is the annual average number that enters into the Divinity class?—At present the number ranges between fifty and sixty.

Then does it not necessarily follow, that the whole number in the Divinity class is nearly threefold the average number that annually enters into it?—Yes, that certainly must be the case.

Suppose that in the present year, sixty new Students enter into the Divinity class, and they find themselves associated with sixty others, who have been in it a year before them, and with another set of sixty, who have been there two years before them, how can the whole 180 attend the same lectures?—The matter of the Divinity class is so arranged, that the same treatises recur every third year; it therefore makes no difference at what part of the course a Student commences his class, for he must in the course of three years go through the entire matter.

Then your answer assumes, that of the treatises of which you speak, one is not considered as leading to another?—No.

And in order to study one of them, it is not necessary to have a previous knowledge of the other as an elementary work?—No; there is no such necessary dependence of one treatise on another as that the Student may not understand, with the explanations of his Professor, any one of them without having seen the others.

Will you now be so good as to state all the treatises that are read in the three years?—I cannot from memory state them in the order in which they are read.

Is it immaterial what part of the course a divinity Student, entering into the divinity course, begins at?—Quite so.

Can you state what books the course consists of?—The course consists of ten volumes, five of dogmatic, and five of moral divinity; the dogmatic treatises are those on religion; on the church; on the trinity and incarnation; on the sacraments in general, the eucharist, and on penance: the moral volumes consist of treatises on human acts, laws and sins; a treatise on justice, restitution, and contracts; a treatise on the Decalogue, on the sacraments, &c.

Are the Students obliged to furnish themselves with all those text books?—They are, at entering the College; they are obliged to pay a certain sum for all the books that are supplied them by the College, amounting to about 4*l.* 10*s.*

Then the College furnishes to each divinity Student the whole of the works to which you have referred?—It does, at the expense of the Students.

By whom were the works you have mentioned prepared?—The five volumes of dogmatic divinity were written by Dr. Delahogue, formerly Professor in the College in that department, and for some years past made Emeritus.

How many years was Dr. Delahogue a Professor in the Institution?—He was Professor of scripture for two or three years at the commencement of the establishment, and was afterwards appointed to the chair of dogmatic divinity, which I think he held about twenty-two years.

Is he a native of Ireland?—He is a native of Paris, a doctor of the faculty of Sorbonne.

At what age did he retire from the active duties of the Professorship?—At about seventy-eight years of age.

You stated, that the five volumes you have named were written by him; had he any hand in the preparation of the other books?—I am not aware that he had.

By whom were they prepared?—They are a course of moral divinity first printed in France, and compiled by M. Bailly, a French ecclesiastic.

Are they in use at the college in Paris?—I cannot say exactly in Paris, but I believe they are rather generally read in different parts of France.

Are the works written by Dr. Delahogue original compositions of his own, or were they compiled?—They are original works. I should state, however, that there is no work yet written upon matters of that sort of which a large portion has not been taken from other previous works. A Catholic divine, who writes on matters of faith or morals, can write substantially only what has been written by hundreds before him. The arrangement and composition of his works, however, and the selection of the materials are entirely his own. They may therefore be fairly called original works. I will take the liberty of mentioning that some of those tracts of Dr. Delahogue have been reprinted in France, within the last few years for the use of seminaries, and as I understand at Frankfort in Germany.

Are the moral works you have mentioned, original works?—They are the original works of Bailly.

You are of course generally aware of the contents of Dr. Delahogue's works on Dogmatic Theology?—I have never read them entirely through, but I have occasionally read portions of each of the volumes.

So far as you are acquainted with them, do they generally inculcate the doctrine of the Sorbonne?—They do, as decidedly as if they had been written by him while Professor in Paris.

Are you aware whether, at the time when Dr. Delahogue graduated at the Sorbonne, it was necessary for him, as a graduate, to sign the celebrated declaration of the French clergy?—I believe the signing of that declaration was required of the Professors of the Sorbonne at that time.

By that declaration the French clergy recognized the Pope as the spiritual head of the Catholic church?—They did, of course; they would cease to be Catholics if they denied it.

At the same time they denied that he had any right to interfere, directly or indirectly, with the civil or temporal rights of sovereigns?—Certainly.

They also denied that it was an article of the Catholic faith that the Pope, speaking of himself and separate from a general council, was infallible?—They did.

Are those three principles, so far as you can speak to the subject, inculcated in the works of Dr. Delahogue?—I am quite sure they are.

Have they been inculcated by his successors in the chair of Dogmatic Theology at Maynooth?—Certainly.

Do you consider it their duty to inculcate them?—I do.

By the Act under which the College of Maynooth was originally established, the Professors and Students are required to take the oath of allegiance appointed for the Roman Catholics of Ireland, by the 13th and 14th of the late King?—They are.

By that oath the Roman Catholics deny that the Pope has any right to interfere, directly or indirectly, in any matter of a civil and temporal nature in the dominions of his Britannic Majesty?—They do.

They also deny that he has a right to depose his Majesty?—Certainly.

By the oath appointed for the Roman Catholics by the 33d of the late King, they declare that it is no article of the Catholic faith, neither are they thereby required to believe that the Pope is infallible?—They do.

The statutes under which the College of Maynooth is established, do not require that the Professors should take the latter oath; would there be any objection on their part to making it imperative upon the several Professors of the College of Maynooth to take the oath of 1793, which expresses the principle above stated, namely, that it is no article of the Catholic faith faith that the Pope is infallible?—There would be no objection whatever; a Catholic has no more right to make an article of faith for himself than to deny those proposed by the church. I think we do disclaim on oath the Pope's infallibility as an article of faith.

Is that oath taken in addition to the oath prescribed by the Act of the 13th and 14th of the late King?—I suppose they are both taken; I know that the oath in which we disclaim the infallibility of the Pope as an article of our faith is taken, and that we also reject on oath the deposing power.

Was there not a declaration published by the Archbishops and Bishops of the Roman Catholic church of Ireland, dated the 25th of January 1826, explanatory of the faith of Roman Catholics?—There was.

Is the paper now shown to you a correct copy of it? [a paper being handed to the witness,]—I believe it is.

Have you read that declaration?—I read it at the time it appeared.

Did you concur in the principles which it sets forth?—I did perfectly.

In that declaration is contained the following passage: "The Catholics of Ireland swear, that they will be faithful and bear true allegiance to our most gracious Sovereign Lord King George the Fourth; that they will maintain, support, and defend to the utmost of their power, the succession of the Crown in His Majesty's family against any person or persons whatsoever, utterly renouncing and abjuring any obedience or allegiance to any other person claiming or pretending a right to the crown of these realms; that they renounce, reject, and abjure the opinion, that princes excommunicated by the Pope and council, or by any authority of the See of Rome, or by any authority whatsoever, may be deposed and murdered by their subjects or by any person whatsoever; and that they do not believe that the Pope of Rome, or any other foreign prince, prelate, state, or potentate hath, or ought to have, any temporal or civil jurisdiction, power, superiority, or pre-eminence, directly or indirectly, within this realm. They further solemnly, in the presence of God, profess, testify, and declare, that they make this declaration, and every part thereof, in the plain and ordinary sense of the words of their oath, without any evasion, equivocation, or mental reservation whatsoever, and without any dispensation already granted by the Pope or any authority of the See of Rome, or any person whatever, and without thinking that they are or can be acquitted before God or man, or absolved of this declaration, or any part thereof, although the Pope, or any persons or authority whatsoever, shall dispense with or annul the same, or declare that it was null and void from the beginning;" Are the principles set forth in the passage of the declaration, which has now been read to you, so far as your knowledge goes, inculcated by the Professor of dogmatic Theology at Maynooth?—They are, most certainly.

Would you consider it your duty to censure or reprove him, if he did not maintain and inculcate those principles?—I should certainly consider it my duty to censure him, if he taught any thing contrary to those principles, and to denounce him to the Board of Trustees.

In the same declaration the following passage is contained, "The Catholics of Ireland not only do not believe, but they declare upon oath, That they detest as unchristian and impious the belief, that it is lawful to murder or destroy any person or persons whatsoever for or under the pretence of their being heretics; and also the principle, that no faith is to be kept with heretics. They further declare on oath their belief, that no act, in itself unjust, immoral or wicked, can ever be justified or excused by or under pretence or colour that it was done either for the good of the church, or in obedience to any ecclesiastical power whatsoever. That it is not an article of the Catholic faith, neither are they thereby required to believe, that the Pope is infallible; and that they do not hold themselves bound to obey any order in its own nature immoral, though the Pope or any ecclesiastical power should issue or direct such an order; but on the contrary, that it would be sinful in them to pay any respect or obedience thereto;" Is the principle contained in that passage also inculcated at Maynooth?—The doctrines referred to in the former part of that passage are so monstrous, and so contrary to every duty of a Catholic, not only as a Christian but as a man, that I never knew a Catholic who had taken the oath, who did not consider it a cruel insult to be called on to abjure such doctrines. The supposition that we consider ourselves entitled to break faith with, and even to murder any person on the ground of his dissenting from us in faith, is degrading to any individual or body to whom it is imputed; and to attempt to prove the contrary, we should consider as a sort of recognition of the justice of the imputation.

Is it inculcated that it is not an article of the Catholic faith, nor are Catholics thereby required to believe, that the Pope is infallible?—Certainly, it is expressly taught in our theological tracts.

Has not the contrary been taught by some Catholic divines?—Many have held that the Pope is infallible, but they have held it merely as a theological opinion; some have gone so far as to say, that it is not indeed an article of faith, but is nearly so; this absurd opinion, however, is evidently false, from the fact that the great body of divines, and of the Christian laity in every part of Europe deny it to be of faith, and generally reject it even as an opinion.

Has it not also been maintained by some divines of the Roman Catholic church, that the Pope had a right to interfere directly in matters of a civil and temporal nature; and has it not been taught by others, particularly by Bellarmine, that though he has not a right to interfere directly, he has a right to interfere indirectly in matters of a civil and temporal nature?—Such was and is the doctrine of Bellarmine, but the contrary opinion is held almost almost universally, even in those countries that are most inclined to favour the Pope's pretensions, with the exception perhaps of his own immediate States.

Do you consider that it is willingly, and ex corde, renounced and disclaimed by the Roman Catholic church in Ireland?—Most undoubtedly.

And with it the assumed right of the Pope to depose Sovereigns as belonging to him de jure Divino?—We swear that such are our tenets; we can give no stronger proof before God or man of our renouncing such doctrines.

Is it an opinion of the Roman Catholic church, that if the Pope expresses his opinion and his decision upon a matter of faith, and that is not afterwards dissented from by a majority of the Roman Catholic bishops, that then in that particular the doctrine of the Pope is infallible?—It is the opinion of Catholic divines, that if the Pope issue a decree appertaining to Catholic faith, which decree is received by the whole church, that it then has the same force as if it proceeded from a General Council; not precisely because it is a decree of the Pope, but because it has the sanction of the whole church including the Pope.

That is, that it is infallibly true?—Certainly.

What is the test of its being received by the Catholic church?—The test of its being received by the Catholic church is the Bishops of the Catholic church having given their assent to the decision of the Pope.

Is it not equally assumed as a proof of its being received, if they do not express their dissent?—It is, provided that the fact of such doctrine having been proposed by the Pope can be sufficiently known without any acknowledgment on the part of the Bishops; but I should consider that a mere tacit assent can hardly be supposed to be given in such cases, if it be a matter regarding the faith of Catholics; to be binding on them, as an article of faith, it must be proposed to them by the church. They must therefore know the fact, that the Bishops have received such decree, and that they acquiesce in it, which they cannot well know if the Bishops are totally silent.

Is it not a principle of the Roman Catholic religion, or of the Roman Catholic discipline, that every Bishop not expressing his dissent from a decision of the Pope, is assumed to assent to it?—It is, nor do I require the expression of their assent as necessary for giving to the decree the force of an infallible doctrinal decision; but merely that the faithful may know the fact, that such a decree has been duly promulgated. The assent of the majority of Catholic Bishops is, I believe, de facto expressed in most cases.

You conceive then, that the actual expression of assent upon the part of a majority of the Roman Catholic Bishops, is necessary to give to the Pope's decision the authority of a General Council?—I should think that it is, or rather may be, in certain cases, in the sense already mentioned, that is, not to give validity to the decree but to make it formally binding on the faithful as an article of Catholic faith. If they can by other means ascertain the fact of the decree having been issued, and even tacitly received by the Bishops, they are bound to receive it as a decree of the whole church.

Are you aware, whether a difference of opinion upon that point exists among Roman Catholic divines?—It is a principle among Roman Catholic divines, that the church can neither sanction by its positive approbation, nor even by its silence, error against faith.

What is to determine whether it is error against faith, or not?—The acceptance (even tacit) or opposition of the church. If the Bishops adopt it, even tacitly, it is of faith; if they oppose it, it is no article of faith.

If the present, or any future Pope, were to think proper to disapprove of the present oath of allegiance, of which you have been speaking, would you, as a Roman Catholic, feel at liberty to take that oath afterwards?—I would feel perfectly at liberty to take it, because I know that the principles of the oath are already recognised as true by the Catholic church.

Have you ever understood, whether when the terms of that oath were under consideration by the Legislature, there was, in point of fact, a good deal of negotiation between the Irish Catholic bishops and the Pope, as to whether they might take it or not?—I have heard there were consultations with Rome on the propriety, or on the licitness of taking the oath.

Have you heard further, that it was after some difficulty on the part of the Court of Rome, that the assent was given?—I do not doubt that there might have been difficulties raised by the Court of Rome; nor am I perfectly aware whether the oath of allegiance, as taken by the Catholics of Ireland, is, or is not, expressly sanctioned by the Court of Rome; but I do not conceive such sanction necessary for the reason I before mentioned, that the doctrines disclaimed in that oath, are disclaimed in general by the Catholic church. If the Court of Rome acknowledge even with some difficulty, that the oath might be taken, it is an evident proof that it was not considered in any way contrary to faith.

Supposing that the Pope should have an objection to that oath, not on account of the disclaimer of those doctrines, but for some other reason undefined by him, would you, after an expression of his disapprobation of your taking the oath, feel at liberty nevertheless to take it?—Perfectly so; not on my own judgment merely, but on the well-known and express sanction of a great, probably the greater portion of the Catholic church.

Do you conceive that to be the opinion of the majority of the Irish Roman Catholic Bishops at present?—Undoubtedly so, though the Pope should even say what I think it certain he never will, that they ought not to take it, because I conceive myself warranted by the authority of the church to take the oath in the plain and obvious meaning, as it is now taken. If the Pope were to object to its being taken for some reason undefined by him, him, I should suppose that he gave it a meaning different from that in which it is proposed and taken, and which consequently I would not be bound to attend to.

What do you mean by the authority of the church?—The authority of the church dispersed through Europe; as long as the church is evidently divided on any point of belief every Catholic may safely take either side: the thing is not defined, and is consequently matter of free discussion.

Reference has been made in a preceding question, to the Gallican liberties, and you have stated the assent that is given to them in the College of Maynooth by the Professors?—As far as they relate to the points contained in the oaths taken by Catholics, the propositions contain other matter with which as Catholics we are not concerned.

Do you consider that the three first articles are ex-animo and ex-corde assented to at Maynooth?—Yes, and the fourth too, in the sense already mentioned; there is in the second a question implied on the superiority of a council over the Pope, on which, as well as on the privileges or liberties of the Gallican church, we hold no decided opinion.

By all the Professors?—By all the Professors, and by the Students who have read upon the subject.

Do you conceive that the same is the feeling of the Irish Roman Catholic Bishops?—I do, certainly.

In a pamphlet published by the late Dr. Milner, in the year 1809, there is the following passage: "The Ex-curé Blanchard insists, in the strongest terms, on revolutionizing our English theology, no less than our church government, by obliging us to adopt the four French articles, though there is not a single prelate in England or Ireland who is not firmly resolved to the contrary. We are very far from finding fault with the partisans of these articles; still we think we see in them the germ of all the present mischief; and, to be brief, we are determined neither to have Blanchard for our theologian, nor to subscribe to the articles;" are the Commissioners to collect from you, that you are quite clear that Dr. Milner was mistaken in that opinion which he expresses of the sentiments of the Irish Bishops?—I do believe that Dr. Milner might have an objection, and a reasonable one, to subscribe to the articles, if by so subscribing he were to pledge himself to the truth or propriety of every thing contained in them; but I believe he could have no objection, or ought to have none, to Catholics subscribing to them as far as they contain the contradiction of those doctrines which the government of this country considers obnoxious, and requires its Catholic subjects to disclaim.

The question is, not as to what passed in Dr. Milner's mind, but whether he was right in his assumption of the fact, that it was the unanimous opinion of the Irish Roman Catholic Bishops not to subscribe to those articles?—I have not seen Dr. Milner's pamphlet; I believe that Dr. Milner did not know the sentiments of the Irish Bishops on the subject, if he thought that our Bishops would refuse to subscribe them in the way I have mentioned.

And that you do?—Yes, I think I do from their own declarations.

And you think that they are prepared to subscribe to those articles?—As far as is necessary; they are not obliged nor called on to decide what may be the extent of French liberties, nor to settle the question whether the Pope is above or subject to a general council; as Catholics, we are only bound to hold that the church, comprising both Pope and Bishops, is the body to which the promises of Christ were made.

You mean, that they are prepared to subscribe to the principle of the articles, as to the deposing power and infallibility of the Pope, and as to his right to interfere directly or indirectly in matters of a civil or temporal nature?—Exactly.

You were educated in the university of Lisbon?—There was no university; I was educated in the Irish college at Lisbon.

Will you state what was the view that was taken of the Gallican articles in that college?—Our course of Theology was one compiled by a French clergyman (Collet) who held the same principles that are now held in the College of Maynooth, and consequently in substance as above mentioned, the articles of the French declaration; we studied that treatise, and held those principles as our decided opinion.

Then the sense of the College of Lisbon was decidedly against the Ultra-Montane opinions?—It was.

Have you any means to know what were the sentiments of the university of Coimbra upon this subject?—The university of Coimbra, as far as I could ascertain, were hostile to the pretensions of the Pope, as far as they regard the temporal rights of Kings. They held the same doctrine in his infallibility generally that is held in France and in Maynooth; that is, the greater part denied that he was infallible, and all agreed that it was no article of faith that he was.

Do you know what was the state of opinion at Salamanca upon that subject?—As far as I have been able to learn from those that were there, for I never was myself, it was the same in the Irish college at Salamanca.

You have taken a distinction between the authority of the Pope in temporal and in spiritual matters; can you define wherein you conceive precisely the distinction lies between them?—I am not aware of having yet made any distinction between the temporal and spiritual powers of the Pope. I mentioned his interference in temporal matters and disclaimed his right to interfere.

The question is, what is meant by temporal matters precisely, as contradistinguished from spiritual matters?—Spiritual matters are those that appertain to faith and morals, to preaching the word of God, to the administration of the sacraments, &c. Temporal matters, I conceive to include all the rights and prerogatives either of the King, or of whatever civil government may be established in any country, and I hold that the Pope has nothing to do in the management of such matters. That every prince and every government is competent, and exclusively competent to govern and direct the civil affairs of their subjects.

Do you conceive that the rights flowing out of the relation of marriage are of a temporal or of a spiritual nature?—I conceive that both are often included in questions regarding marriage, both temporal and spiritual considerations.

Do you conceive that there is no such thing as confounding the two together; or in other words, do you conceive it perfectly easy to draw a line, marking out wherein the distinction consists?—The line of distinction in some cases may not be so easily traced, but I hold that in all cases the civil effects of the contract of marriage are to be regulated by the laws of the State, though in some cases a marriage quoad vinculum, may in the eyes of the church be invalid, that will not affect the civil rights of either party.

Suppose the case of a marriage being dissolved by Act of Parliament, and the parties divorced marrying again with other persons, and having issue, do you consider that issue legitimate or illegitimate?—If the question regards parties both of whom are Protestants, I of course consider that I have no right to interfere either as to the spiritual or temporal effects of the relation of marriage. If both parties or either party be Roman Catholic, I would consider that such a marriage having been ab initio a good and valid one, if dissolved by Parliament, is dissolved as to the civil effects, but not as to the vinculum, or bond of marriage, and that whatever the law may ordain regarding the disposal of property depending on such a case, it is my business and my duty to abide by the decision of the law, though I may consider the divorce so given as not valid coram Deo.

Would these views in the case put, induce you to recognize the issue as legitimate?—I should recognise the issue as legitimate, as far as civil effects are concerned.

What are the spiritual consequences attendant on the illegitimacy which you would in the case put, consider as still attaching to the issue of the second marriage?—The children of such a marriage being considered illegitimate by the Catholic church, would be irregular; that is, not allowed to receive holy orders, if they were Catholics. I should consider the issue however, in conscience, warranted to inherit and hold whatever property the law awards to them, as the issue of such second marriage, though I should consider the parents not to have been in the eyes of the church warranted to enter into such marriage, they, or either of them being Catholics.

Would there be any impediment in the way of your baptizing the issue of such second marriage?—We can never refuse to baptize the issue of any marriage, even of persons who are notoriously not married, either legally or ecclesiastically.

Would you feel at liberty to celebrate such second marriage at the desire of the parties?—No.

Could the issue of the marriage in the case just put, be received into orders as a priest in the Roman Catholic church?—He could not agreeably to the laws of the Roman Catholic church.

Do you happen to be acquainted with the opinions expressed by a late very eminent prelate of the Established church, Doctor Horsley the Bishop of St. Asaph, as to a marriage entered into with a woman who is divorced from her husband by Act of Parliament, on account of adultery in that woman?—I cannot say that I know the particular opinion of Doctor Horsley; but I believe that the Established church never grants such divorce, and that they consequently apprehend that though such divorce may be legally granted, the church, for motives which it must itself know, refuses to interfere in the dissolution of such marriage.

Are you aware that Doctor Horsley distinctly maintained in his place in Parliament, that a woman so married was married contrary to the law of God, as expressly declared by our Saviour, and that he would hold and consider the parties co-habiting under such marriage as living in a state of adultery; and maintained that that was the law and doctrines of the Church of England?—I do not recollect to have seen Doctor Horsley's declaration on the subject.

Are there not temporal and civil consequences of considerable importance, that attach practically to the sentence of the greater excommunication?—There are.

Will you enumerate them?—I believe they are nearly the same, though perhaps legally considered, not so serious in the Catholic as in the Protestant church. The direct effect of excommunication we consider to be a deprivation on the part of the person excommunicated, of the spiritual advantages accruing to him as a member of the Catholic church, of which by excommunication he ceases to be a member; he is likewise deprived in many cases of communication in civil matters with the faithful; but these effects as to civil matters are not in many cases incurred.

Is it not a practical consequence that such a person, if a shopkeeper, loses all his Roman Catholic customers?—This would be equally the case in either communion, whenever sentence of excommunication is pronounced.

That is a consequence however in the Roman Catholic communion, is it not?—It might be; and I believe, sometimes is the consequence.

Are not the consequences summed up in the class books of Maynooth, in this line, os. orare. vale. communicio. mensa?—Yes; these are the various ways in which a man may hold communion with a person excommunicated; and thereby incur an excommunicatio minor, himself.

Will you describe the consequence that is there intended by the word "os"?—"os" means conversation; that it is not allowed us to hold oral communication with such persons.

What

What are the consequences intended by the second word, "orare"?—That it is unlawful to join him in the participation of the sacraments; or in public or private prayer.

What are the consequences alluded to by the word "Vale"?—It means that we are prohibited from saluting such persons.

What is meant by "communio"?—It implies a prohibition of civil intercourse, such as buying and selling, or entering into other contracts without necessity.

What is meant by the word, "mensâ"?—That it is not lawful to eat with him, or to board with him.

Is there any authority in the Pope to inflict the sentence of excommunication in Ireland?—Catholics do recognise such an authority in the Pope and in Bishops; but I believe, there is no instance of its being inflicted on any individual in Ireland; at least I do not recollect an instance of it.

You mean by the Pope?—By the Pope.

Will you define the words, "fidelis," and "infidelis," as they are used in the Theological text Books of Maynooth?—The word "fidelis," is generally amongst us, synonymous with Catholic.

What is meant by "infidelis"?—"Infidelis," strictly speaking, is a Pagan; a person that has never been baptized.

Are the Commissioners to understand then, that "infidelis," is not the contrary of "fidelis"?—Not exactly the contrary.

Does "infidelis," include the Christian Dissenters from the church of Rome?—No, it does not; we distinguish those persons who are not Catholics, into Infidels or Pagans, Mahometans, Jews, and Heretics, or those who dissent from the Catholic church on certain particular points of doctrine.

You stated, that you believed the doctrine of the Roman Catholic church with respect to excommunication, agreed with that of the Established church; have the goodness to attend to the doctrine of the Established church, as it is now read to you from Burn's Ecclesiastical Law; "Excommunication is an ecclesiastical censure, whereby the person against whom it is pronounced, is for the time cast out of the communion of the church; and it is of two kinds, the lesser and the greater. The lesser excommunication is the depriving the offender of the use of the sacraments and divine worship, and this sentence is passed by judges ecclesiastical, on such persons as are guilty of obstinacy or disobedience, in not appearing upon a citation, or not submitting to penance or other injunctions of the court. The greater excommunication is that, whereby men are deprived not only of the sacraments and the benefit of divine offices, but of the society and conversation of the faithful;" do you conceive that the doctrine of the Established church, so far as it is now read to you from this work, is substantially the same as that of the Roman Catholic church?—I think it is, evidently.

In the same work it is further stated, "By a constitution of Archbishop Stratford, Excommunicate persons shall be inhibited the commerce and communion of the faithful; and they who communicate with them shall be punished by ecclesiastical censure;" and the comment upon the word commerce is, "That is, buying or selling, or other interchange of wares or merchandize;" do you conceive that the doctrine of the Roman Catholic church also agrees with that of the Established church in the last part, as to those civil effects?—I believe it does.

Is there any qualification of the rule, that is, are there any cases in which it may be lawful for a person to deal or hold communication with an excommunicated person?—There are many; for instance, persons who by the situation they hold are dependent on others, are not obliged to forego rendering to the persons excommunicated the services which they were previously bound to do them; thus a wife is not bound to abstain from conversation and intercourse with her husband, or a servant with his master, when it is done with a view to reclaim the person excommunicated, or when the interests of the other party require it; thus it is lawful to consult a lawyer or physician, though excommunicated. There are other cases mentioned in every Catholic work on the subject, but which do not occur to me at this moment.

Is a subject released from his duties to his sovereign?—If a servant with regard to a master be an exception, a subject with regard to his sovereign must be, a fortiori.

In the Thirty-third Article of the Church of England, excommunication is thus referred to:—"That person which by open denunciation of the church, is rightly cut off from the unity of the church, and excommunicated, ought to be taken of the whole multitude of the faithful, as an heathen and publican until he be openly reconciled by penance, and received into the church by a judge that hath authority thereunto;" is that the doctrine do you conceive also of the Roman Catholic church?—I believe in substance it is the same, and I recollect to have read some time ago the canons and constitutions of the Established church, and I think that by them excommunication is inflicted ipso facto in a great variety of cases there mentioned. I believe from the first of the constitutions up to the twelfth or thirteenth, there are excommunications denounced ipso facto against a variety of persons, such as those who deny the supremacy of the King, those who have the hardihood to assert that there is any thing erroneous or superstitious in the Thirty-nine Articles, or in the public worship received by the Established church, and in many other cases which will be found in the canons referred to.

Then both the Established church and the Roman Catholic church, as churches, and speaking as spiritual corporations only, and explaining the powers committed to them respectively by God, exclude persons excommunicated, from all intercourse with the faithful without having regard either of them to the civil consequences that ensue? They do; and I believe that both churches consider excommunication as a medicinal penance imposed on the person excommunicated, for the purpose of reclaiming him to a sense of his duty, because in every case where satisfaction is given by such person, the excommunication is immediately removed, and the person restored to the communion of the faithful.

Is the punishment of excommunication frequently inflicted in this country?—Very rarely I believe, and only for very grievous and scandalous crimes.

By whom can it be inflicted?—By a Bishop only, or a person authorised by a Bishop, for that particular purpose.

Is it in the nature of a judicial sentence?—It is always in the nature of a judicial sentence, and must be preceded by three admonitions to the person concerned, before the sentence can be inflicted.

It may be declared generally, that a person doing a particular act, will incur the punishment of excommunication, but must there not be afterwards a declaratory sentence that the particular individual has incurred it, in order to fix the consequences of excommunication as relating to the world, upon him?—Such is the case when it is sententiæ ferendæ, but where the words ipso facto, or words tantamount are mentioned, the sentence is incurred without any new declaration. The prohibition against speaking to such persons, however, regards only those that are vitandi, or nominatim denunciati.

Do you recollect any particular instance of the sentence of excommunication being pronounced?—I recollect a general one of the nature just now mentioned, that is, where the sentence was generally inflicted, and ipso facto incurred, after the expiration of a certain period by the persons whom it regarded, and that was by Doctor Troy, the late Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, against the persons called the United Irishmen.

Did Doctor Troy excommunicate the United Irishmen?—I understand he did, unless they returned to their duty within a certain period.

Do you understand that all churches claim the power of excommunication as derived from Almighty God, and not from any civil authority?—I believe they do.

Has any class of Roman Catholic divines maintained that the Pope was infallible, otherwise than when he was declaring ex cathedra, certain matters as matters of faith credenda ac tenenda?—I never heard of a Roman Catholic who asserted that he was infallible in any other circumstances.

Does that mean when the Pope is propounding certain matters as constituting part of the necessary creed of a Christian?—Or things appertaining to principles of Christian morality.

Has any class of divines in the Roman Catholic church ever maintained, that the Pope could not err in matters relating to temporal concerns?—No class; nor any individual divine that ever I heard of; all Catholics hold the church to be infallible, but they do not extend this infallibility to temporal matters or matters of fact.

Or in making laws which partake of a political nature or tendency, such as the means by which what is considered heresy in the Roman Catholic church should be resisted, as by temporal punishments and so forth?—The Pope, and even General Councils, are held by Catholics not to be infallible in such matters, they are matters of prudence, where faith is not concerned, and in such they may go wrong.

Is a Roman Catholic bound to consider as matter of faith any decree of a general council with the Pope at its head, which decree does not propound a certain article as matter of faith credenda ac tenenda?—No.

If the Pope and the general council were to make a law directing that a sovereign should be deposed, would Roman Catholics be bound to consider it as a matter of faith that he had a right so to do?—They would not.

You are aware of the objections which have occasionally been made to the principles of Roman Catholics in consequence of the Acts of the Third and Fourth Councils of Lateran?—I am.

By those councils it was enacted to the effect, that sovereigns who protected the persons who maintained the heresies mentioned in those councils, should be deposed; are the acts of those councils by which those sovereigns were deposed, considered by you or by the Professors of Maynooth, merely as laws applied to the particular circumstances of the moment, or are they considered as decrees of faith?—Many writers, and amongst them some Protestant writers, such as Collier, deny altogether the authenticity of the canon that is supposed generally to have been made by the Fourth Council of Lateran on this head; but supposing the canon to be genuine, Catholics hold that it is not to be attributed to the council as merely an ecclesiastical assembly, but as one composed of the representatives of the different Catholic sovereigns of Europe at that time, and that the canon was a mere political enactment for the suppression of heresies, the leading doctrines of which were considered incompatible with the peace of those countries, and with the rights of the sovereigns. Catholic divines therefore generally hold that no point of doctrine was proposed by the said canon as a matter of faith to be believed by Catholics at large, but that it was a practical measure adopted by the concurrent approbation of Church and State; and intended to effect purposes connected with the peace and tranquillity of both. Neither therefore the College of Maynooth, nor any Catholic divine with whose works I am acquainted, ever considered it as a matter of belief that Catholics are bound by the said canon, to acknowledge in the Pope or in a general council the deposing power.

THE Fourth Council of Lateran is understood to have decreed this canon: "*Si Dominus temporalis requisitus et monitus ab Ecclesia, terram suam purgare neglexerit ab hæretica fæditate, per Metropolitanos et cæteros provinciales Episcopos vinculo excommunicationis innodetur; et si satisfacere contempserit infra annum, significetur hoc S. Pontifici, ut extunc ipse vassallos ab ejus fidelitate denunciaret absolutos, et terram exponat Catholicis occupandam, qui eam hæreticis exterminatis (id est ex vi vocis expulsis) sine ulla contradictione possideant, salvo jure Domini principalis, dummodo super hoc ipse nullum præstet obstaculum, eâdem nihilominus lege servatâ circa eos qui non habent Dominos principales;*" Do you consider that canon to be a canon of universal and permanent force in the Roman Catholic church?—I do not; that was the canon to which I alluded in my answer to the last question proposed to me yesterday, and I consider it to express the practical means which a council, as I said before, composed both of the temporal and ecclesiastical authorities, thought it necessary to adopt for the suppression of a sect whose tenets and practice were not only anti-catholic, but anti-christian, and ruinous to the countries in which they appeared, and not as a declaration of the Church, proposing to us an article of its belief. I beg leave to add, that the Church, as far as I have been able to ascertain, never at any period considered it in this latter point of view; that is, as composing an article of faith. No such tenet has ever been introduced into any profession of Catholic faith.

In the tract De Ecclesia, which you presented to the Commissioners yesterday, as one of the class books used in the course of Dogmatic Theology at Maynooth, there is this passage: "Circa decreta Conciliorum generalium de fide; Argumentum istud exordiemur his Bossuetii verbis: Non docent Catholici, quæcumque gesta sunt in Conciliis, ea ad Ecclesiæ fidem pertinere; sed eo loco habenda sunt tantum illa quæ decreto edito, fidelibus omnibus credenda ac tenenda proponuntur. Quod et Melchior Canus passim docet, et Catholici omnes uno ore fatentur. Cujus rei ratio est, quod id sufficiat ut verba Christi firma sint de æterna ecclesiasticorum dogmatum firmitate. Nec proinde labat fides, si quæ extra fidem haud pari autoritate consistunt. Atque certum omnino est, multa in Conciliis, sine expressa deliberatione ac determinatione, esse dicta, gestaque, quibus adstringi se Catholici omnes uno ore negant. Multa etiam sunt decreta, quæ non pertinent ad invariabilem fidei regulam, sed sunt accommodata temporibus atque negotiis." Do you agree in the explanation of the rule with respect to the decrees of General Councils of Faith there laid down?—Decidedly.

You will observe the latter words of the rule: "Multa etiam sunt decreta, quæ non pertinent ad invariabilem fidei regulam, sed sunt accommodata temporibus atque negotiis." Are the Commissioners to understand from your former answer, that the canon of the Council of Lateran, which has been cited to you, is a canon of the latter description, "accommodata temporibus atque negotiis?"—Yes.

Are the Commissioners to understand from you, that it was a canon which derived authority, as an English Act of Parliament does, from the estates spiritual and temporal in that council assembled, as to its civil effects?—Unquestionably it derived its authority from the whole council; for though we do not acknowledge that a temporal power has any right to pronounce upon matters strictly of faith, still we acknowledge that in a council composed of the bishops of the Roman Catholic church, and of the princes of Europe, whether actually present in the council, or represented by their procurators, the latter had a right to interfere in such matters as the preceding questions relate to.

Is it understood that the temporal powers of Christendom, or any of them, were represented in that council, as well as the ecclesiastical?—It is well known, from the history of the times, that they were.

In the continuation of Fleury's Ecclesiastical History, the Commissioners understand it is stated, that there were present at the fourth General Council of Lateran, either in person or by their ambassadors, the two Emperors of the East and the West, the Kings of England, France, Hungary, Arragon, Sicily, Jerusalem, Cyprus, with a great number of inferior potentates; do you understand that to be the case?—I do.

Did the Council of Lateran make any decrees as to articles of faith?—To the best of my recollection, they did. I do not remember the precise import of them all, but some were condemnatory of the doctrines of the Albigenses and Valdenses, to whom the canon so often alluded, had reference. Others related to an expedition to the Holy Land, and many regarded the reformation of morals and discipline among the clergy and laity.

When the Council of Lateran sat for the purpose of making decrees with respect to articles of faith, is it understood that the temporal powers were represented in the council?—The temporal powers were, even then, represented in the council; but in the Catholic church they never interfere, when there is a question of faith, unless through those divines whom the different powers send to the council, and who have the right of speaking and explaining, but not of voting, when a decision on faith is to be given. This is exclusively the right of Bishops.

Supposing that part of the canon which has been alluded to in your former answer, to have been, as has been expressed, merely "accommodata temporibus atque negotiis;" did it not, however, express a principle then adopted by the Roman Catholic church?—When a council, or any other body, adopt a certain proceeding, we may presume they conceive they have a right to do so. In this sense it may be said, that the words mentioned express by implication a principle which seemed to be practically adopted by the persons then sitting in the council, but not one that they proposed to the Catholic church to be believed, in the manner in which the decrees of councils regarding faith are and should be proposed.

Was not the Roman Catholic church represented fully in that council?—Certainly*.

Did not that council adopt that principle, at least for that time?—In practice it did.

Did it not acknowledge the principle by its practice?—Merely acknowledging a principle by acting on it, is not sufficient to make it an article of Catholic faith. It must be proposed by the council to the church, dispersed as an article of faith, and necessarily to be believed by all Catholic Christians.

The present question is, whether the principle was not admitted and adopted by that council for some purposes?—In practice it would seem to have been the case; but all Catholics contend, that such an inference drawn from the acts of a council does not imply such a decision on matters of faith, as binds Catholics to hold the principle which might appear to be thus deducible from the conduct of the council.

Did not the same principle afterwards prove itself to be applicable to other times, and other matters, than those to which that council applied it; or in other words, was not the same principle subsequently acted upon by Popes with respect to other cases, and other heretics than those who were then the subjects of consideration?—The same principle might have been acted on, and I believe was, by subsequent Popes and Councils, not in virtue of their conceiving the thing as having been decided, as matter of faith, by the Council of Lateran, but because from similar motives they thought, perhaps erroneously, that the same practice was lawful for them, which they had seen acted on by their predecessors.

Were there not instances in which Popes subsequently acted on the same principle, without the authority of any subsequent general council?—We have, I think, an instance in the case of Pius the 5th and Queen Elizabeth of England, which may be considered similar to that of the Council of Lateran, with this difference, that in the former case it was a council, and in the second an individual Pope; we know, however, from the conduct of the Roman Catholics of England at the time, that they did not consider the Pope to possess any right or power of absolving them from the oath of fidelity they had sworn to their sovereign.

You are well acquainted of course with the ancient history of Ireland; do you conceive that the Irish Roman Catholics of that period considered that bull of the Pope as of no authority?—I do not pretend to say that there might not have been among the Irish Catholics of that day some who considered the Pope to have the right alluded to; but I believe that in their conduct towards the sovereign, and the government of England, they were more influenced by the state of their country, and the manner in which it was governed at the time, than by any decision of the Pope.

It has been seen that some Popes have exercised this power, or have attempted to exercise it; are you aware of any Pope who has ever expressly renounced it, or has declared that he considered himself as not possessing it?—Popes like other sovereigns, are generally unwilling to forego any prerogative which they have once got possession of, by just or unjust means. I am not aware that any express declaration has ever been issued by any Pope on the subject, with the exception just mentioned; but I think it matters little, whether the Pope considers himself still as possessing the temporal power alluded to, as long as the Catholic church refuses to acknowledge such power in him. Immediately after the council, the orators of the King of France told Innocent III. who presided at it, that the King acknowledged no right in the Pope to interfere in the temporalities of his kingdom; and the English Barons, in the time of Boniface the VIII. in the most decided and unqualified terms, disclaimed the Pope's temporal power. There is not at present a Catholic prince or people in Europe who acknowledge it†.

Has any general council ever expressed any opinion as to whether he possessed that power or not?—I do not recollect any decision on it by any general council.

Have any writers of acknowledged eminence, in the Roman Catholic church, maintained that he did possess the power?—Bellarmine has held that he possessed the power indirectly; other divines too have supported the same opinion.

Was that assertion of Bellarmine's ever distinguished by any mark of the approbation of the Pope?—I think it very likely that the Pope, who lived at the time, was satisfied with Bellarmine's doctrine, at least thought that he had not gone too far in the degree of power he gave the Pope.

Has

* And so was the temporal power too. The principle to which the questions asked have reference, seems to me to be this—a general assembly representing the different Christian nations of Europe, both in spirituals and temporals, can authorize the Pope to punish Heretics and their favorers. If the principle were true, it would follow that the power of the Pope in temporals would be a power delegated to him by the universal consent of the nations of Europe, not an appendage of his office as Pope.

† Innocent III. the very Pope who presided at the fourth council of Lateran, seems to have unequivocally disclaimed any right to interfere in temporal matters, unless when called on to act as an arbitrator by princes themselves. His words are these "Rex superiorem in temporalibus minime recognoscit-nec alieno Juri præjudicare volumus vel potestatem nobis indebitam usurpare."

B. Crotty, D.D.

Has not the doctrine of Bellarmine been maintained by the whole of what is called the Ultra Montane School of Divinity?—By the Ultra-Montane School of Divinity we generally understand those who hold the opinions of Bellarmine; the denomination is taken, not so much from the countries in which that doctrine is held, as from the doctrine itself. Many, I believe, of those who are called Ultramontanists do not hold the temporal power, though they teach the infallibility of the Pope, and his superiority over a general council. Even this is held as a mere opinion.

Has not that doctrine been maintained by very many writers among the Jesuits?—I do not think that many writers of the Society of Jesuits have treated the question of the Pope's temporal power. When the declaration of the clergy of France appeared, there was I believe only one Jesuit that wrote against it; nor can I say that he objected to it on the ground of its rejecting the temporal power.

Have not many Jesuits expressly maintained that doctrine in their writings?—I believe some have. They must be very few; for there is an express prohibition in their constitutions against their writing on the subject, or teaching the doctrine in their schools.

Can you name any writer among the Jesuits who has denied it?—As the prohibition I have just mentioned has been in force for two centuries, it will not be easy, I presume, to find any Jesuit who in that time has treated the question. The idea of their being such sticklers for the temporal power is, I believe, like many other things said of them, altogether unfounded.

You mentioned that some decrees of councils were of a temporary, and others of a perpetual nature; by what criterion are the members of the Roman Catholic church enabled to decide, whether a particular decree of council is of a temporary or of a perpetual kind?—From the object for which the council is assembled. From the nature of the matter to which the decrees of the council refer, and from the manner in which the decrees are worded.

Is there any particular formula in which a decree that is intended to be of perpetual obligation, is couched?—The general form in which decrees regarding Catholic faith are proposed, is that followed in the canons of the councils where the doctrine proposed is ordered to be believed by all Catholics, under anathema. Catholic doctrine however is sometimes expressed in the chapters, but some clause is always added by which it is clearly proposed to Catholics as an article of their faith.

According to your knowledge and experience of Maynooth, has the Trans-Alpine doctrine, as contradistinguished from the Cis-Alpine doctrine, been ever maintained or inculcated there?—It never has.

May canons of the Roman Catholic church, which do not regard faith or morals, but which impose punishment for particular offences become by desuetude of no force, in like manner as if they were expressly repealed?—Certainly, like all other human laws they may go into desuetude when a series of occasions has occurred for putting them in execution, on which they were not enforced. The canon of the Council of Lateran so often alluded to could have no force, but from the recognition of it by the states of Europe; their sanction having long since been withdrawn, the canon is at present a dead letter.

You have been asked, whether any Pope had ever given up the power of absolving subjects from their Oath of Allegiance; is there, according to your knowledge, any Catholic state of Europe on this side the Alps, which has not made laws distinctly against that power?—I believe there is none, as it is a general practice, as far as my knowledge goes in Catholic states, to prohibit the publication of any rescript from the Pope, and in some countries though these rescripts should contain matters appertaining to faith, until the temporal power shall have first been satisfied that there is nothing in such rescripts derogatory of the rights of the sovereign. Such is the practice as I have been informed, in France and Spain, and I know it to be the case in Portugal by my own experience.

Are you aware that in the last century lessons were published to be used on the day of Saint Gregory the seventh, in which it was recited as a merit in him that he had deposed Henry the Fourth?—I am.

Are you aware whether any proceedings were had in France, or in any other Catholic state, for the purpose of having that passage expunged from the breviary as striking at the civil independence of sovereigns?—I believe that in France the office of Gregory the seventh was never received; and I know that in Ireland the lessons mentioned in the question, have been changed by leaving out the obnoxious passages referred to. I have even known some Irish Priests to have been so dissatisfied with those lessons, as they are read in the office in some foreign countries, as to have a scruple about the propriety of reading them.

Are you aware that in Naples the principal ecclesiastic was compelled to attend before the Vice-roy and to strike that passage out?—I think I remember to have heard that such a proceeding took place, though I cannot distinctly recollect the circumstance.

Are you aware that towards the latter end of the last century, a rescript issued from Rome to the Prince of Parma, or the Church of Parma, in which the principle of the right of the Pope to interfere in matters of a civil or temporal nature, was understood to be asserted; and that in consequence of that, in France, in Spain, in Portugal and throughout Germany, rigorous edicts were issued to prevent any person from publishing that rescript, and at the same time condemning in positive terms the principle asserted in it?—I have never seen the rescript, and consequently am ignorant of the particulars of its contents; but I have seen and read documents emanating from the Portuguese and Spanish governments, mentioning the rescript and condemning the principle mentioned in the question.

Rev.

B. Crotty, D. D.
21 October 1826.

You have spoken of an office having been put into the breviary that gave offence to the court of France; who put it into the breviary?—The Pope.

About what period?—I think it was about the beginning of the 17th century, during the pontificate of Paul the Vth.

Are the Commissioners to understand that all the offices in the breviary have been put in by the Pope, at some time or other?—They have been either put into the Roman breviary by the Pope, or sanctioned by his authority*.

Does the office referred to still continue in the Roman breviary?—It still continues in some editions of the Roman breviary printed on the Continent, but the obnoxious passages of the lessons do not exist in the Roman breviary printed in Ireland.

Does it exist in the breviary used in Rome?—I believe it does.

You stated that you were yourself chief of the Irish College at Lisbon?—I was Professor in it for ten years, and Rector for nearly ten years more.

Can you speak, in any degree of your own knowledge, as to the practice in Portugal with respect to what is called the regium exequatur, with respect to bulls or rescripts from Rome?—The only instance, within my own experience, regarded cases of dispensations in marriage. I had once or twice occasion to write to Rome for a dispensation in cases within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity, and was obliged to apply for the dispensation through a tribunal established by the Portuguese government for that purpose; through the same I received the answer to the application. This was done for the purpose of letting the government see that there was nothing, either in the application or in the answer, which they could consider contrary to the law of the land, or the rights of the sovereign.

The principle laid down in the 4th council of Lateran, to which your attention has already been called, appears also to be laid down in some degree in the 3d council of Lateran, and also in the council of Constance, does what you have said, with respect to that principle laid down in the 4th council of Lateran not being obligatory upon Roman Catholics, apply equally to the same principle as laid down in other councils?—It applies of course, if the matter and mode of acting on the part of the council be the same as that in the 4th council of Lateran, equally to all other councils.

The words of the 3d council of Lateran, as given in the Tract de Ecclesia, are these, "Inter pœnas contra Hæreticos Albigenses latas, hæc legitur: Illorum subditi et Vassalli relaxatos se noverint a debito fidelitatis hominii, et totius obsequii, donec in tanta iniquitate permanserint;" do you consider that the answer you gave with respect to the 4th council of Lateran, applies equally to that?—I consider those words as liable to the same restrictions as those already mentioned with respect to the canon of the 4th council of Lateran; that is, I consider the decree of the council as emanating from both the spiritual and temporal authorities, and not proposing an article of Catholic faith.

Are the Commissioners to understand, that although the Pope has claimed by virtue of these councils as a general and universal power, the right given to him by those canons, yet that the Roman Catholic church in general has denied that they did give him that general right, and has resisted him in the exercise of it?—Certainly. I beg leave to observe that the Popes who have claimed the right of interfering in temporals do not rest their claim on the decrees of those councils, but on certain passages of Scripture to which Roman Catholic divines do not attach the meaning given them by the Ultramontanists.

Are the Commissioners misinformed or in error in supposing that in the 27th chapter of that council, is the following passage; "That all those who are any ways bound to Heretics should consider themselves absolved from all fidelity and obedience due to them, so long as they persist in their iniquity?"—I believe the passage is to be found in the acts of the council†.

Have any decrees of general councils, that ever were binding, now ceased to be binding on Roman Catholics?—The decree of any general council, where faith or Christian morality is proposed to the whole church, can never cease to bind in the opinion of Catholics; but many canons regarding discipline, and the detail of church government, have gone into disuse, or are no longer enforced.

Has any doubt ever been suggested as to the genuineness of the canon of this 3d council of Lateran?—I am not aware that there has.

Is it, in your opinion, a matter neither relating to faith nor morality, when a proposition is stated as generally as that which has been above quoted, "That all those that were any way bound to Heretics should consider themselves absolved from all fidelity and obedience due to them, so long as they persisted in their iniquity?"—The words above quoted have certainly a reference to faith and to moral conduct, but they appear to me to regard the Heretics only who existed at that time in the southern parts of Europe; nor must we lose sight of the circumstance that the temporal superiors of those persons were present in the council, and gave their sanction to the punishments above mentioned.

Do

[Subsequently added by the Witness.]

* The Commissioners will not suppose that the breviary is a rule of Catholic faith; that we are bound to believe every fact contained in it, or every point of doctrine deducible from those facts.

† The words however should not be taken so generally, either as to time or persons, as the translation would seem to make them; they relate only to the tenants or vassals of those barons or other noblemen, who were involved in the heresy of which there was then question. The words of the Tract de Ecclesia speak only of the Albigenses.

B. Crotty, D. D.

21 October 1826.

Do not you think that the Roman Catholic world at that time considered the proposition as relating both to faith and morality?—In the sense I have already mentioned, it is connected with both, and was probably considered so by the Catholic world; but they did not consider the principle as put forth by the council to have been put forth in that way which makes the principle an article of the Catholic faith.

Do you not think that the generations of Catholics, who immediately succeeded them, may have taken precisely the same view of the question?—I think they did, and have always done so since.

What view of the question do you suppose them to have taken?—That the matter itself is certainly connected with faith and morals, but that it was not believed that it was put forth by the council at that time, nor has it been believed since, that it was put forth as an article of faith to be believed by the Catholic church*.

Do you think it altogether unreasonable in Protestants, upon understanding that general councils are held to be infallible in matters relating to faith and morals, to consider that that proposition fell within that description, and related either to faith or morals, or perhaps to both?—I think it perfectly reasonable in Protestants, as the principle so often alluded to is connected with faith and morals, to doubt whether such a principle, even as put forth by the practice of the council, may not be dangerous to Protestant or Catholic states, but after a fair explanation has been given, and the difficulties proposed on the subject have been so often, as I think, satisfactorily answered, and especially when it is clear that Roman Catholics actually disbelieve the truth of the principle, which they never can do and continue Catholics, where there is question of an article of faith, then I think that Protestants may become unreasonable in continuing still to doubt of the sincerity of Catholics in renouncing that principle†.

The question does not mean to imply any doubt of their sincerity, but merely to put it to you, whether you do not think it reasonable that Protestants should expect that the proposition should be denied by just as great an authority as that by which it was affirmed, namely, by a general council?—The proposition as stated in my last answer, was sufficiently disclaimed by the Council of Constance, and had been before by other councils, I mean the proposition which asserts that the Church has any right to inflict other than spiritual censures on heretics. After having condemned as heterodox the doctrines of John Huss, the council ordered him to be deposed and degraded from the order of priesthood. It declared that this was the only punishment the church has a right to inflict. What followed was the act of the Emperor Sigismund, who ordered Huss to be punished as the laws of the empire directed. The words of the council are as follows; Hæc Sancta Synodus Constantiensis, Johannem Hus attento quod Ecclesia Dei non habeat ultra quid gerere valeat, iudicio sæculari relinquere, et ipsum Curiae seculari relinquendum fore decernit‡.

Have

* When I say that the proceedings of the two Councils of Lateran are connected with faith, I do not take the word faith in the strict sense; I mean it as synonymous with belief or opinion. When the Council acted as before stated, a question might arise, whether they had a right to act so. This is a matter of opinion. Many sound divines hold the affirmative, and ground their opinion on the circumstance of the council having been composed of both the temporal and spiritual authorities. To the former they attribute the temporal, and to the latter the ecclesiastical punishments inflicted by the council on the Albigenses. They took it for granted that the temporal power has that right, when heresies are subversive of civil government, or tend to disturb the public peace.

† I must take leave to add, that in the questions put to me on this subject, as well as in my answers, there is some ambiguity which requires to be explained. The questions suppose the principle put forth by those councils to be, that the Church has a right to punish heretics with death, confiscation of property, &c. The principle as implied in my answers is, whether the Church and State (or rather the latter exclusively) have this power.

‡ To sum up the substance of my answers to the foregoing questions, and to prevent their being misunderstood, I request that what follows may be added:—I acknowledge that in the councils of Lateran and Constance, laws were enacted inflicting severe temporal punishments on the persons who, at the periods of those councils, were labouring to subvert the Catholic faith in different parts of Europe. It is manifest likewise that by those laws it was ordained that temporal lords who favoured or connived at the introduction of heresy among their vassals or dependents, should be excommunicated; and if before the expiration of a year they did not give a satisfactory account of their conduct, that they should moreover forfeit the allegiance and fidelity of their said vassals. I consider it probable too, that these measures may have been suggested by the ecclesiastical portion of the councils, and recommended by them for the adoption of the sovereigns, or temporal princes, who assisted personally or were represented by their proxies at those councils. But I see nothing in the Acts of those councils from which I can infer that the Bishops composing them thought themselves, and much less that they meant to oblige me, as a Catholic, to believe that they possessed, as Ecclesiastics, a right to inflict temporal punishments on persons renouncing the faith of the Catholic church. The Princes of Europe sanctioned the laws thus proposed to them by their approbation, and acted on them, in many instances, without any further reference to the Pope.

It may now be asked, did the council, composed as it was of the temporal and spiritual powers of christendom, act wisely or justly in making and enforcing those laws? This is what has been so often called, in a very vague sense, a question connected with faith. It may be much more properly called a Quæstio Juris than a Quæstio Fidei. Every Catholic is perfectly at liberty to follow whichever side of it he may deem more probable. Were I to adopt the affirmative, I should conceive my opinion supported

Have not writers of eminence in the Roman Catholic church maintained the obnoxious principle above stated distinctly in their writings, namely, the principle that faith is not to be kept with heretics?—I cannot call to my recollection any divine that ever I read, who maintained such a principle, and I have seen many who expressly deny it; among others, I will venture to mention the divines of the different Catholic universities, consulted on the subject during Mr. Pitt's administration.

Are not these words in the Acts of the Council of Constance: "Whereas certain persons of slight understandings, or of sinister intentions, or accustomed to be wise beyond what is beehing, detract his Royal Majesty, and as it is said even the sacred Council with slanderous tongues, saying and insinuating, both in public and private, that the safe conduct which was given by the most mighty Prince Lord Sigismund, King of the Romans, &c. to the departed John Huss, an arch-heretic of damnable memory, was unduly violated, contrary to justice and honesty, although the said John Huss had rendered himself incapable of availing himself of the privileges of his safe conduct, by obstinately impugning the orthodox faith, and although by natural, human, or divine law, any faith or promise which is prejudicial to the Catholic faith need not be kept: Therefore the Holy Council, by the tenor of these presents, declare that this most mighty Prince, in his treatment of John Huss, notwithstanding the foresaid safe conduct, did aright that which was lawful and becoming his Royal Majesty; and we determine and ordain, to all and each of the faithful in Christ, of every dignity, degree, pre-eminence, condition, state, and sex, that no one hereafter may detract this sacred Council, or his Royal Majesty, or in any manner speak evil of any of them, on account of their acts in the affair of the forementioned John Huss; and that whoever shall act contrary to this decree, shall be punished without remission as a favourer of heretical pravity, and guilty of the crime of lese Majesty?"—The words mentioned being a translation, I cannot answer for the fidelity of it, but taking it for granted that it exhibits the sense of the original, I think the thing can be fairly explained. The Council seem to me to have said nothing more than that the safe conduct granted to John Huss did not protect him against those proceedings which should take place in the Council regarding his heresy or orthodoxy. They likewise seemed to think that a safe conduct, granted under circumstances that would be prejudicial to the Christian faith, was in itself unlawfully granted, and consequently not binding; but as it appears that the safe conduct granted to John Huss, was intended to screen him from violence in his passage through those countries through which he might travel in coming to the Council, so far I think that both the Council and the Emperor who granted the safe conduct were bound to observe it, and he accordingly had protection in coming to the Council by the Emperor's express command. When however it was found that he had not only persisted in the errors which he had taught in Bohemia, and in defending the popular commotions which he had excited in Prague, and other places, by his seditious conduct, and had also attempted at different times during the Council, first to disseminate his errors in Constance, by affixing them in writing to the doors of different churches in that city, and afterwards to make his escape from Constance, and thereby elude the jurisdiction of the tribunal to which he had agreed to submit his case, and was actually for some time concealed in a covered cart in which he was to be transported out of the town, the Council and the Emperor considered him as having broken his faith, and forfeited his right to any protection, which, up to that period, he might have claimed in virtue of his safe conduct; they (the Council) never were bound by any safe conduct which the Emperor or any other power could grant him, to abstain from inquiring into the orthodoxy of the opinions which he held. They accordingly did try him, and found him guilty of holding those doctrines which had been attributed to him, and of obstinately persevering in preaching the same. They declare, that they had no right to inflict any other but spiritual punishments on him; but as the temporal laws of the empire subjected heretics to corporal punishment, the Emperor interfered and ordered him to be put to death as an heretic, as the laws of the empire required he should. We had, I believe, laws, if not equally severe, at least inflicting weighty punishments on the persons called Lollards or Wickliffites in force in England long after the Reformation.

Your attention is particularly requested to these words in the Act of the Council: "Although the said John Huss had rendered himself incapable of availing himself of the privileges of his safe conduct, by obstinately impugning the orthodox faith;" you are requested to lay before the Commissioners your view of the meaning of that proposition?—The proposition seems to me to regard the personal safety of John Huss, after he had been tried by the council as a heretic, and declared to be such, that his safe conduct should no longer secure him against the consequences of this condemnation.

You are aware, that the safe conduct granted to him, applied both to the time of his coming to the Council, and of his returning from it?—I have seen the safe conduct, and as far as I can recollect, (for it is some time since I read any work on the subject,) it was stated in different ways. In one part it related merely to his passage to the Council, in ported by the practice of all the leading Protestant churches of Europe, though, thank God, difference in religious opinions is now no longer visited with capital punishment.

On the other point above mentioned, I can see no greater difficulty in Princes agreeing to hold their Crowns, and their right to the allegiance of their subjects, under the conditions mentioned in the Canon of Lateran, than in His Majesty's consenting to hold his under the Act of settlement and his Coronation Oath.

the other, it was said to relate both to his going and returning, but this was on the supposition that he would be acquitted by the Council*.

Do you know whether Thuanus, in reference to the transaction, states as follows: "Our divines contended publicly in their congregations and in their published writings, that a prince was not bound to keep his faith with heretics, alleging, in proof of it, the decree that had passed at the Council of Constance"—I have never read the works of Thuanus. I cannot say that he was wrong in attributing such conduct to some Catholic divines; as opinions upon such matters may be held by divines, and are often held, which the Catholic church disclaims. In countries, particularly where religious animosities have given rise to civil wars, men have often spoken and acted in a way they would be ashamed of under other circumstances. It was probably during such a state of things that the expressions mentioned by Thuanus were used. The conduct and opinions of both parties were highly censurable, and I hope there is no honest man at the present day who does not condemn them.

Your attention has been particularly called to these words of the Council: "Although by natural, human, or divine law, any faith or promise, which is prejudicial to the Catholic faith, need not be kept;" do you understand that passage, or according to your general knowledge of Roman Catholics, do you believe it is understood, or has ever been understood, or that it can be fairly imputed to them, as a principle of the Roman Catholic church, that faith is to be broken with heretics?—I do not; I understand the words to mean an unlawful promise, which like an unlawful oath, can never be binding.

Have you ever met with a Roman Catholic who has not considered it a scandalous, odious, insulting, false imputation, to suppose that such a doctrine was taught or maintained by the church?—I never have met with one.

Did not the Catholic universities, who were consulted by Mr. Pitt, reject it as a most odious and unjust imputation, and totally unwarranted by any proceeding of any of the Councils of the Roman Catholic church?—They did; those answers have been for more than thirty years before the world, and no Catholic has ever found fault with them.

Do not Roman Catholics in this country, in the oath of allegiance, reject it as such, as an unchristian and impious doctrine?—They do; in every moral treatise which I have seen, written by Catholic divines, they consider the obligation of oaths and promises in themselves lawful, and not contrary to the law of God, as having their sanction from the law of nature antecedently to the christian or any other revelation.

Are the Commissioners therefore to understand, that when it is said that an engagement which is prejudicial to the Catholic faith, need not be kept, that this speaks as if an engagement prejudicial to good morals?—Certainly. In the opinion of every Catholic, whatever tends to endanger the one must necessarily be subversive of the other.

Are they to understand it as speaking of the nature of the engagement, and not of the person with whom the engagement is entered into?—Certainly.

Admitting fully that no enlightened Catholic at this day maintains any of those obnoxious principles, do not you think that those principles prevailed to a certain extent in the Roman Catholic world in former periods, namely at the periods of those councils?—They might have prevailed, so far as the being held by some individuals as matters of opinion; but they never expressed the belief of any large portion of Catholics, much less the faith of the Catholic church.

Do you conceive that any Popes have sanctioned the principle of subjecting heretics to capital punishments, quoad heretics?—I do not recollect any decree of a Pope regarding it; but I recollect to have seen Catholic divines that held it was lawful to put heretics to death when they refused to retract, and continued to disseminate their errors.

But you do not recollect any solemn act of a Pope marking that principle with his positive approbation?—No; I do not mean to deny that such may be alleged†.

Will you state, about how many Students in Maynooth, you conceive, are at present in the general habit of resorting to the library?—The number is about 170 I think.

Who resort there constantly?—Not constantly; there is no obligation of going there; they go there when they please, it is open to them; but they have so much to do with the tracts, and other theological works, which they have in their hands constantly, that sometimes they find sufficient employment without reading more extensively.

It

* There is no instance, I believe, of a person charged with a capital offence and summoned by a competent tribunal to come in and abide his trial, being promised, that whether found guilty or innocent, he should in either case be acquitted and escape all punishment. The words mentioned in the question mean nothing more than that the safe conduct granted by the Emperor, could not deprive the Bishops of their right of inquiring into the doctrines of Huss—of condemning them as heretical, if they proved to be so—and him as a heretic, if he obstinately persisted in maintaining those doctrines. The punishment consequently inflicted, was not enacted by the council, but by the laws of the empire. There is no doubt that Huss's opinions were seditious, and tended to the subversion of all government, both of Church and State.

† The most laboured defence of the principle I ever saw was written by John Calvin. I know no denomination of Christians who have not practically maintained the principle, when they found themselves strong enough to act on it, or amongst whom individuals may not be found who have defended it in theory.

It would appear from the statute, that in order to obtain admission to the library, it was necessary for the Students not only to be in the Divinity Class, which it is supposed you allude to in speaking of the number of 170, but that it was necessary also to have a personal admission from yourself; is that so?—The statute requires that the Students should be four years in the College before they are admitted to the library, because it was supposed when the statutes were drawn up, that the Students would spend two years in the study of languages, and two more in that of philosophy; that, therefore, after four years residence in the College they would become divines. Agreeably therefore to the spirit of the statute, as persons have become divines after three years residence, or even after a shorter time, when they have made their previous studies in other Colleges, Carlow for instance, they are admitted to the library without having spent the four years in College.

Does the mere circumstance of a Student being of four years standing, confer upon him the power of going into the library, or is any written or oral permission from you necessary in order to his admission?—It is understood that some of the Students may not be benefited by going to the library, even after four years residence in the College, because men of ordinary talents may have sufficient to do in studying the works in their hands, and in such cases the Professor may refer such persons to the President. If the President refuse his permission the person cannot go to the library.

Have any such references ever been made to you?—Not for the last four or five years; and generally speaking, it is understood, that the divines have free access to the library, because the restriction on individuals is considered, in some degree odious, and the Professors seldom think it necessary to require the permission of the President, and are not inclined to refuse their own.

Was the access to the library three or four years ago, as general and as easy as it is at present?—The access to the library, during the twelve or thirteen years that I have been President, has been as easy as it is at present, and I believe was so previously to my appointment.

That is, during the whole of your Presidency the entire Divinity class has been admissible, except in the case of any particular individual to whom you may have thought it proper to refuse admission?—Yes; which is a case that has very seldom occurred. There is another exception, which is, that a person may be four years in the College without having entered his course of divinity; for instance, he might be kept two years in the class of Humanity, one in Rhetoric, and two in Philosophy; in that case, in the fourth year he would not be a divine, and such a person could not, without special licence, go into the library.

How often are the young men required to attend confession?—By the regulations of discipline they are required to go to confession once a fortnight; and to communion, when their directors recommend to them to do so.

Is that a rule acted on?—The rule is generally acted on, but not too strictly enforced, because we wish that they should go rather from a sense of religion than merely in obedience to the statute of the house.

What determines the particular confessor who is to be resorted to by any particular Student at any particular time?—The Students at the commencement of each academical year, are distributed according to their own choice among the confessors of the house, with the exception of the President, who never hears the confessions of any Student.

Is there a perfect liberty of choice on the part of the Students?—Yes, there is certainly; they choose their own confessors.

Is it open to the person who may be selected as confessor, to refuse performing the office for any particular Student?—It is understood that every Professor in the house will hear the confessions of those who choose him as their director.

Are the Students at liberty to change their confessors as often as they please?—The frequent changing of confessors is considered by Catholics as prejudicial to the spiritual interests of the penitent; but there is no prohibition of their changing their confessors with sufficient cause, and therefore the practice of constantly confessing to the same person, though generally, is not universally pursued.

Are breaches of the academical rules considered proper or necessary, as a subject matter of confession?—The academical rules are more or less important according to the actions which they order or prohibit; they are generally supposed, unless they be confirmatory of laws of the church or of laws of God, to bind under venial sin; but it is held by some of the Professors of the house, and the opinion has not been censured, that every individual act by which the minor rules are violated, is not a sin, but that the habit of frequently violating them may become sinful.

For instance, would the breaking of silence during the season of Spiritual Retreat, be considered as a venial, or a mortal sin?—A venial sin only; if there be no very aggravating circumstance accompanying it, and that not always; for very just causes may sometimes make it necessary to violate silence.

But it never could be considered, under any circumstance, as a mortal sin?—No, not a mere breach of silence; for instance, though by a regulation of the Board of Trustees, the Superiors of the house are ordered to assist at the Spiritual Retreat, as well as the Students, yet it is expressly said, that this is to be enforced only as far as the discharge of their ordinary duties will allow.

Have you ever heard of any young men who have been educated at Maynooth, having conformed to the Established church?—I have; in I suppose four or five instances.

Will you be so good as to mention the instances?—The first in my recollection, was the Rev. Matthias Crowley, who was a lecturer in the College, in the department of Sacred

Scripture

Scripture. He left the College some time in 1811, to the best of my recollection, in consequence of a dispute between him and the then President, the Reverend Doctor Everard, deceased; and after having celebrated mass on the day of his departure, he applied to the Reverend Mr. Ashe, then rector of the parish of Maynooth, and was by him introduced, I believe, to the Right Reverend Doctor Lindsay, under whose auspices he conformed to the Established church.

Was it not a matter known to some persons in the establishment, before he quitted it, that his views were such as rendered it impossible for him to continue any longer in the Catholic communion?—I never heard that it was; from the circumstances that came to my knowledge, I believe, he would have continued in the Catholic communion and in the College of Maynooth, had Doctor Everard allowed him to fill the situation he had previously held, or transferred him to that of Dean.

Will you mention the other instances of conversions to which you have referred?—I heard of Mr. Cousins.

What period of the course had he arrived at?—I suppose, he finished his course, from the circumstance of his having been ordained priest.

Had Mr. Crowley been ordained priest?—Yes.

Will you mention the other two or three instances you refer to?—Of late there was a person who had been expelled from the College for improper conduct, and who afterwards became a Franciscan friar; after quarrelling with his Superiors, he set their authority at naught, and has become a minister, either of the Established church, or of some other denomination of Christians.

Will you describe the species of misconduct for which he was expelled?—His removal took place previously to my appointment; but I understood from those who were then in the College, that he was expelled for theft; that is, for stealing a pair of shoes from one of his companions.

Is it not probable that the disposition in the College upon any such occasion, would be to deal rather severely with the memory of a person who had departed from the community?—I do not think we should be uncharitable to any body; or that there is a person in the College who, however he may disapprove of the conduct of such persons, or suspect the sincerity of their motives, would think it justifiable to charge him with transgressions of which he was not guilty.

Who was the President at the time he was expelled?—The Most Reverend Doctor Murray.

Will you mention any body else who has left the College?—There was a Mr. Dixon, belonging to the diocese of Killala.

Did he receive priest's orders in the house?—No; he was ordained at home by his bishop; he left the house, I believe, in the third year of his studies, after his year of logic.

He officiated as a Roman Catholic priest before he became a Protestant clergyman, did he not?—He did.

Can you mention any body else?—There was a young man from the county of Cork, who after having been promoted to the order of Deacon, betrayed once or twice symptoms of derangement, though a man of very considerable talent; he was ordained priest by his bishop at home; and after some time left his part of the country and came to Dublin, made as I understand, application to His Grace, the Protestant Archbishop of Dublin, and was by him placed under the care of a clergyman in the arch-diocese of Dublin. I heard that he had gone to the church, I believe of Bray, to read his recantation, but that when actually in the church he changed his mind, ran out of it, and declined doing what he had gone to do. I learned that he afterwards went to London, and I believe he so far conformed to the Established church as to receive the sacrament therein; he afterwards however repented of what he had done, went to France, and spent a considerable time, about a year and a half in the Convent of La Trappe.

Have you been informed of all this in a manner that you consider as authentic?—Of what passed while he was in College I speak, of course from my own knowledge; the fact relative to his conduct in the church, whither he went to renounce the doctrines of the Catholic church, I have from hearsay. I have learned the circumstances last mentioned from himself; he was seized while in La Trappe with an attack of his former complaint, and was advised by the inmates of that establishment to retire therefrom, as his disposition was naturally tending to melancholy, and they consequently considered that it would be more favourable to his health to be in a more active situation in life. He is now in Ireland and reconciled to the Catholic church.

Can you recollect any other person?—I do not recollect any others.

Do you recollect a person of the name of Hannan?—I do.

Was he not educated at Maynooth, and priested in it, and has he not conformed to the Established church?—Mr. Hannan was priested some years ago by the former Bishop of Achonry. He had made no ecclesiastical studies previously to his ordination. He came to the Lay College at Maynooth before its union with the Ecclesiastical College, remained there, I believe, a year, or perhaps something more, returned to his diocese, came back to Dublin and went to France, where he spent, I believe, nearly another year, and then came to Ireland.

Is he not at present officiating in the Established church?—After his return, he conformed to the Established religion, but he does not, as I understand, officiate. He acts, as I have been told, as a clerk in a Savings Bank in Dublin. I received this account from a person who would not deceive me; but he may himself have been misinformed.

Rev.B. Crotty, D. D.
21 October 1826.

Was there not another individual of the name of Nolan who was educated at Maynooth, and who conformed to the Established church?—Mr. Nolan, I believe, did conform at one time to the Established church, but shortly after repented of having done so, and was again reconciled to the Roman Catholic church.

In what communion is he at present?—I believe he has, since that, persevered as a Catholic priest.

Have any young men been admitted into the College from the seminary of education at Clongowes?—I think there have been three or four in my time.

How comes it that so few have been admitted from that establishment?—They are generally young men, who are educated and intended by their parents for other professions, and consequently do not, with few exceptions, declare for the ecclesiastical state.

Have you any reason to know whether the Bishops encourage young men to receive their preparatory education at the school of Clongowes, before their admission to Maynooth?—I never heard of the Bishops giving a preference to Clongowes, probably because the expenses there are too high; but I consider it to be an excellent classical school, perhaps the best in Ireland, to which Roman Catholics can have recourse.

Did the young men, whom you have mentioned as having received their preliminary education at Clongowes, enter into orders, and complete their course at College?—I believe only one or two of them did. On recollection, I am inclined to think that one of the persons I allude to, was educated at Stoneyhurst.

Who are the superiors at Clongowes, and of what order are they?—They are generally reputed Jesuits.

Have you any doubt that they are Jesuits?—I do not know. I have it only from public fame. I never asked one of them whether he was a Jesuit.

When you have seen them, did they wear any dress appertaining to any religious order?—They wore a dress which would indicate that they were ecclesiastics, but it was not the dress of the Jesuits with which I had opportunities of being acquainted.

Have you occasion to know where the present superiors of Clongowes were themselves educated?—I believe they were educated in Sicily.

Do you know where in Sicily?—I do not know; but I think I heard it was at Palermo.

Were they any of them at Stoneyhurst previously to their coming to this country, as far as you know?—I cannot say that they were; they were some of them in Carlow College before they went abroad, and may probably have been at Stoneyhurst too.

How many are the persons whom you described as having heard to be Jesuits?—Not more than five or six.

Is the Stoneyhurst establishment supposed to be under the government of the same body?—I believe it is; but the Bishops in England are not inclined to recognize them as Jesuits.

Do you understand that Clongowes is attached in any way to Stoneyhurst, or has emanated from it?—I conceive they are two independent establishments.

Is there any individual connected with the College at Maynooth, who belongs to the Society of Jesuits?—There is not.

Are all the persons connected with the College of Maynooth secular clergy?—They are.

Is that a rule of the establishment?—No, it is not; we have had, in my time, one clergyman, who was a regular; a Dominican friar, Doctor M^cGuinness.

What office did he hold in the College?—He was for some time Vice-President, and afterwards Professor of Scripture, and Prefect of the Dunboyne establishment; a very excellent character, a learned and pious ecclesiastic.

In the election of a person to hold the situation of Professor, do you know whether it would constitute a ground of objection, that he was a Jesuit?—I believe that, considering the present state of public opinion, (I mean that of the Protestant portion of the empire) the Board of Trustees would not wish to appoint a person, professedly a Jesuit, to any situation in the College; but I beg leave to state, that I think they would not reject him on any other ground.

Rev.B. Crotty, D. D.
23 October 1826.

WILL you be so good as to describe the lectures that are given in sacred Scripture at Maynooth?—Lectures are given in sacred Scripture twice a week; the matter is changed every year, in order to afford the Students an opportunity of going through as large a portion of the Scripture as possible during their three years course of Divinity.

Do the Divinity Students attend the Scripture class twice a week during the entire of the three years that the Divinity course lasts?—On all days on which lectures are given.

From the commencement of the Divinity course?—From the commencement of the Divinity course to the end of it; they attend as long as lectures are given.

That is about 100 lectures in a year?—When the two months of the vacation are taken out there cannot be so many.

Will

Will you describe the nature of one of those lectures?—The Students have commentators on the Scriptures, some of which are their own private property, being purchased by them; they have likewise access to those that are in the College library; they prepare themselves to explain a chapter, or whatever portion may be marked for them previously by their Professor, on each class-day; they accordingly go over, verse by verse, the portion appointed for the matter of the lecture, and explain such difficulties as may have presented themselves during the course of their reading, or may be then proposed to them by the Professor.

About how many chapters may ordinarily constitute such a portion as would occupy one lecture?—I think about one chapter; if the chapter be long they sometimes divide it; if there be nothing particularly difficult or interesting, they may revise a larger portion.

What parts of the Scriptures are usually selected for the subject-matter of those lectures?—The Gospels more frequently; the Epistles of St. Paul, and sometimes a portion of the Old Testament; chiefly the Pentateuch, and, I believe, sometimes a portion of the Psalms.

Do the Prophecies form any portion of the Scripture course?—No, not generally; the number of lectures being so small, it is impossible to comprise within the three years a larger portion than I have mentioned of the sacred books; but in the course of Divinity, those passages of the Prophecies which relate to the Messiah and the New Covenant, are adduced in proof of the divinity of the christian religion.

Who is the Lecturer in Scripture History?—The Reverend James Browne.

When were the Scripture lectures first instituted at Maynooth?—Previously to my going to the College there had always been a Professor of Scripture.

You found them upon the same footing on which you describe them to be at present?—Exactly the same.

And you believe them to have been so from the first institution of the College?—I do; I believe the place of Professor of Scripture has been occasionally vacant for a short period, in consequence of the difficulty of always finding a proper person to fill it.

You have said that the Trustees have a stated annual meeting in June; among their number it appears there are four Roman Catholic Archbishops and seven Bishops; is it usual for any other Roman Catholic Bishops in Ireland to attend at Maynooth at the same time?—Some Roman Catholic Bishops, say two or three, have occasionally attended, and been present at the sittings of the Board, but they never vote; they have sometimes come on the particular business of their respective dioceses for the purpose, for example, of founding burses for which the sanction of the Trustees is necessary.

Do other Roman Catholic Bishops meet at Maynooth on such occasions, though not for the purpose of attending at the Board?—I think I recollect such a meeting to have taken place once; it was shortly after my going to the College.

But it is not usual?—It is not usual; a smaller number may have met there, and I believe have once or twice since, as far as I can recollect.

Do the meetings of the Trustees continue for more than one day?—They do frequently continue three, and sometimes four days.

During which time the Trustees continue in the College?—They do generally; it sometimes happens that a few of them lodge in the town, but they all dine at the College.

Does it happen that any portion of the Trustees continue at the College for a few days after the business of the Trustees is closed, for other purposes?—I have known, on two or three occasions, a Trustee, who not wishing to travel on Sunday, or foreseeing that he would not be able to get home on the Saturday on which the Board finished, remained until Monday.

Has it occurred that the ecclesiastical part of the Trustees have continued at Maynooth for the purpose of transacting other business, after the business of the College was disposed of, within your recollection?—No, I do not think they have, but they may during the time that they were there have done other business besides that which immediately regarded the College. I recollect to have heard, on one or two occasions, some conversation regarding the appointment of a President for the Irish College in Paris.

In reference to an answer given by you on a former day, with respect to the non-existence of newspapers within the Seminary, your attention is requested to this Minute of the Trustees, entered upon the Journal on the 13th December 1809: "Resolved, That the introduction of newspapers and other political publications amongst the Students has alienated them from the necessary attention to their studies and other duties, and that the President be and is hereby required to prevent it: Resolved, That any Student convicted of writing, or signing or circulating inflammatory letters, addresses, or remonstrances against the President, or any of the Superiors, Professors, or his Fellow Students or Student, or soliciting signatures thereto, shall be expelled;" would it not appear from this entry that the introduction of newspapers not only had, in point of fact, existence within the institution at the time in question, but to such an extent as to call for more than ordinary interference; can you give any particular account of the circumstance that is there referred to?—Not with any degree of certainty, as it was several years before I came to the College, but I believe I know what it alludes to; there were at that time, or shortly before, unfortunately, serious misunderstandings between some of the Superiors of the house; the President and Dean, I understand, did not pull well together; the consequence was that the Students formed parties, one favourable to the President and the other to the Dean. They on both sides, I believe, corresponded with some of the Dublin editors of newspapers; letters were published, and I believe it was principally for the purpose of seeing those letters in print that the newspapers were introduced. The consequences were, I believe, such as the Trustees insinuate in the passage just now read; but the late Dr. Everard being shortly after appointed President of the house the evil was immediately remedied; and I believe that if such practices have at any time since prevailed in the College, it has been only to such a trifling extent as could neither injure the general studies of the house, nor produce any of the consequences now alluded to.

You conceive, then, that the ground of objection entertained by the Trustees on the occasion in question, was with reference merely to matters of domestic interest in the house, and not as concerning political opinions, still less the government of the country?—I conceive that in the resolution now read, the Trustees had the former object principally in view; that is, the good order and peace of the Establishment; but I am perfectly well aware, that on many occasions, to my knowledge, they have declared that not only the tranquillity of the house and the necessary application of the Students to their respective studies, demanded the measure of excluding newspapers, but that it was likewise meant by that measure to prevent the Students from meddling in the politics of the country.

Your attention is now requested to a subsequent entry in the same day, after some intervening business had been disposed of, which is as follows: "Resolved, That after a most strict and diligent inquiry, with respect to the author or writer of the letter in the Evening Herald of the 4th of October 1809, signed Hibernicus, and which in our opinion contained a libel on the government and legislature of the country, we have been only able to ascertain that Kennedy Primus told Mr. Montague, the Procurator, that Mr. Sheehan was the author of said letter; and that the above named Mr. Kennedy stated to the Board, that a Student, whose name he would not mention, asked him whether he had seen said letter, and on his (Kennedy's) replying in the negative, and adding that he believed it was not yet published, the Student above alluded to, said, No matter for that, come in here and I will show it to you; that Kennedy went into the said Student's room, where said Student took a written paper, and read a part of it to him. Resolved, That our law agent be applied to for advice how we are to proceed in this case. Resolved, That our Chairman be and is hereby requested to communicate the above resolutions to the President of the College;" does it not appear from that entry, that the political feelings of the Students were, in the view of the Trustees, the inducing causes of the above resolutions?—I have paid every attention to the resolutions of the Board of Trustees now read, and conceive it to be a complete confirmation of the truth of what I asserted in my last answer, that is, that the Board had in view, in prohibiting newspapers, two objects, one of which is clearly expressed in the first resolution, and the second, relating to political discussions, in the resolution last read.

Does it not satisfy you also, that political discussions, to a certain extent, existed at the time in question among the Students?—Unquestionably it appears from the second resolution, that they did, but not from the first.

Do you not conceive that the state of the Students of Maynooth, both with respect to political feeling and domestic discipline, has fluctuated at various periods since the institution of the College; in other words, that at times it has been to be commended, and at other times it has not?—I think that no inference can be drawn regarding the general state of the College, either with regard to its discipline or the interference of the Students in political discussions, from the isolated fact just now mentioned.

The question was intended to extract your own opinion or recollection upon the subject?—My opinion upon the subject is candidly this, that notwithstanding the prohibition against the introduction of newspapers into the College, it is impossible completely to prevent the Students from hearing of the political discussions that occasionally agitate the country; and I do believe, that at all times the feelings of the Students are nearly the same as that of the body of the Catholics of Ireland, with this difference, that as they are commonly well informed on their duties, and sensible of the kindness of government to them particularly, they must of course think more moderately, and speak so too upon political subjects. I do not mean to say, that there is any thing like a feeling of disaffection to the government; I merely mean to say, that they wish, as the Catholics at large of Ireland do, for the restoration of the body of the Catholics to the privileges of the Constitution.

Is it not the fact, that at times the discipline of the College has been, from whatever causes, extremely relaxed?—The discipline of the College has never been to my knowledge permanently relaxed; it has on some occasions happened that the Students have for some days, perhaps for some weeks, been dissatisfied with some of their Superiors or Professors, and that they have expressed their dissatisfaction in a way that was not consistent with College discipline. This relaxation, however, did not in my opinion take place with the consent or connivance of the superiors of the College, but was in direct opposition to their wishes and efforts to preserve due subordination among the Students.

Your attention is now requested to an extract from the minute-book at a period considerably prior to your Presidency, but which is brought under your view that you may, if you are enabled to do so, by any recollection of what you may have heard, explain it to the Commissioners. There appears in the minute-book on the 28th February 1803, the following passage:—"The Trustees behold, with the deepest concern, the spirit of insubordination and disorder which has of late pervaded almost the whole of the Students of this College, a spirit so opposite to the true principles of religion, so disgraceful to those who have manifested it, and in its consequences so ruinous to the Establishment. They highly commend the conduct of those few who, possessing the real sentiments of loyal attachment to their duty and the true interest of religion and the Institution, that become them, refuse to take any part in those disorderly and shameful proceedings, the recollection of which nothing but the most exemplary conduct of the whole community can ever efface. Of those those who early withdrew themselves from those unfortunate proceedings, the Trustees think it right to express a favourable opinion, and only lament that the same sense of their very erroneous conduct did not appear to them to be more sincerely manifested by the community at large, which conduct they with pain see themselves obliged to pronounce improper and disgraceful in the highest degree; and they therefore order the President, in such manner as he shall think most fit, to inflict some penalty on the whole. The Trustees, with much regret, feel themselves obliged to make examples by ordering certain persons to be immediately expelled; some who have been guilty of the most flagrant and persevering breaches of duty that can be committed in such an Institution as this, in refusing to obey their superiors and encouraging insubordination. If the number of examples be not great, it is to the lenient and merciful disposition of the Trustees, and not, unfortunately, to the want of guilt in many more, who appear on well grounded evidence to have been forward in promoting the late abominable transactions. The Trustees enjoin the President to use particular severity, if, unfortunately, the smallest appearance of the same spirit shall recur. Had complaints been made, unaccompanied by disorder, the Trustees would consider it as much their duty to attend to them, as they do now feel it a painful one thus to express their sentiments;” Are you able to give to the Commissioners any account, from any thing you may have heard, of a proceeding which at the time appears to have excited so much attention?—I was not at Maynooth at the time, nor for many years after; but from what I have heard of the transaction, the state of insubordination in which a large portion of the Students was at that time involved, appears to me to have arisen, to the best of my recollection, from the following circumstance: The Students, when not supplied sufficiently with hot water for breakfast, were sometimes in the habit of coming to the servants parlour, where water was boiled for the use of the superiors, and taking away the kettle, by which means it sometimes happened that the Professors breakfast was delayed. On one occasion, a Professor found a Student taking away the kettle, and made use of an expression, not only to the individual, but applied to the community in general, which gave the individual, and afterwards the community, when informed of it, great offence. The expression I believe was, that they were all a set of ill-mannered peasants. The offensive words were immediately communicated to the whole community, and produced an ebullition of dissatisfaction against the person who used them, which it was impossible at the moment to put down. The President, I believe, interfered, and for some days was unable to bring the Students to order; an extraordinary Board, if I recollect, was called on the occasion, and the resolution now read was in consequence of the transactions I have just mentioned. There were also about the same time many complaints on the part of the Students, of their comforts not being sufficiently attended to by the superiors.

You believe that a resolution so strong had reference to nothing but the proceeding you have stated?—The matter as far as I have ever heard was quite unconnected with politics; it was a shameful revolt of a large portion of the Students against their lawful superiors, whose authority they for some time set at defiance. Peace was at last restored by the interference of the Board, and by the punishment of some of the ring-leaders.

Have any Students ever been either expelled from Maynooth or desired to remove themselves from it, in reference to their political sentiments?—About the end of last century it does appear that a number of Students, amounting perhaps to seventeen or eighteen, retired from the College, in consequence of the President's having, after he had been to make a communication to the government in Dublin, told them that every man who had taken the oath of United Irishmen, would be obliged to leave the College. He mentioned that an oath would be put to every member of the community, I believe, on the following day, to ascertain whether they were or were not United Irishmen, and by what I have been able to learn from the report of others, it appears, that the number above mentioned immediately declared, that they had at some former period taken the United Irishmen's oath, and accordingly retired from the College without being expelled, unless in the way stated. They conceived they would be called on to swear that they were not United Irishmen, or never had been, and seeing they could not take such an oath, they left the College.

Was there any other occasion that you can state, upon which any persons were removed for a similar reason?—I do not recollect any other occasion; there may have been, but I think if there were, I should recollect it.

Are you aware, or have you heard that about the same time several young men were obliged to leave Trinity College, Lord Clare having held a Visitation there?—I have often heard the fact mentioned, and believe it to be true.

Your attention is now requested to an entry of the 15th of October, 1810; “Resolved, That any interference in the concerns of the College, save only by the Visitors or Trustees at their Boards, or any Correspondence between the Prelates, or their Clergy and the Students, touching the regulations and discipline of the College, must be subversive of that subordination so essentially requisite in such an establishment, and we therefore earnestly intreat that such things may not take place hereafter;” can you give the Commissioners any information as to the circumstances that may have led to that resolution?—I can do it only in a general way; some Students were in the habit of corresponding with their Bishops, and informing them of whatever took place in the College, particularly such matters as regarded the diocese of the persons thus writing; by which means the Bishops were sometimes induced to form unfavourable opinions of the superiors, and to consider as well-founded grievances, what was probably nothing more than the exercise of necessary firmness on the part of the superiors in enforcing the discipline of the house. I do not recollect any individual circumstance that I can specify, but I believe that was the general reason reason for the Board's prohibiting any interference of individual Bishops with the internal government of the College.

Your attention is requested to an entry of the 25th of January, 1816; "Resolved, that the existence of any particular association in the College, for literary or any other purposes, is not compatible with the many and important avocations of the scholars, and may be productive of division and discord. Such associations therefore are prohibited, and if any now exist, they are hereby discontinued. Such scholars as have leisure from their more important duties, are earnestly exhorted to employ such leisure in the study of Ecclesiastical History, or in other matters analogous to their regular studies;" can you give the Commissioners any information as to the circumstances that occasioned that resolution?—The resolution originated with the Board, from their having been informed by the President, that an anxious wish was expressed on the part of a number of the Students, principally divines, to have established in the College an Historical Society; the President did allow the thing to go on for a short time, but apprehending that it might ultimately be productive of bad consequences to the discipline of the house, he laid the matter before the Board at the first opportunity that offered, and the resolution now read, was the result of the deliberation held by the Board on the subject.

Speaking of the discipline of the College during the time you have been President, what opinion would you express of it?—My opinion is, that the general discipline of the College is as regular and as well enforced, as it is in most of the Catholic Colleges I have known; though from time to time, individual acts of insubordination and breach of rule have occurred. I cannot, however say, that on that occasion I myself have ever been disrespectfully treated by any Student, with perhaps one or two exceptions.

You have spoken of the discipline of the College, with reference to other Catholic Colleges; are the Commissioners to understand, that you speak of it only with reference to other Catholic Colleges because you are only acquainted with Catholic Colleges, or that you mean to make a distinction between the discipline of Catholic Colleges and other Colleges?—I believe that in general the discipline in Catholic Colleges is more strict than in others.

Does the study of the Hebrew language form any part of the regular course of instruction in Maynooth?—Any of the divines that wish to attend the Hebrew Lectures are at liberty to do so; the study of the Hebrew is obligatory only on the Dunboyne or Senior Students.

Is there a regular lecture given?—There is once a week.

According to the constitution and statutes of the College, is it open to Roman Catholics generally, or is it confined to those that are intended for the priesthood?—The College is open to none, as inmates of the house, but those who are intended for the ecclesiastical state.

Are the regulations, of which a copy has been sent to the Commissioners, intitled "Regula Pietatis," still in force in the College?—They are.

Do the young men attend mass daily?—They do.

Is there any obligation upon the young men, or upon any of them, to read the breviary? Yes, all that are in holy orders, that have received sub-deaconship.

Not till then?—No.

What is the extent of obligation upon the sub-deacons as to the length of time for which they are to read it, and the quantities they are to read of it?—It is the same for all persons in holy orders; the reading of the office takes up every day about an hour and a quarter, to an hour and a half.

Is there any rule, determining the length of time for which they are to read it, or the quantity, or the passages they are to read?—No rule as to time; each person reads it privately in his own room; the length of the office itself is determined, it consists of a number of lessons and psalms, &c. for each day.

How is it known whether the young men comply with that obligation to the full extent?—It is entirely left to their own conscience; the omission of any considerable portion of it would be considered a grievous fault.

Will you explain what obligation there is binding upon them in conscience to do it?—Every person promoted to holy orders, is told at the time of his ordination, that one of his obligations is to read the divine office. This law of the church is held by all our moral divines, to bind under pain of mortal sin.

That is, a certain portion of the breviary every day?—Yes.

So long as he lives?—Yes; when he can and ought to read it.

For his private edification, not to any hearers?—It is in cathedrals, collegiate churches, convents, and many other communities, read in choir in Catholic countries; and the vespers on Sundays are often read in choir in our chapels.

Is there any thing you would wish to state to the Commissioners, in addition to the answers you have given to the questions which have been proposed to you?—I beg leave to state in explanation of some questions that have been put to me, regarding the description of persons from whom the Students of Maynooth are generally taken; that what I said before, is literally and generally true; that is, that they are commonly taken from what in Ireland is considered the middling class of Roman Catholics; that many, however, are taken from the higher classes; and that if some may be of a description below that of the general body of the Students, I think it is unfair to do as I have seen done, or known to have been done in the public papers; that is, to estimate the general body of the Students from the character or circumstances of the parents of those few to whom I have last alluded. I know that the Roman Catholic Bishops in Ireland are always anxious to procure young men men of the most decent families to be members of the College of Maynooth; but I know likewise, that in the present state of this country, it would be impossible to find a sufficient number of that description to supply the wants of the Roman Catholic ministry. The labours of a Roman Catholic clergyman are greater than the public at large is aware of; they are frequently exposed to the most imminent danger of losing their lives, by going out at night and visiting the most wretched hovels of the peasantry, where nothing is to be found but misery and contagious disorder; there is no temporal inducement for the children of the higher classes of society to become Roman Catholic ecclesiastics in Ireland; besides, poverty in Ireland, among Roman Catholics, is so frequent, that people are generally inclined to consider it rather a misfortune than a fault; and consequently the Roman Catholics estimate the respect they owe to their pastors, not so much from the wealth or respectability of the parents of those pastors, as from the zeal, piety, and good conduct of the clergyman; whenever those qualities are found, however humble a priest may be in regard to his parentage, or their means, he is sure to be beloved and respected. I will likewise beg leave to observe, that many persons of the description I have been now alluding to, are received at the University of Dublin; sent there frequently by clergymen of the Established church presiding over schools in the country, and recommended to some of their friends in College; that those persons are not unfrequently induced to abandon the Roman Catholic religion and adopt that of the Established church, and that there is never any objection, as far as I could discover, to promote such persons to orders in the Established church. I likewise know that some persons thus promoted, have been the first to upbraid the Students of Maynooth with the lowliness of their origin. I do not mean to say that the original poverty of such persons and of their parents should be attributed to them as a fault, but if they get forward in the Established church by their talents, I should consider it a hardship, and a very severe one, if the children of Roman Catholics, who perhaps at no very remote period were in competent circumstances, but are now reduced to the inability of supporting them in College, should be excluded, in consequence of the misfortunes of their parents, from rising to such situations as they can attain to in the Roman Catholic church of Ireland. On the subject of the tendency of the Roman Catholic religion to promote loyalty and fidelity to Protestant sovereigns, I beg leave to say, that in my conscientious opinion, there is no class of Christians more strict upon this subject than Roman Catholics. There is another observation that I would beg leave to make with regard to the power which Catholics are said to attribute to the Pope, of deposing Protestant princes as Heretics. I beg leave to say, and I say it not with any view of recriminating, but merely for the purpose of inducing those who condemn as Catholic opinions what really are not such, to look to their own, and to see whether there is any great difference between the opinions ascribed to Roman Catholics, and those actually held, or at least implicitly supported by the Protestant Universities of these kingdoms. By the law of England, as I conceive it, should the King become a Roman Catholic, he thereby forfeits his title to the Crown, may be lawfully deposed by his subjects, and if he endeavours by force to maintain himself on the throne may be put to death, as a rebel to his lawful successor. It is but fair in my opinion, if this enactment be just, to attribute the same power to Roman Catholic States; that is, to allow them the right of making a similar law in the event of the Roman Catholic King becoming a Protestant. Should such an event ever take place in any country, it would naturally be submitted to the opinion of the Pope, whether such King was actually a deserter from the Roman Catholic church; the Pope in the supposition I make, must necessarily answer in the affirmative. The consequence to the sovereign would be precisely the same, as it would be in this country in the event of the King's becoming a Catholic; it would seem therefore that the objection of Protestants to the deposing power of the Pope is intended not so much in favour of the person of the monarch as of the rights of the people; they do not appear to object to punishing a heretic even ultimately with death, so much as to the assumption of that authority by a tribunal which they do not consider, and which I do not consider competent.

Appendix, N^o 12.Further Examination of the Very Reverend Bartholomew Crotty, D. D.

Thursday, 9th November 1826.

WHEN a Professorship becomes vacant what steps are taken to make it known publicly, in order that proper persons may be induced to offer themselves as candidates?—There is a notice or proclamation put upon the doors of the College; we generally put up three, on three of the halls, the prayer hall and two of the study halls; the Students immediately come to a knowledge of the thing, and it is circulated as effectually as if it were put in the newspaper. The notice specifies the chair that is vacant, and states that a concursum will be held for it, in sixty days after the advices are put up; any person who may intend to apply, must bring testimonials from his Bishop and have the permission of the Trustees to offer himself as a candidate; or as there may be no opportunity in the interim of obtaining such permission from the Board, it is sufficient in such case, to obtain leave from two of those Trustees who are at the same time Visitors.

Is any other step taken to make the thing public, than the proclamation you describe?—No, nothing more.

Rev.B. Crotty, D. D.

Is there no communication made to the individual Bishops throughout the country?—No.

Is the proclamation itself circulated at all?—No; it is affixed with wafers to the doors of the halls, and by that means it comes to the knowledge of the whole community. The thing is done exactly as the statutes prescribe.

To whom do the candidates announce themselves?—To the President.

Will you state to whom their testimonials are referred, and by whom they are examined?—The testimonials, as I said before, are given them by the Bishop of the diocese to which they belong, if they happen to be persons that do not reside in the College; if they be members of the College, we know ourselves, without making any reference to the Bishops, the character of the person, and are acquainted with his qualifications for the place to which he aspires; but if he be an extern, we require that he shall have a testimonial from his Bishop, declaring that he has made the course of studies in some other College or University, or perhaps in Maynooth itself, that he is a person of good character and conduct, and a person that he can safely recommend as fit for the situation that he offers himself as a candidate for.

Do you think it would be for the advantage of the College that the Professors should be chosen from amongst those who have been educated in it, in preference to those who have received their education abroad?—I believe the feeling of the Trustees, founded on a wish to encourage learning and study in the College, is to prefer ceteris paribus those that have studied in the house. I have heard a suggestion to that effect thrown out at the Board; but I cannot say whether it will be much attended to in practice.

By whom are the candidates examined?—By the persons mentioned as judges, in the statutes; the President, the Vice-President, the Deans, and the Professors of Divinity, and of Scripture; and if there be in the house a second Professor belonging to that faculty, for which provision is to be made, he also is introduced as an examiner. When I say, that they are to be examined by those persons, I do not mean that every one must actually examine, but they must all be present, because they have to give their opinions regarding the merits of the candidates.

Is this examination a thing that lasts long?—It lasts as long as the statutes prescribe, that is, two hours a day for four days.

When an examination has taken place is the result of it in any way certified to the Trustees by whom the election is made?—Yes, it is certified by the President; each of those who have assisted as judges at the examination, after it is over, writes down the name of the person whom he considers the best of the candidates. He folds up and seals the paper and gives it to the President; he incloses all those papers in one general cover, and seals them in the presence of those persons; he keeps them until the following meeting of the Board of Trustees, when they are opened. The Trustees are not bound by our statutes, to go according to the majority of the votes of the judges; they can chuse any one of the candidates they think proper.

Have the persons who have been the judges, any voice whatever in the nomination of the Professor?—No further than merely a directive voice expressive of their opinion of his superior competency; the nomination depends absolutely on the Trustees.

Has it frequently happened that the person, whom the judges have certified as being the best qualified, has not been the one elected?—We have had only one instance of a concursum, since the new statutes were made.

In that case was the person elected, the one who was recommended by the judges?—The President can know only by report what number of judges there may be for each of the candidates.

Is that known only to the Trustees?—Yes.

Will you describe in what way the opinions of the judges are transmitted to the Trustees; is a statement of the opinions sent to each Trustee?—The opinions are not given in to the Trustees till they assemble at Board, and then the packet in which they are contained is handed in, sealed by the President, to whoever is chairman for the day.

What number of Trustees must attend at an election?—Seven are necessary to compose a Board. They are seldom, on such occasions, confined to that number.

Can the absent Trustees vote by proxy?—No; I remember on one occasion when there was a question of appointing a physician, that some of the absent Trustees did send their votes in favour of certain persons; but I cannot now take upon myself to say, whether the votes were admitted as valid or not. The Roman Catholic Archbishop of Cashel was in a very bad state of health at the time; he sent his vote by Doctor Everard.

Do you know whether that has ever taken place at the election of any Professor?—It never has; the truth is, we never had a concursum till about six weeks ago.

Can the Commissioners be supplied with the names of the persons who have conducted the Retreats for the last ten or twelve years?—Yes, I think we can make them out, perhaps not exactly specifying the person for each year, but we can supply the names of the persons that have made the Retreats during that time.

Can you state from recollection what number of persons have conducted Retreats, who have not belonged to the establishment?—In my time there has been nobody not belonging to the establishment, but Mr. Kenney, of Clongowes.

Has he conducted more than one Retreat?—I believe he conducted two.

What determines who the person shall be that is to conduct any particular Retreat?—It is considered one of the ordinary duties of the Dean; but in order to vary the instructions, a person is sometimes called from abroad; in which cases the Board of Trustees are generally informed previously of the wish to have a person from abroad. The Retreats have been always,

always, in my time conducted, with the two exceptions I have stated, by the Deans. On those occasions, I mentioned to the Trustees, that it probably would be useful to the Students to have a stranger to conduct the Retreat, and as Mr. Kenney was known before to have done it, and to have done it very well, we applied to him, and he consented to come.

What communication has the person conducting the Retreat, with the Students?—None, but publicly; or if any of them have a mind to confess to him, when the Retreat is about closing, they are at liberty to do so, if his avocations will allow him to hear them.

Does he not give an exhortation once or twice a day in the hall?—He gives an exhortation generally once a day. He gives out the subject of meditation also.

What length of time does that exhortation occupy?—I should think from thirty-five minutes to three quarters of an hour.

What subjects does it embrace?—Moral subjects; the duties of ecclesiastics, zeal, piety, attention to their studies, and other matters of that sort, connected with their profession as clergymen; the observance of the rule of the house is generally very much insisted upon.

Is it entirely confined to the subjects you have named?—I think those subjects I have mentioned comprise the entire.

There has been some contrariety in the evidence, as to whether it is once, twice, thrice or four times in the day, that the person conducting the Retreat addresses the assembled students; can you inform the Commissioners with certainty upon that subject?—The order of the Retreat is not precisely the same every year. The Dean may read or order to be read by one of the Students, a portion of some spiritual work. The exhortation is given only once a day; there is also giving out the subject of meditation, and explaining that subject on the day following, which may sometimes be done orally, but more frequently by reading some spiritual work on the subject.

Then it is but twice a day that the person conducting the Retreat addresses the Students?—It is properly speaking only once a day, rarely twice, though the community is assembled oftener for prayer and pious reading.

What are the usual subjects proposed for meditation in the manner you describe?—The subjects proposed for meditation generally are, the duties of clergymen on the score I have mentioned, with regard to piety, observance of rule, the necessary dispositions for administering worthily the sacraments of the Church, the four last things, Heaven, Hell, Death and Judgment.

Those subjects form the subject matter of explanation upon the day following?—Yes.

The exhortation and the explanation are distinct?—The explanation is the meditation that was given to the Students on the preceding day, evolved and amplified; sometimes by the person who gives the Retreat; but more frequently by reading aloud, for the assembled community, some spiritual work which treats the subject, such as Chaloner's Meditations, or other works of that sort.

Do all the Students assemble upon those occasions?—They are all obliged to assemble. We have two Retreats in the year; one of them previous to the general ordination, and the other at the commencement of the academical year. At the commencement of the academical year, the Students are all obliged to attend during the same time; but at the other Retreat, which is for Orders, the Juniors finish before the others. As they are not to take Orders, their Retreat does not last for so many days.

Have there ever been any other subjects proposed for meditation, except those you have enumerated?—I cannot take upon me precisely to say, but I can say that I never knew any subject proposed for meditation, that was not edifying and improving to the Students.

Are there not amongst the statutes some that regulate the publication of any book that may be written at any time by any Professor or Student in the College; if so, will you have the goodness to refer to them?—There are statutes regarding that matter. One of them is as follows: "Si quid scriptorum suorum Magistratus alumnusve edere voluerit, id facito, Præside concedente, a quo Curatores jus repetituri sunt, quidquid improbè positum in istis lucubrationibus exstiterit: si Præses intercesserit quin edatur, alteri provocationem ad Curatores habento. Judices hi dabunt in causâ non pessimâ Magistratus, Academicos a se delectos, qui si rectè fieri posse statuerint, causamque receperint, liber editor, Judicium ipsorum periculo."—"Neque tamen ab iis Judicibus stipulamur, ut penæ culpæve proximi videantur, nisi liber iste ab egregia doctrina sapientiæve commendatus erit, verum si quid extulerit Religioni, Moribus, Disciplinæ, Republicæ, Regiis honoribus contrarium." The other is—"Si quis omnium libros scriptave evulgaverit, edentibusve conscius fuerit, Præside et inscio et improbante, exigitor."

In addition to the printed statutes, are there not some bye-laws which are recited for the Students when the statutes are read, one of which prohibits newspapers and political works; and are not the Students informed twice a year, that such works shall not be introduced into the College without particular leave?—There are many prohibitions of that sort to be found in the transactions of the Board.

It appears that there is in the Minute-book of the Trustees a Resolution in the following words: "Resolved, That the introduction of Newspapers, and other periodical publications, amongst the Students, has alienated them from the necessary attention to their studies, and other duties, and that the President be and is hereby required to prevent it;" is that one of the prohibitions to which you referred?—It is.

Has any breach of the statute regulating the publication of any works written by the Professors or Students, occurred since you have been President of the College?—In one instance there has.

Examination of
Rev.

B. Crotty, D. D.
9 November 1826.

Will you be so good as to describe the particulars of that instance?—It was in the case of Doctor Mac Hale, who was some time ago Professor of Divinity in the College.

In what way did he break that statute?—He published a series of letters in the papers, under the signature of "Hierophilos," which were afterwards collected into a pamphlet. For doing so he had not the permission or approbation of the President, nor did he look for it.

Was it known at the time to yourself, or to the Professors in the College, that he was the author of those letters?—It might be known to some individuals in the College, but not to me, at the time they were published in the papers.

At the time that he collected them into the form of a pamphlet, was it known to you that he was the author of them?—I had heard it reported, about the time that they were published in the form of a pamphlet, that he was the author; but I had no knowledge on the subject officially. I mean any, whereby I could bring it home to him that he was the author.

Had you any doubt in your own mind that he was the author?—After they were published in that form, I had doubts in my mind, or suspicions rather.

Was any copy of those letters presented to you?—Not of the letters of "Hierophilos." I purchased them.

Was there not, in addition to the original letters of "Hierophilos," a letter to Mr. Canning?—There was.

Was it known to you, at the time, that that was written by Doctor Mac Hale?—No, as far as I can recollect. I had some reason to think, either during the time that Dr. Mac Hale was writing the letter to Mr. Canning, or after the publication of it, that he was the writer of that letter; but I had no intimation of it from himself, or from any person whom I could make use of as a witness, if necessary, to prove that he was the writer.

Did any communication take place between yourself and him, upon the subject of either of those letters?—No communication, further than this; that some time after the letter to Mr. Canning was published, he sent me a copy of it, without saying that he was the writer himself.

Did you not conclude from that, that in all probability he must be the writer of it?—I did infer that in my own mind, certainly; but my suspicions, however strong, would not amount to legal proof. Had I attempted, on the strength of it, to remove Dr. Mac Hale from the College, he would prove the proceeding to be illegal, and would get himself restored by the Visitors.

Were there any words written on it, intimating that it was a presentation copy from the author?—No; his name was not to it, nor was it said that he was the author. I believe he handed it to me himself.

Would it be held, if a pamphlet were published by any of the professors of Maynooth, without the name of the author, or without his distinctly avowing it, that no breach of that statute would have been incurred?—I should think there might be a breach of the statute incurred, though the author published it under an assumed name.

If the President had reason to believe, that an individual had published a pamphlet though he had not thought it prudent to put his name to it, would he not think himself justified under those circumstances, in putting the question to the Professor, and reducing him to the necessity of saying, whether he had been guilty of a breach of the statute or not?—I should think it not quite fair in such a case to oblige a man to become his own accuser. If he refused to answer the question, I should not conceive myself warranted in taking further proceedings; a good deal, however, would depend upon the nature of the publication; if there were any thing in it hostile to the established government of the country, if it contained any thing like sedition or treason, I should think it would be strictly obligatory on the President to make inquiry into the business, and to endeavour to ascertain who the writer was, or whether he was a subject of the house, and if the reputed author refused to answer the question put to him, I would conceive it my duty to refer the matter to the Trustees.

In that case would not the President erect himself into the situation of a judge, whether the pamphlet was harmless or not, when the statute prescribes generally, that all works should be published under the same regulation?—The statute generally directs, that all works published by any person in the College, should have the sanction of the President; I think, however, there is some room for interpretation in the business, because a person might publish a work that was perfectly harmless, containing nothing contrary to moral obligations, and particularly nothing contrary to the duties of subjects to their sovereign; it might be a treatise on science or on languages, and in such cases I should think that if a Professor published a work under an anonymous signature, it would be rather severe in the President to proceed against him; because he might have reasons for not wishing his name to be known; he might be unwilling to appear before the public as a writer of such a work until he had first ascertained whether the work was approved by the public; whether it was a work that would do any credit to himself or to the College to which he belonged.

Does not every individual, who accepts the situation of Professor in the College of Maynooth, and who must know what the statutes are by which he is bound, forego the advantage you describe, and voluntarily put himself into a situation in which he cannot have the advantage of publishing what he pleases without putting his name to it?—A Professor does certainly forego that advantage, and is in some degree blameable for not looking for the permission of the President; but I think, at the same time, that it would be very hard to visit with expulsion a violation of the statute, supposing the work to be such as I have described. If a charge were made and brought home to a Professor of having violated the statute in question, I should conceive myself bound to punish the violation; but I do not think myself bound, in every case, to originate an inquiry of that nature.

If that is your opinion, would it not be better to provide by the statute, that the President should have the power of permitting a work to be published without the author's name, and that he himself, under such circumstances, if he saw no reason to disapprove of it, should not be bound to make it public; but does not the interpretation of the rule you have alluded to, ensure a real breach of the statute?—There are many other statutes which, in my opinion, must be allowed to admit of interpretation. I will instance that one which forbids the Students, under pain of expulsion, to separate while on the public walks from the general body, or to withdraw themselves to such a distance as that they cannot be seen by the Dean at every part of the walk. I myself have witnessed breaches of that statute, in cases where I should think myself acting a very harsh part, if I were to enforce the punishment.

Would not the rule you have described, as applied to the statute you have read, necessarily lead to this conclusion, that no person would be guilty of a breach of the statute, provided he only published that which, in the opinion of the President, would appear to be unobjectionable, would not the President thus have a dispensing power over the statute?—I think by the statute the President has a power of judging, at his own risk, whether the matter contained in the book is exceptionable or otherwise.

With respect to the pamphlet published by Doctor Mac Hale, did it not appear to you to be written for the purpose of proving that the established church in this country was an useless, and even a mischievous establishment, and did it not plainly insinuate, if not distinctly say, that the entire devotion of the property of the church, and the adoption of another mode of paying it, would be generally beneficial to the country?—I read Doctor Mac Hale's letter to Mr. Canning in a very cursory way, some time after it came out; the impression on my mind is, that the object mentioned was not the principal one that Doctor Mac Hale had in view in writing the pamphlet, but that he did incidentally introduce expressions which seemed to have the tendency just mentioned. I do believe, at the same time, that Doctor Mac Hale in using those expressions conceived that he was perfectly justified, at least by the example of others, who had advanced, frequently, similar opinions in the public papers, and in the parliamentary debates, as given in the public papers. I do not approve of Doctor Mac Hale's having written as he did write, on the authority of the precedents I have mentioned. I would add, that I think there are many circumstances which palliate in a great measure the imprudence of which Doctor Mac Hale was guilty, as a Professor in the College of Maynooth.

Do you think that the same latitude of political discussion ought to be admitted within the walls of Maynooth, that must necessarily exist within the walls of Parliament?—By no means; I think that political discussion should be entirely excluded from within the walls of Maynooth.

Was it not Doctor Mac Hale's peculiar office, as Lecturer of Dogmatic Theology, to communicate to the Students whatever impressions they were to receive, as to the nature and authority of the established church of this country?—Doctor Mac Hale's obligation, as far as our statutes imposed an obligation on him, is clearly expressed with regard to the government of the country. I do not recollect any statute which has a reference to the established church, unless, inasmuch as it is a portion of the Protestant church. Whatever is taught in our theological tracts regards Protestants generally; there is scarcely any thing exclusively applicable to the Protestant churches of England or Ireland.

Does it not form a necessary part of his course of lectures in Dogmatic Theology, to bring under the observation of the Students the marks of the true church and the marks of all false churches dissenting from it, and to bring them into comparison with each other?—That is a part of his obligation.

Are there not nearly sixty pages of the Class Book from which he lectured, which are occupied exclusively with the controversy between the Church of England and the Roman Catholic church?—I believe there is that number of pages, or more, on the general controversy between Catholics and Protestants, regarding the marks of the true church.

Then was he not precisely the Professor in Maynooth to whom the whole subject matter of the established church, as far as it comes at all under the observation of the Students, belonged?—He was the particular person, as Professor of Dogmatic Divinity, who was to explain to the Students the marks of what we consider the true church; to prove that those marks agree with the Catholic church, and that they are not to be found in the Protestant church; but I do not recollect, that there is any thing in the Class Book that goes further than mere polemical discussion on the differences between the two churches. Any discussion regarding the Protestant church, as an establishment, is rather political than theological.

Do not you think that any opinions that might be submitted to the Students in a political pamphlet upon the subject of the established church, would come with more weight from the person whose office it was to lecture to them upon that subject, than from any other person in the community?—I think it is very natural to suppose that Dr. Mac Hale's opinions on the points which, as a Professor, he is obliged to introduce into his lectures, would be attended to by the Students; but I think that a discussion regarding the Protestant church, as an establishment, has no place whatever in our course of divinity, and that upon such matters his opinion is not likely to be paid more attention to than that of any other divine in the house, or of a mere layman. Many laymen are unquestionably better qualified than he to discuss the subject of the church's temporalities.

Rev.B. Crotty, D. D.
9 November 1826.

If his lectures in the morning have reference to the spiritual nature of the established church, do not you think it objectionable that the persons who have been attending those lectures, should read in the afternoon a pamphlet on the political rights of the same church, well understood to be the composition of the lecturer?—The spiritual rights of the true church, whatever they may be, depend entirely on Revelation; the temporal rights of any church establishment are determined by law; and though Dr. Mac Hale should have proved in the morning, that the Protestant church was not the true church, it does not follow that its temporal rights would be in any manner endangered thereby.

If the lecture in the morning relate only to the spiritual views that may be taken of the established church, and if the pamphlet which is to be read after that lecture, embraces both spiritual and political views of the same church, do not you consider that, in itself, to be a state of things open to strong objection at Maynooth?—I think, that though the pamphlet may contain passages which have a reference to the spiritual and to the temporal rights of the church, those things are perfectly and easily distinguishable, and that a Student who knows, as all our divinity Students must know, that every case where property is concerned, is to be decided by the law of the land, will be in no danger of confounding them together.

You stated, that Dr. Mac Hale's course in publishing that work was not approved of by you; was your disapprobation made known or marked in any way?—No; the general feeling in the house, as far as I was able to ascertain it, was, that the pamphlet was one which it would have been better not to have published; and I can judge, that such was the feeling of the community at large, from the very small number of copies that were sold in the College.

Had you any means of knowing what number of copies were sold and circulated in the College?—I learned from the bookseller who printed the pamphlet, that there were no more than twenty-four disposed of in the College. The purchase even of that small number is to be taken much more as a personal compliment to Dr. Mac Hale, than as an approbation of the principles he advocated. The thing scarcely excited any interest, or made any impression on the Students. The present inquiry will make many look for the pamphlet, who would otherwise never think of it.

If that pamphlet had not been published by an individual connected with the College of Maynooth, would it have come within the description of those, the circulation of which would not have been permitted by the rules?—I should not consider myself bound to prohibit the pamphlet, because I never prohibited in the College any pamphlet written on the other side of the question.

Can you state to the Commissioners, whether the pamphlet of "Declan," to which that of "Hierophilos" is in some degree an answer, was or was not circulated in the College?—It was circulated.

Did you take any step to prevent the circulation or reading of the pamphlet of "Declan"?—No step whatever.

Was "Declan" sold within the College?—Yes; every one that wished, bought it.

Was it brought to the College for the purpose of sale?—It was sold at the College gate. Some of the Students got it from Dublin, and many of the Professors purchased it.

In one of your answers upon a former day, you stated, that when the statutes are read twice a year, there are a few bye-laws which have not been printed, which are also recited for the Students, and that among them there is a prohibition of newspapers and periodical works, which are not suffered to be introduced?—I perceive by the words of the resolution now before me, which is the bye-law to which I referred, that the prohibition is of newspapers and other periodical publications.

Is that law read in English or in Latin?—It is read in English.

Do you conceive that periodical works, as a class, are more objectionable than political works, to be introduced into Maynooth?—Periodical works, I conceive, to be more indefinite in their nature; there are very few of them that do not contain something exceptionable, and when I say political works, I mean principally those works that have been written of late years on the subject of the Catholic claims. We have at all times a number of political works.

Are the Commissioners to understand, that it is an object of the regulation, that periodical works, not of a political character, should be excluded?—Periodical works, in general, are excluded by the resolution of the Board.

But political works, if not periodical in their nature, may be admitted?—They may be admitted in particular cases.

Which character do you conceive in itself constitutes a work more objectionable at Maynooth, its being a periodical work, or its being a political work?—Periodical works cannot be said to be objectionable, till we know what the contents of them may be; they may be very good, or they may be very bad; but I believe, when the Trustees made this regulation, they had in view periodical works then publishing in Dublin, such as Cox's Magazine and some others, which they considered as unfit reading for the Students.

Do you consider political pamphlets to fall within the meaning of periodical publications?—No; I do not consider an individual pamphlet to be a periodical work; it must come out at certain stated times in order to be periodical.

Are the Commissioners to understand, that the result of the whole is, that you conceive all periodical works to be excluded, but no political works to be excluded, unless they are also periodical?—I conceive that political works are and ought to be excluded, when the politics are of a dangerous tendency.

Are we to understand, that the object of the regulations to which we have now been referring, is only to exclude periodical works, whether they be political or not, but not to exclude exclude political works, unless they be also periodical?—I think that, as the law is a restrictive one, it ought to be taken in the strict sense, and that, though I would from motives of prudence, and in order to attain the objects that the Trustees had in view in prohibiting periodical works, exclude likewise political ones of a dangerous tendency, yet I would not conceive myself bound to a general exclusion of political works, as the regulation does not say that all such shall be excluded.

With respect to one of Dr. Mac Hale's books in question, the fact being, that it consists of about twenty letters published at various periods in the newspapers, and afterwards collected into one volume; do you conceive that that volume falls within the description of a periodical work, or that it is to take its character merely as a political one?—I consider that the letters mentioned are not, properly speaking, either political or periodical works; I mean only the letters of "Hierophilos," written on the Bible Society business; and a few more that were added in an after edition published in London.

Do you consider the Letter to Mr. Canning as a political publication?—I do; I think there is a good deal of politics in the Letter to Mr. Canning. I believe, firmly, that Dr. Mac Hale, when he wrote that letter, acted more from his knowledge of the political discussions that were carrying on in Ireland, and from what he conceived to be the necessity of repelling many charges that had been previously brought against the Irish Catholics, and against the College of Maynooth in particular, than from any dislike that he had to the established church, as a religious institution.

Do not you think he disliked it as a political institution, if not as a religious one?—I believe that Dr. Mac Hale's feelings towards the established church could not be as friendly towards it, either as a political or religious establishment, as the feelings of those who are members of that church. The same may be said, I believe, of the members of any other church.

The question distinctly is, whether you do not conceive, that he had a peculiar hostility to the established church, as a political institution?—There are evident marks, I think, in the pamphlet, of Dr. Mac Hale's disapproval of the established church, as a political institution, because Dr. Mac Hale conceived, that as a political institution it was decidedly hostile to what he conceived to be the just claims of the Roman Catholics, that the members of that church individually and collectively as a body, had shown a degree of hostility towards the Roman Catholic church, which he conceived to border upon either bigotry or intolerance. I could myself adduce many instances that this opinion of Dr. Mac Hale's was but too well founded.

Suppose the work addressed to Mr. Canning had been submitted to you before it was published, would you have felt it your duty to make any objection to it?—I would have felt it my duty to endeavour to persuade Dr. Mac Hale to alter those passages that I think are considered as the most obnoxious.

At the time when that pamphlet was published, was Dr. Mac Hale considered a person who was to continue in the house as a Professor?—Dr. Mac Hale, at the time the pamphlet was published had been elected, as far as the clergy of Ireland could elect him, Coadjutor to the Roman Catholic Bishop of Killala, that is to say, the postulation on his behalf was sent over to Rome; it had been sent some years before, and was then renewed, and as the objections which originally prevented his immediate nomination were removed, there was no doubt he would be appointed in a very short time. We considered him as about to be appointed coadjutor bishop, and consequently to leave the house.

What was the nature of the objections which prevented his nomination at first?—I understood the objection to Dr. Mac Hale's appointment arose merely from Dr. Waldron not having certified, which it was necessary he should do, that his old age and infirmities required that he should have an assistant; this was satisfactorily stated in a subsequent postulation, and there could be no doubt, consequently, of Dr. Mac Hale's appointment.

Supposing that Dr. Mac Hale had continued at the College of Maynooth, and you had found, or had reason to apprehend, that he was in the habit and practice of writing letters of the nature and in the temper of the Letter to Mr. Canning, would you have felt it your duty to interfere, for the purpose of preventing his doing so?—Were I aware, from a more attentive perusal of the pamphlet, that there was just cause of dissatisfaction given either to His Majesty's government, or to the established church, I would have considered it my duty to interfere, but from the impression made on my own mind, in turning over the pamphlet in a very cursory way, I did not look upon it in so serious a light, and I have never read a page of it since. I before mentioned, that I thought there were circumstances which might palliate the imprudence of Dr. Mac Hale in writing any thing about politics, he being a Member and Professor of Maynooth; as an illustration of what I meant, I beg leave to state to the Commissioners, one among many facts that came to my knowledge. In a public newspaper, which was supposed to be the organ of a large portion of the Protestant population of Ireland, including many of the clergy, it was roundly asserted, that the Roman Catholic clergy of Ireland was composed of men taken from the plough, and trained up in the College of Maynooth in principles of treason and sedition. As a proof of my not being disposed to enter into collision with the established church, I took no proceedings in consequence of this shameful attack. I could, had I meant to widen the breach already existing, have charged this person with being a liar and a calumniator, or I could have taken a more reasonable course, though perhaps more disagreeable to him, by bringing an action at law for defamation. I said nothing, however, on the subject until those charges were repeated, perhaps a year after, in the Courier, and avowedly on the strength of documents sent to the editor of that paper from Ireland, I then thought it necessary to interfere in defence of the establishment to which I belong, but instead of doing the thing in so public a way as might cause unpleasant discussion, I applied to his Excellency the Marquis Wellesley, and requested of him, as a particular favour, that he would either order an extraordinary visitation of the College, or, if he thought it more convenient, send down the Commissioners of Education Inquiry to examine, as minutely as they pleased, into the state of the College. His Excellency told me, that he conceived that there was no necessity for doing either, as the visitation by the Chief Judges was to take place in about three or four months after. When the visitation did come on, I stated to the Lord Chancellor and to the other Judges, the nature of those charges, and begged of them, either to continue the visitation, in order to satisfy themselves of the falsehood of those charges, or, if it would be more convenient to them, to hold an adjourned visitation. The Lord Chancellor said he would consider it his duty to do so, if he thought there was any ground for the charges brought against the College; but as he was perfectly satisfied that they had no foundation whatever in truth, he did not think such a proceeding necessary. He afterwards told me, in the presence of the Chief Baron O'Grady, that he himself had seen the words to which I alluded, and that he considered them a most shameful and most unjustifiable charge made on the College. Many other instances of this sort might be alleged. I think it but fair, therefore, when so much virulence is displayed upon one side of the question, to make some allowance for those who in writing on the other, may transgress the bounds of prudence or propriety.

Is there any thing in Dr. Mac Hale's pamphlet that particularly tends to the defence of Maynooth College?—I do not think that there is any thing connected with the College, nor do I mean to say, that Dr. Mac Hale's pamphlet was intended to rebut those charges; I merely mean to say, that when so much bad feeling is displayed on one side, it cannot be expected that every thing will be cool and dispassionate on the other.

Was not Dr. Mac Hale's pamphlet published prior to the appearance of the paragraphs to which you have alluded?—No; the paragraph in the Antidote, to which I allude, was published before Dr. Mac Hale's pamphlet, as were many others of a similar tendency.

At what time did Dr. Mac Hale cease to act as Professor of Dogmatic Theology at Maynooth?—In the month of June, 1825.

Who acted as Professor of Dogmatic Theology from that period till the appointment of Mr. Higgins?—Dr. Kelly, who is now Roman Catholic Bishop of Dromore.

We beg your attention to the following clause in the Statutes, "Quod reliquum est, ut omnes Academici percalleant, quid quemque facere, quid vitare oporteat, ad principia anni perpetuò Academici hæ leges a Præsidi in ædiculâ recitantur, aut a Magistratû, Præsidi jubente, posteaquam Sancto Spiritui sacerdotes ad altare implorantes fecerint lege atque more sacro-sancto." Will you have the goodness to explain to us the meaning of the latter clause of that sentence?—After mass being celebrated, and the assistance of the Holy Ghost prayed for, in the chapel, previous to reading the statutes.

Is the object of that, a sort of solemn adjuration that all persons should be bound to attend to the statutes?—Yes; and that they might have an opportunity of imploring the divine assistance to enable them to observe them.

Is that form now observed in reading them?—The statutes are not read immediately after mass; the Students are always obliged to attend mass in the morning, and perhaps it is not till twelve o'clock that the statutes are read.

So that the reading of the statutes is not such a solemn act as that statute would appear to imply?—There is the interval which I mention between mass and the reading of the statutes.

The statutes appear to intend, that the one proceeding should follow immediately after the other?—They do.

But that is not the practice now?—Not exactly, nor do I know that it ever has been.

Can you state to us, whether any Professor at Maynooth, other than Dr. Mac Hale, has written any political pamphlets since the institution of the College?—I can say positively, that in my own time nothing of the sort has been written, nor do I know that there has at any other time.

Are we right in supposing, that there is any distinction between Professors and Lecturers at Maynooth?—There is.

Pray state the nature of it?—The Lecturers are assistants to the Professors, and do the duty of the Professor when he happens to be impeded from doing it himself, by sickness or occasional absence from the College.

Do they only lecture when the Professor is absent?—At present we have no Lecturers in the College; but when we had, besides lecturing for the general class, in the absence of the Professors, they used to give lectures to the first year's divines at a different time from that of the general classes of the house. The place of an absent Professor is now supplied by one of the senior Students.

Were they taken from amongst the Students; were they in fact themselves Students whilst they were acting as Lecturers?—No; it was after they had finished their studies, they were made Lecturers.

Were they taken from the Dunboyne Class?—Since the Dunboyne Class has been regularly organized, most of them have been taken from that, but not all.

Did they receive any emolument for the performance of the duty assigned to them?—They did.

What is the greatest number of Lecturers you have had at any particular time?—Since I have been in the College, we had never more than two at a time; one of Dogmatic, the other of Moral Divinity; each gave two lectures in the week to the second year's divines, divines, and occasionally supplied the place of the Professor to whose chair he was attached.

Are there any teachers of any description at Maynooth, except Professors and Lecturers?—No other, except that one person teaches Church Music, the Gregorian note.

Who is the present teacher of Church Music?—It is now taught by a Student; his predecessor was the Professor of Natural Philosophy, but he left the house last June.

Have you always had some person in that office?—Yes, always.

Does he give lessons to all the Students?—No; he gives lessons to what we call the first class, which perhaps may be composed of fourteen or fifteen young men, and they give lessons to the rest of the Students, who are distributed among them.

Does he give them instructions upon any instrument, or is it for the purpose of teaching them to recite certain parts of the service?—He teaches them merely the Gregorian Note.

What emolument does he receive for the performance of that duty?—When the Professor taught Church Music, he had I think, 10 £. a year, and I suppose the Student who teaches at present, will have the same.

Has there ever been any instance of which you have either known or heard of a stranger to the Institution, being admitted for the purpose of giving instructions of any kind or description to any of the Students?—I do not recollect any.

What is the distance of Clongowes from Maynooth?—About six miles.

Is there any intercourse between the inmates of the respective Institutions?—No; nothing that can be called intercourse; it has happened perhaps once in two or three years, that some of the boys at Clongowes, in their walks, have come over to see our Establishment.

The question does not now refer to the Students, but do the persons who are understood to assist Mr. Kenney at Clongowes, ever pay visits to Maynooth?—Mr. Kenney himself, and a few others of the gentlemen of the house have occasionally come over to dine with us. I suppose five or six times within the last ten or eleven years, and we have dined with them occasionally.

But there has been no further intercourse than what you have mentioned?—Nothing further.

How many Students have you had from Clongowes?—The number is very trifling; we have had two within my recollection, and there is one at present in the house who studied at Clongowes.

It has been mentioned in evidence, that there is a religious sodality or confraternity of some description subsisting at Maynooth; what is the name of it?—The Sodality of the Sacred Heart of Jesus.

Does it include within it any persons who are not inmates of the College of Maynooth?—No, our sodality does not; it is confined entirely to the College, and the portion of the Students that are members of it, is not numerous.

What may be about the number?—I do not know the precise number, nor any of the individuals; it varies, because our Students are in a state of fluctuation, some going and others coming; I suppose if there were sixty at any period it probably might be the greatest number there ever was.

Do any of the Professors belong to it?—Not that I know, it is left entirely to their own discretion; it is a devotion that is perfectly free.

How often does it occasion their meeting together as a Sodality?—They do not meet at all.

Does it not lead necessarily to some degree of intercourse or communion with each other, that distinguishes them from other members of the College?—No, there is no distinction whatever; they do not meet together to pray; each person when he becomes a member of it, is supposed to spend a certain time on some days each week in the chapel, which is not a matter of obligation with the other Students; he may chuse any vacant hour of the day he pleases, he goes there and says his prayers, and nobody knows by his going whether he belongs to the sodality or not, because it is quite a common thing with the Students who are not members, to go to the chapel out of the regular hours of prayer.

Then the sodality is rather in the nature of a peculiar rule imposed upon individuals, than any thing binding them together as a community?—Precisely so, but the rule is not imposed upon them; they voluntarily undertake it themselves.

We beg to draw your attention again to this statute: "Si quis omnium libros Scriptave evulgaverit, edentibusve conscius fuerit, Præside et inscio et improbante, exigitur." That law imports, that persons guilty of the conduct there stated are to be expelled; do you consider that the operation of that law does not apply to a person who publishes an anonymous pamphlet?—I consider that the statute, taken in the rigour of the wording, might apply to a person that publishes under either his real or an assumed name.

Would the anonymous publisher of a pamphlet be free from the operation of the statute as it appears to you?—I do not think he would; but I think that in order that the President should be obliged to act upon that statute, there should be some official information given him, and likewise sufficient proof that the person to whom the work is attributed, was really the author of it.

Do you not think that it would be the duty of the President, in such a case, to call the person suspected before him, and to ask him whether he was or was not the author of the work?—I should think that if the work were clearly an improper one; if it contained any thing flagitious, either against the peace of the country or against morals, the President would be bound to make every inquiry to ascertain who was the author.

Appendix, N^o 12.Examination of
Rev.

B. Crotty, D. D.

9 November 1826.

Would it be possible for you to enforce the discipline of the College, or to conduct its affairs with any hope of success, if you did not search to find out what breaches of rules were committed, and not wait till they were brought before you by any accidental means?—The means prescribed to me by the statutes for enforcing the rules are, the information given by the Deans, and other acting superiors, who are in more immediate contact with the Students and have more opportunities of ascertaining their conduct. I do not think it is the duty of the President to inquire in every case into a breach of rule.

Are not the Deans and other persons, who are under your jurisdiction, employed for that purpose?—They are; and it is my business to receive from them whatever communications they may wish to make regarding the conduct of the Students or Professors.

As no persons are employed to investigate whether the Professors abide by their duty or not, may it not fairly be inferred that that duty is entrusted to the President himself?—Of inquiring through the Deans, but not of inspecting immediately himself the conduct of the Students.

If you had strong reason to believe that a Professor so far neglected his duty as not to give the lectures required of him, although you had no positive proof of it, would you not think it your duty to ascertain whether it was the fact, and if it turned out to be the fact, should not you visit the Professor accordingly?—In a case of that sort I should of course consider it my duty to inquire, and if I found the Professor negligent, to take care and correct the abuse; that is a case of such a nature as to require the interference of the President, though no deposition should be brought before him, and one in which proof can easily be had of the guilt or innocence of the person accused.

In considering the subject of the breach of statutes, do you think there is any one statute that is to be enforced in preference to another; are not all to be enforced?—I conceive that all the statutes should be enforced as far as is necessary for the good order and good government of the house; but I conceive that there are some statutes of such a nature as that it would be extreme harshness to interpret them according to the bare letter of those statutes.

In what manner do the Professors subscribe to the statutes?—They do not swear to them, but they are obliged to make a declaration that they will conform to them.

If any infraction of the statutes should come to the personal knowledge of the President, would it not be competent to him, and his duty to inquire into it, although not officially reported to him?—I do not think it is his duty in every case.

Can you state any cases in which you think it is not his duty to do so?—Such cases are of so trivial a nature, as that the infliction of the severe punishment of expulsion, would be manifestly too severe for the violation supposed; for instance, we are in the habit of allowing young men occasionally to come to Dublin; they generally return on cars, and are ordered to be at home commonly on the day on which they get leave to go up; it might happen, however, that an afternoon would be so wet as manifestly to endanger their health, or their lives, were they to travel to the College in the evening.

Are there any cases of infraction of the statutes coming to the the personal knowledge of the President, without being officially communicated to him, on which he would not think it his duty to act; in other words would the mere want of official communication ever be a sufficient reason for not proceeding upon any infraction of the statutes, if otherwise it would be the duty of the President to do so?—I beg leave to answer, as I did before, that if the breach of statute reported to the President, though not officially, were of so grievous a nature as to require the remedy being applied, which the President is empowered by the statute to make use of, I should think there is an obligation on him to interfere, and make every necessary inquiry, though there should be no official denunciation of the crime made to him.

Applying that rule to the law "Si quis omnium," &c. does it not seem to follow, that the publishing of a book itself is not a cause of offence, although published without the President's knowledge; but that the nature of the book so published is the thing that the President would take into consideration, and not the mere publishing of a book?—I should conceive that if the book be published under an anonymous signature, and that there be absolutely nothing that is reprehensible in the book, the answer above given might apply in such a case.

Then does it not follow, that that law is a dead letter?—By no means, because the books supposed to be published might in many instances be grievously objectionable, and in such case the President will be bound to interfere.

Supposing there were no law against the publishing of a book by a member of the College; if any member published a work, in itself grievously objectionable, would not that still be an offence cognizable by the President?—The President, in that case, having no statute to authorize him, could, as I conceive, proceed only on the law of the land, or by referring the matter to the Board of Trustees.

Will you have the goodness to look at the declaration at the end of the "Regula Pietatis;" it is called "Declarationes Alumnorum Collegii Romano-Catholici Apud Maynooth," and it is as follows: "Ego infra scriptus polliceor et spondeo me nec ullam conjurationis latentem societatem coire neque alias coitutum, meque diligenter et summâ fide servaturum omnia et singula statuta et constitutiones hujus Collegii, quamdiu in illo commorabor: nihilque ex animo facturum dicturumve quo dicta Statuta et Constitutiones quidquam detrimenti capiant, vel ad eorum violationem aut contemptum, cæteri Alumni inducantur. In quorum fidem hisce subscripsi;" Is that declaration made by the Professors as well as by the Alumni, supposing them to have been made Professors, without passing through the class of Alumni?—We have not required the Professors to make it who did not study in the house.

The Commissioners understand that Dr. MacHale did study in the house?—He did.

Therefore as an Alumnus he must have subscribed that declaration?—Yes.

Do not you think it might have a bad effect upon the Students of Maynooth, that they should know one of their Professors had violated a positive statute of the College, and that no notice had been taken of it?—I do think that the violation of a statute by a Professor must naturally produce a bad impression on the minds of the Students, according to the nature and importance of the statute violated.

Will you have the goodness to state, whether it is a practice at Maynooth for a Student to confine himself to two or three friends for the entire year, or whether he is at liberty to range and chuse his friends from the whole College?—They are at liberty to chuse their companions; there is no prohibition against their changing them whenever they please; but the Students of the same diocese do often associate and walk together, after breakfast and dinner, in parties of three or four.

Does that arise from a former knowledge of each other?—It may be from that circumstance, and from their being persons that are to live in connection with each other in after life.

Is such an arrangement reckoned desirable in the College, and rather encouraged, or is it left entirely to the choice of the young men?—It is left entirely to the choice of the young men.

They can change their friends whenever they please?—They can. We sometimes are under the necessity of keeping ill-conducted young men in the house, and other Students have been cautioned, privately, not to associate with such. This is the only restriction I know.

Appendix, N° 13.

Examination of the Reverend Michael Montague; Tuesday, 24th October 1826.

WHAT situation do you hold in the College?—I am Vice-President at present.

How long have you held that situation?—Ten years.

Were you connected with the College before you were appointed to that situation?—I was before Procurator or Bursar of the College for fourteen years.

Were you appointed Procurator at the institution of the College?—Not at the institution, for I made my studies at that College.

Were you ever at any other seminary of education?—Never at any other ecclesiastical seminary.

When were you first admitted as a Student?—In November 1795.

At its first establishment?—Yes.

Have you continued in it ever since?—I have.

What salary and emoluments do you receive as Vice-President?—£. 112 a year.

You live within the walls of the building?—I do; I have apartments in the house, and my commons.

And coals and candles?—Yes.

And a table furnished?—Yes, and the benefit of a servant.

Have you any allowance beyond the salary of 112*l.* a year?—No, I have no allowance, unless when I do the duty of Procurator. In consequence of the delicate health of the present Bursar, Mr. Cummins, I have discharged a considerable part of his duty for some years: he generally keeps the accounts, and I perform the active part of his office. When thus employed, I am allowed my expenses.

Will you describe the duties that you perform as Vice-President?—As Vice-President, my duty is to assist the President in supporting the order and rules of the College, to correct deviations from them, or report them to the President, in order to have them corrected, and when he is absent to supply his place.

Do any other duties fall to you than those which also are discharged by the President?—I am not strictly bound to any other, but at present I undertake to direct the junior Students of the house in the study of the Sacred Scriptures, and I also explain the catechism twice a week; they recite a chapter of the catechism, and account for three chapters of the Old Testament, which I afterwards explain. I endeavour to excite them to a diligent perusal of the text of the Sacred Scriptures, by showing them how useful and necessary an extensive knowledge of them is for the proper discharge of ecclesiastical functions, and recommend to them to make the historical books of the Old Testament their first study, in order to understand the other books, which continually refer to them.

With respect to the New Testament, what course do you pursue?—My class is a preparation for the study of the New Testament, which is explained to the Theologians by the Professor of Sacred Scripture.

To what class of Students is this instruction given?—It is given to the Rhetoric and to the Humanity classes.

At what hours do they attend you for this purpose?—They attend at one o'clock on Saturday for an hour, and on Wednesday from half-past ten to half-past eleven; two hours a week.

What catechism do you use?—Butler's Catechism.

Examination of
Rev.Michael Montague,
24 October 1826.

Appendix, N^o 13.Examination of
Rev.Michael Montague,
24 October 1826.

The large one?—Yes, the large catechism; they commit a chapter for each day, which I afterwards explain.

There is another, called Butler's Short Catechism, do you use that at all?—It is too short for them.

In explaining to the Students the history of the Old Testament, do you refer to any other work than the Rhemish version of the Old Testament itself?—I recommend Menochius to them; they are not all able to study a commentator with much advantage at that period of their studies. I recommend to them to read over Menochius, but it is by my own explanation that they are principally profited.

They only continue under your care for one year?—Yes, they all attend me for one year, and during that year they all procure Bibles, which they are admonished to read and study during their entire course.

Does every young man in the class procure a Bible for himself?—Every one.

Do they keep them in their own possession?—Yes.

Has that always been the regulation?—We could not conveniently get Bibles for them till Coyne's last edition appeared; they endeavoured to find copies in Dublin, but sometimes without success. They were required to procure them, and the majority did.

Is the edition you allude to, the stereotype edition that has been published lately by Coyne?—That is the one they have now in their hands.

At what price could a Rhemish Bible be procured before the publication of this late edition?—It was rather dear before this edition; the price was about a guinea and a half; but if they happened to find a second-hand copy in a shop, they might get it for about a guinea.

At what price is it now sold?—Fourteen shillings, I believe.

At the time the instruction was given to you in the College, was the same course pursued with regard to Scripture instruction?—For a part of my time the Professor of Dogmatic Theology obliged every Student of his class to commit a few verses of the New Testament for every day, and a chapter for Sunday, which he explained; and besides many of us formed a little society after supper, for the reading and explaining the Scriptures; some came every evening prepared, after reading commentaries, to explain the difficult passages for their companions.

What was the lowest class that formed a part of this Society for studying the Scriptures?—As many as wished to attend were at liberty; even the fresh men who had just come to College.

Did they attend?—Many of them did.

About how many may that Society have consisted of at the time you speak of?—I think it consisted of nearly half the Students of the College; sixty was the entire number. When Doctor Flood was appointed President, he explained the Scripture himself; and he did so while he remained there, and was in health.

What religious instruction have the young men generally received before they come as Students into the College?—The same instruction with the laity; no particular instructions.

Can they generally say the catechism?—Certainly; all Catholics are obliged to have a knowledge of the catechism. But young men destined for the ecclesiastical state should read books of piety, such as the Introduction to a Devout Life, the Imitation of Christ by Thomas-a-Kempis, the Spiritual Combat, &c.

Will you describe the nature of Menochius's Commentary upon the Scriptures?—The merit of Menochius's Commentary, consists in its being a very clear, faithful and short Commentary.

How many volumes does it consist of?—Three volumes.

What may be the price of it?—It costs the College 2*l.*; we sell it cheaper to the young men.

What access have the Students of the junior class to Menochius's Commentary?—They are obliged to procure it the first year for themselves; every Student is obliged to procure a Bible and Commentary as soon as he comes to the College.

And that Commentary which he is obliged to procure, is Menochius's?—Yes, it is considered a good commentary; being very short and clear, and containing very few notes that are objectionable.

Do you conceive that in point of fact, all the Students in the junior class at present are furnished each with a copy of the Scriptures, and with the Commentary of Menochius?—I do not know any exception to it. Before I began to lecture to them it was Reeves's History, that they were in the habit of accounting for; but I did not think that was at all sufficient for clergymen, and I made them study the letter of the Scripture.

How long has the regulation been such as you describe it to be, namely, that every Student in the junior class, should have both a Bible and Menochius's Commentary on it?—The regulation has been so for about ten years.

Do they keep both the Bible in the English translation and Menochius's Commentary, in their own private room, and have access to both whenever they please?—Yes; and we recommend the constant reading of the Bible, as it is quite necessary for a clergyman to be well acquainted with it.

Besides the English edition of the Bible, is it not a fact that those intended for holy orders, most of them have a Latin Vulgate?—They should have it; it is very hard to procure it in this country at present.

Menochius's

Menochius's Commentary is adapted to the Vulgate, is it not?—It is; we have some copies of the Latin Vulgate brought from France.

What countryman was Menochius?—He was an Italian

Of what age?—He was born in the sixteenth and died in the seventeenth century.

Has there been, since you were acquainted with the Institution, any perceptible difference in the class of persons from whom the Students of Maynooth have been derived; is it either higher or lower now than it was before?—I cannot say that there is any great difference. We have now some students of the first Catholic families; but I do not think there is any remarkable difference. The parents of the present Students are, I think, rather higher; but in consequence of paying pensions, the appearance of the Students is not more respectable.

Do you think that the young men who are now Students at Maynooth, are derived from nearly the same class that the persons were who, before the Institution of Maynooth, went into the Roman Catholic priesthood in Ireland?—I think so.

Speaking of the system of instruction given at Maynooth now, as compared with what it was on the first institution of it, is it improved in your opinion or altered in any respect?—It is somewhat improved, for we have now a regular Professor for every department; whereas for some years after the establishment of the Institution some department was left vacant; first, the chair of Moral Theology, then Sacred Scripture, and afterwards of Rhetoric.

Was the course of instruction the same at its first institution that it is now, with regard to the books taught and the hours at which the young men receive their instruction, and the mode in which it is given?—There is very little difference. We had Collet's Moral Theology at the commencement, but Bailly was in a very short time substituted for Collet. We read Bailly on Religion and the Church, before these tracts of Doctor Delahogue were printed; Bailly's was somewhat longer than Doctor Delahogue's.

Is Bailly a French writer?—Yes.

Of the Sorbonne?—Yes, of the last century, and of the present.

Do you observe any difference in the habits of the Students, are they now more or less orderly than heretofore?—I do think they are more orderly at present; at the commencement of the College there was a spirit of innovation and discontent afloat. I think the spirit at present is more orderly and more peaceable.

You refer to the year 1795?—Yes; and to some years after.

How many Students were there at that time?—There were fifty Students on the establishment at that time; other Students who were externs, were allowed to attend lectures.

What was the next increase?—The next was an increase of one from every diocese; it was an increase of from fifty to about sixty-nine or seventy, I think; and in a short time to two hundred.

Excepting in the duty that you have of giving instruction to the young men in the manner you have described, is there any thing in the duties you discharge, that differs at all from the general duties discharged by the President, which you share in common with him?—I take a more active part in supporting discipline. I discharge, in fact, nearly the same duties with the Deans. I inspect books, visit rooms, rebuke such as violate rule or idle away their time; and since the illness of the Bursar, I purchase all the provisions of the College and superintend their consumption.

Are the visits made by the Deans and yourself to the rooms of the Students regular, or as chance may direct?—I cannot say that they are made very regularly by myself, because sometimes I am otherwise employed; but occasionally I visit them.

Is there any regular time of visiting the rooms?—By the statutes of the house, the Deans are obliged to visit them each once a week.

At any particular hour?—At no fixed hour; the object is to take them by surprise.

Can you state, with any degree of accuracy, how many Students are sent out annually from Maynooth College, to supply the wants of the priesthood in Ireland, upon an average?—Since the house was increased, we send out at least forty every year; but I think this year we will send out fifty.

You probably have been present at all the visitations of the College at Maynooth?—I have.

They take place once every three years?—Yes.

Will you describe what ordinarily passes at those visitations; and first, will you describe the one at which, according to your recollection, the most business was done; the one which occupied the longest time?—The one at which the most business was done, was that which took place in 1819; it occupied at least three hours. There were two cases of appeal; one by Mr. Shermon, a Student, who was deprived of his place on the establishment, and not called to holy orders, after completing the usual course of the College; the other appellant was Mr. Burke, a physician, who considered himself aggrieved in not being named to succeed Dr. Egan as the regular physician of the College.

Was there any other business that you can recollect done upon that occasion?—There was no other business on that occasion, but at the previous visitation in 1816, there were also two appeals; one by two Students, who were expelled for a violation of the statutes; and a second by a Student named O'Sullivan, who had been examined for a place on the O'Sullivan foundation, but not judged fit for admission.

Were the Protestant visitors at liberty, under the regulations, to examine and adjudicate upon those two matters you have now mentioned?—They were qualified.

Appendix, N^o 13.Examination of
Rev.Michael Montague,
24 October 1826.

Did they exercise the power?—They did, and with so much regard to the discipline of the College, that their decisions gave general satisfaction.

What is the greatest length of time that you can recollect any visitation to have occupied?—The visitation of 1819 was the longest of all.

What is the least space of time you recollect any visitation to have occupied?—Some did not occupy more than half an hour. The Lord Chancellor, and the other chief Judges, attired in their robes, took their seats in our principal hall, where the entire community were assembled; and after a pause, the Lord Chancellor asked if any member of the community had any grievance to complain of. If all were silent, the court was in a few minutes dismissed.

Then in case of no grievance being brought before the Visitors, are the Commissioners to collect that the Visitors make no further inquiry?—That is the case.

And that is the whole process of visitation that has existed, according to your observation?—It is, unless on one occasion, when the Lord Chancellor, after opening the court, and before the usual address to the community, animadverted on the conduct of Mr. O'Sullivan, who refused to give testimony against some of his parishioners, guilty of some atrocity during the disturbances in that part of the country. He asked if his conduct was the consequence of the instruction he received in College, and approved of by the heads of the College. The President, in his reply, stated that he was not educated at Maynooth; that an ecclesiastic was not obliged, by any law or doctrine of the Catholic church, to decline generally to give testimony, when summoned before a magistrate; but that, in certain circumstances, giving testimony against criminals might be inexpedient, inasmuch as he might thereby render his ministry useless, by exciting violent prejudices against him.

Will you be so good as to mention the names of any individuals that you can recollect, who have received either the whole or any part of their education in the College of Maynooth, and who have subsequently conformed to the Established church?—The individuals who received the whole or part of their education at Maynooth, and who conformed to the Established church, are Messrs. Crowley, Cousins, Murray, Molony, Dixon, Brennan, and O'Brien. Mr. Synott, when his mind became disturbed, proposed to conform, if received without swearing to the Thirty-nine Articles.

Was there not a Mr. Kenney?—No, he was not in our house; he did not study at Maynooth, nor, I believe, in any college.

Was there not a Mr. Keary?—I do not recollect him.

Was there not a Mr. Hurly?—No; I did not hear that he conformed. I recollect Mr. Hurly studying at Maynooth, but I never heard that he conformed.

Did you ever hear of Mr. Hannan?—He did not study at Maynooth.

Are you certain of that?—If he was at Maynooth, he was not in our College. He might have been at the Lay College, and attended lectures for some time at the Ecclesiastical College, without my knowledge.

Have you any doubt that Mr. Hannan was a Roman Catholic priest?—I have none.

Have you any doubt that there was such an individual, who received orders in the Roman Catholic church?—None whatever.

Have you not heard that he conformed to the Established church?—Yes; but I am not sure that he studied at Maynooth.

What office did Mr. Crowley hold in the College, during your recollection?—He was first appointed Lecturer in Theology, after that he was appointed Professor of Scripture, and in a few months he resigned his place as Professor of Scripture to become Dean. He was Dean at the time he left the College.

Have you heard the subject of the Gallican Liberties, as they are called, much discussed in conversation at Maynooth, among the Professors and persons in authority?—Occasionally they speak of the Gallican liberties. Every one there is supposed to be well acquainted with them.

Is there any unanimous opinion upon the subject of them, as to whether it would be desirable that they should be adopted in this country, or not?—I have no recollection of their going so far as to wish to have them formally adopted in this country, but they are substantially adopted already, inasmuch as the principal propositions on which the Gallican liberties are founded, are defended by the Professors and Students of Maynooth.

You are acquainted of course, with the principles inculcated in Doctor Delahogue's Tract de Ecclesia?—I am.

Have you heard Doctor Delahogue lecture?—He was Professor of Moral Theology when I was a Student, and I have had no opportunity of hearing him lecture upon the principal propositions connected with the Gallican liberties; it was Doctor Aberne that lectured in my time; he was a Licentiate of the Sorbonne, and he was as great a defender as any Frenchman of the Gallican liberties.

Did he inculcate, with regard to the Cis-alpine doctrine, the same principles that Doctor Delahogue inculcates in his Tract de Ecclesia?—He did; but I think he was more vehement than even Doctor Delahogue himself in condemning Ultramontane doctrines, particularly the Pope's temporal power.

Have you any reason to believe, or to suspect, that the Trans-Alpine Doctrine as contradistinguished from the Cis-Alpine Doctrine, has ever been taught or inculcated, or encouraged at Maynooth?—I do not recollect any Professor at Maynooth who ever taught the Ultra-montane doctrine; our Professors are generally Frenchmen, or Professors educated by Frenchmen, and on that account they seem to have no inclination whatever to adopt adopt the Ultra-montane doctrines; and even the few Professors who were educated in other countries are of the same opinion with regard to those propositions.

Is there any difference of opinion among the Professors of Maynooth upon that point?—Not the smallest.

You have never known any to arise?—I have never known any difference upon that point.

Can you state, whether the provisions of the statute which requires the oath of allegiance to be taken by the Professors and Students of the house, are strictly complied with?—That statute is complied with by the Professors who come from the Continent, in a short time after their appointment, and by the Students at the next quarter sessions after coming to College. They generally arrive in September, and comply with that statute at the quarter sessions held in Maynooth in the beginning of the following January. They cannot comply with it sooner without considerable inconvenience.

They take the oath at the ensuing quarter sessions?—It is possible that some may not take the oath at the next quarter sessions. The sessions are held during the Christmas vacation; and some of the Dublin Students who go home during that vacation, either take the oath in Dublin, or afterwards in Maynooth the following year. I know no Student there who has not complied with the statute.

Do they bring a certificate of having taken it when they come back?—The Dean presents a list of all the Students who are to take the oath, to the clerk of the peace, and he, after his return to Dublin, transmits the certificates to the Dean or Bursar.

You used the expression “called to orders,” in one of your answers; do you mean by that, that any certificate or testimonial is given to the young men after they go through their course, specifying that they are proper persons to be admitted to orders?—A written testimonial is not necessary for such as are ordained at Maynooth; the names of the persons considered qualified to receive orders, are read in presence of the ordaining prelate, and occupying a place in the list read is equivalent to a testimonial letter.

Is there an annual ordination at the College?—There is.

Upon the occasion of those ordinations are those persons only ordained who are presented for ordination by the College, or whose names are in the list you have spoken of?—Only such as are presented by the College; the Bishop would not ordain any others.

Did you see a declaration that was published last year by the Roman Catholic Prelates of Ireland, with regard to the doctrine of the Roman Catholic church?—I did.

Would there be any objection to requiring that each person that may be presented for orders, should previously subscribe that declaration?—I believe there can be no objection to their making that declaration. It is only an explanation of the oath of allegiance which they have taken before.

You have already stated, that you were a member of the Institution from the foundation of the College?—Yes.

Can you explain the nature of the office held by Mr. Knox, who is retained in the list as receiving a salary of 278 l. but the nature of whose office is not stated?—At present he has no duty to perform; his predecessor might be of some use to the Trustees in the commencement of the Institution, to direct them how to make applications to the Irish Parliament.

Does any thing occur to you, that you wish to state to the Commissioners, relating to the College?—I am not aware of any thing.

Is there any class-book or text-book that you make use of in the scriptural instruction that you give, besides the commentary of Menochius, which you recommend?—No other class-book. I read myself the different commentaries, but there is no particular commentary that I recommend to them, except that of Menochius.

Do you find that the young men whom you lecture, have in fact been studying the commentary in their own private apartments?—I find that some do study it attentively from the very commencement of their course, others neglect to study the commentary; but they are obliged to give an account, in turn, of three chapters of the Scriptures every lecture day, that is, Wednesday and Saturday.

Must they have read the three chapters in the intervening time?—Yes, they must have read them, and more than once, to be able to give so good an account of them as they generally do.

That is, they read about six chapters a week?—Yes.

Does that last for one year, or more?—For one year only, unless for such as read classics two years; for some time it was for two years for nearly all.

What portion of the Scriptures do you select for the subject of those lectures?—The Pentateuch I select as the most useful of the Old Testament, containing the law and the proofs of its divinity; and besides, a particular knowledge of it is necessary in order to understand the other books of the Old Testament which continually refer to it.

Do they go through the Pentateuch in that way?—They generally begin, but seldom finish Deuteronomy.

Do those lectures extend to any other part of the Old Testament?—Not now, as few of the Students attend my lecture more than one year.

Do they extend to any part of the New Testament?—No; except as far as explaining any passage that is read or referred to in the New Testament.

Except in that incidental manner, that course does not extend to the New Testament?—It does not.

That is reserved for their subsequent studies under the Professor of Scripture?—Yes; all the theologians of the house are obliged to attend to him during their course, and he lectures on the New Testament; very seldom on the Old Testament.

Appendix, N° 13.

Examination of
Rev.Michael Montague,
24 October 1826.

Do you pay any particular attention to the library?—No; I walk there occasionally and see whether the Students are orderly there.

Under what authority is the selection made of the new books which it becomes expedient from time to time to insert in the library?—The new books purchased for the library, are purchased either by the President or by the Librarian; there is authority given to either to purchase books for the library to a certain amount.

And they make the choice of the books?—Yes.

Appendix, N° 14.

Further Examination of the Reverend Michael Montague;

Appendix, N° 14.

Examination of
Rev.Michael Montague,
22 November 1826.

THE Commissioners believe that you have held the office either of Vice-President or of Professor since the year 1801?—Either of Professor, or Vice-President, or Bursar.

Were you acquainted with the Rev. Dr. Robinson?—I was.

What did he teach?—He commenced teaching what he called Sacred Oratory, that is, to instruct the Students in the composition and delivery of sermons. After a few lectures, finding it impossible to satisfy them by daily lectures on that subject, he relinquished his situation in our College.

How long was he at Maynooth?—I do not think he was more than a month at our house; before he began his lectures in our College, he was employed as Professor at the Lay-house, and there signified to our Trustees that he would be disposed to give lectures in Sacred Oratory, and was employed for that purpose.

How long have you been acting as Bursar to the College of Maynooth?—Fourteen years.

What is the difference between the situation of Mr. Cummins and yours?—He is Bursar; but in consequence of his very delicate state of health, I have been doing a great part of his business for some years; he does little more than keep the accounts.

Is it by him that the annual Estimates for Parliament are prepared?—Yes, they are; but he prepares them according to the usual form, and generally consults the President and myself.

The Commissioners observe that the sum expended in building at Maynooth since the year 1797, exclusive of repairs, and exclusive of the building of the wall, is 41,913*l.*; can you state what proportion of that sum has appeared in the annual estimates that have been submitted to Parliament?—There was only 5,000*l.* of it appeared in the annual estimates; at the time that grant was made, Dr. Dunn was secretary and treasurer, and he used to prepare the estimates, and I believe there was an application made for 5,000*l.* for the purpose of building.

Pray look at the account, and say in what year that 5,000*l.* was mentioned in the estimate?—I am not quite certain whether it ever was in the estimate, but I think it was in it in the year 1807, during the administration of the Duke of Bedford.

Will you look at this account, and say what sum appears by it to have been expended in buildings since the administration of the Duke of Bedford?—Since the administration of the Duke of Bedford, we have expended something more than 10,600*l.*

We observe that in the year 1806, the sum expended in building was 2,460*l.* 19*s.* 10*d.* and in the year 1807, it was 2,530*l.* and 2*d.* making in the whole exactly 5,000*l.* to a penny; do not you think that was the 5,000*l.* granted in the time of the Duke of Bedford?—No; before he came to see the College, we had commenced the north wing, but could not finish it for want of means; and I recollect the President called his attention to it, by calling the projecting stones at the end of the part built, “Pierres d’attente.” His Grace had the goodness to pay attention to his suggestion, and obtained for us 5,000*l.* to enable us to complete that wing.

Do not you think that the 5,000*l.* that you got from the Duke of Bedford, is the sum the expenditure of which is stated here in the account for the years 1806 and 1807, which, you will observe, amounts exactly to the sum of 5,000*l.*?—I do not think it is.

You observe that the only following expenditures for building in the account, are in the year 1809, 6,241*l.*; in the year 1816, 4,043*l.*; in the year 1821, 100*l.*; and in the year 1825, 6,500*l.*; making altogether 16,884*l.*: do not you think that all that has been expended since the Duke of Bedford’s administration?—I think the 5,000*l.* that he procured for us was not a part of that sum.

Assuming that supposition to be well founded, there remains 11,884*l.* which has been expended for the purposes of building since the Duke of Bedford’s administration, exclusive of repairs, and of the building of the wall; was the intention to expend any portion of that sum ever brought before the Government or Parliament through the medium of the annual estimates that were submitted on the part of the College?—I believe not.

You will observe that the annual estimate, the form of which the Commissioners have before them, specifies separately the different items of expenditure, subsistence, commons, salaries of the different officers, and the different servants, but there is no mention whatever made in that estimate, of buildings?—No, because the building depended upon what was accidental; it depended on the price of provisions; if dear, no part of the funds could be applied to building. Whilst provisions were cheap, after the termination of the war, we expended considerable sums in providing better accommodations for our Students, and did not think that we were deviating from the intentions of Government or Parliament in that application of our savings.

The only question is, whether you brought the fact under the consideration of Parliament that it was your intention to build?—Parliament could not be ignorant of it. We send every year a copy of our accounts, with vouchers, to the Audit Office; there is also an abstract of them furnished to the Secretary of State for the information of Parliament; as the item of building appears in both, we had reason to think that Parliament knew and approved of that mode of expenditure.

In point of fact, out of what fund were those buildings executed; are we to infer that it was out of the savings of the commons of the Students?—The last buildings since 1820 were principally erected from savings of commons, and from the Dunboyne establishment; during that period we received no considerable donation.

In what year was the specific grant for the Dunboyne Students made to the College?—In the year 1813.

The nature of the Dunboyne expenditure the Commissioners believe to be this: there is a sum of 500*l.* a-year rent, the property of the College, and then the government, upon application, consented to increase that by an annual grant of 700*l.*, making in the whole 1,200*l.* for the purpose, however, of maintaining 20 Students on that establishment?—Yes.

Can you state from the College books what in point of fact, has been the amount of expenditure on the footing of the Dunboyne establishment, since that grant of 700*l.* annually was made by government, for the extension and maintenance of the number at twenty?—It is possible to do it; but it would take a good deal of time.

Is it your present impression that that 700*l.* has in fact been expended upon the Dunboyne establishment, in addition to your own 500*l.* since it was obtained from government?—No; I cannot say that that has been expended upon the establishment, as it had not yet the entire number intended for it by the regulation of the Trustees. There is a great want of priests in some parts of this country, particularly in Ulster, and the Bishops of that province have been obliged for some time to call home their Students at the termination of the ordinary course.

Does it not necessarily follow from what you have stated, that whatever money has been saved by not extending the Dunboyne establishment to twenty, has in fact been expended in buildings?—Yes; our savings from that establishment, with our other savings, have been expended on building.

Are we to understand that the reason why the Dunboyne establishment is not filled up, is, that there are a certain number of Students appropriated to the different dioceses in the kingdom, and if the demand for clergymen in any particular diocese happens to be greater than in another, that will cause a deficiency in the whole number on the establishment?—The principal reason why that establishment is not filled up, is, that there is a certain number for each province.

You cannot fill up the vacancy from any other province than that to which the situation is appropriated?—No, not according to the regulation of the Board; but I think each province will soon have on that establishment its proportionate number, as some of the Bishops of Ulster, where there was a great want of priests to perform the duties of the ministry, have established small seminaries to supply their immediate wants.

When a legacy is left to the College generally, is it carried to the general account?—Yes.

Except it is left for any particular purpose?—If it is left for the education of particular Students in the College, we cannot touch it; it forms a fund for that particular purpose.

Those donations you have alluded to, all form part of your general account submitted to the Audit Office?—Yes; I recollect at the time when Doctor Everard was President, we received 600*l.* for two years, making together 1,200*l.* from England, without knowing from whom; that was brought into the general account.

We observe that there is an item of 6,500*l.* for building in the year 1825; are we to understand that an expenditure to the amount of 6,500*l.* was incurred in that year in respect of building?—That sum is the amount of sundry payments made in the year 1822, and the following years, which according to the practice of the Audit Office were disallowed, not being accompanied with vouchers and regular bills, till the entire building was finished in the year 1825.

Are we to understand that during those cheap years, you made considerable savings, and that those savings you laid out in extending and improving the buildings?—Yes; in buildings and improvements.

Was it not in extending rather than improving them; for we observe that this account professes to be exclusive of the expenses annually incurred for repairs, and charges made in buildings already erected?—That entire sum was expended on new buildings, and we still require more for the decent accommodation of our Students; even now we have five or six in some rooms.

Examination of
Rev.
Philip Dowley,
24 October 1826.

YOU hold the situation of Senior Dean in the College of Maynooth?—I do.

How long have you held it?—I have been six years in the situation of Senior Dean, and four in that of Junior Dean.

Did you hold any office in the College before you were Junior Dean?—No; I was appointed Junior Dean in June 1816, at the termination of my collegiate course.

Were you educated in the College?—Yes; I read four years in the College, having made the previous part of my studies in the Diocesan Seminary at Waterford.

By whom was the Diocesan Seminary kept?—It was kept under the patronage and immediate direction of Doctor Power, formerly the Roman Catholic Bishop of the diocese of Waterford.

Was it a Roman Catholic Seminary?—Yes.

Into what class were you admitted upon your entrance into the College?—Into the class of Natural Philosophy.

In what year were you admitted?—In 1812.

Who was at that time the Professor of that Class?—Mr. Darré, a French gentleman, who has since returned to France.

Was the instruction given to that class at that time, different from what has been given since?—The course of studies at that time was not so extensive as it is at present; and a philosophical apparatus has been since procured for the College, which is deemed a great improvement in that department.

Have you observed any material change in the general character of the course of study since you have been acquainted with it?—Yes; I think a very considerable improvement has taken place in the general arrangement of the studies, and the classes in the College; at that time there was no class of Rhetoric. The classical department consisted of one class of Greek and Latin; since that time there has been a chair of Rhetoric established, which is a very great improvement; I speak also in reference to the improvement which has taken place with respect to the chair of Natural and Experimental Philosophy.

In what respect?—The course of studies in that department has been latterly more extended; and the course of experiments which the Professor is enabled to give the Students tends greatly to their improvement.

Has any particular change taken place in the theological instruction given to the Students?—At that time the place of the Professor of Scripture was not so regularly filled, nor were the lectures so uniformly given as they have been since.

Since which time?—Since the year 1812 in which I entered College.

Has the establishment of the Dunboyne class produced any marked influence upon the Institution; do you think it has animated the zeal of the young men in the inferior classes, with the hope of promotion to that class?—Yes, I think it has operated as a stimulus to the Students to distinguish themselves in their respective classes, and particularly in the classes of Divinity and of Sacred Scripture.

With regard to the Dunboyne Students themselves, what influence do you think the institution of that class has had upon them, do they continue to improve themselves to any considerable extent?—It has an influence tending very considerably to their improvement.

More so than if they had gone out of the College at the usual time?—Considerably more.

Was the Dunboyne class instituted when you were there?—Yes, it was instituted a few years before I was appointed Junior Dean; there were very few in the Dunboyne class at that time.

Were you yourself one?—No.

Will you be so good as to describe what are your duties as Dean?—As Dean, I am charged with the immediate superintendence of the discipline of the College; it is my duty to attend to the morals, dispositions, and conduct of the Students, and to assist at the spiritual exercises of the community; these are the general duties I have to discharge.

Will you describe in what manner your superintendence is exercised;—I cannot give a more distinct idea of the manner in which the superintendence is exercised, than by saying it is my duty to see that the rules and discipline of the College be observed, and that with this view I frequently pass through the several halls and corridors, visit the rooms of the Students, and thus ascertain whether they conduct themselves in public, and employ themselves in their apartments at their studies, as the rules and discipline may prescribe.

Are you present with them when they are in class?—No, while they are in class I am free from any duty of office, except that of visiting the rooms of the Students, which is occasionally done at that time.

Do you make any inspection of the rooms in which the young men sit to prosecute their own private studies?—Yes, I have a particular inspection of the rooms during the time of study, to see that the students employ those hours in the fulfilment of this important duty.

Is it part of your duty to inspect the books which the young men possess themselves of by their own means?—It is; the statutes point out such inspection as part of my duty.

In what way do the young men know what books they are permitted to have, and what are forbidden; is there any written list?—There is no written list of prohibited books in the College, but the Students are supposed generally, from their own knowledge and experience, perience, to know that certain books are bad, and of course prohibited. So general is this knowledge amongst them, and so deeply impressed are they with the conviction that the introduction of bad books into the College must be attended with the most dangerous consequences, that we have seldom had occasion to enforce the statute made upon this subject. The only written list which serves to direct them as to the books they are permitted to have, is one which the Professor of English eloquence has occasionally given to the junior Students who enter his class; this forms a list of books which they may read with profit, in order to acquire correctness and facility of speaking and writing in the English language.

Does it not often happen that you find the Students in possession of books which you object to?—It seldom happens.

In what way are they enabled to purchase books; what bookseller have they access to?—They purchase them principally in Dublin; there is also a person who purchases books for the most part at the public sales which take place in town, which he offers for sale at our Porter's lodge; from him they purchase a good many.

Is there any check upon the sale of those books at the Porter's lodge?—There is a catalogue of the books required before they are offered for sale; and if upon inspection it is found to contain any objectionable book, that work is struck off the catalogue and its sale is prohibited.

Do you allow books to the senior classes which you would deny to the junior classes the liberty of using?—In the rooms, or in the study halls, we do not allow the use of any books to the senior Students which we would prohibit to the juniors; but in the library there is a latitude allowed to the senior Students with regard to works connected with their studies in divinity, which is not permitted to those in the lower classes.

Is it any part of your duty to superintend the studies of the young men when in the library?—It is part of my duty to superintend their studies in the library, as well as in their rooms, and in the study halls; but as the young men are under the inspection and control of the Librarian, or the Sub-librarians, his assistants in office, while in the library, any interference on the part of the Dean is deemed almost unnecessary; it is however a duty which he sometimes discharges.

At what hours are the Students sufficiently at leisure to be able to read books in their own rooms?—They have some time upon Wednesdays, upon Saturdays and Sundays, and an hour from five till six in the evening upon every day in the week which may be occasionally devoted to the reading of books not immediately connected with the class business. The entire of the summer vacation; the short recesses at Christmas and Easter may be devoted to similar studies.

In point of fact do they study much in books which it is not necessary that they should study with a view to the lectures?—The divines do not, during the months of study, read many works that are not immediately connected with the department of Divinity or of Sacred Scripture.

Is that on account of there not being time for such reading?—It is.

What is your duty with respect to the letters received by the Students?—Merely to receive them in the refectory and have them delivered to the Postman.

In what way is the communication which the Students may have with persons not resident in the College, regulated and superintended?—There is scarcely any restraint upon the Students with respect to such communication; the only check that I conceive as having any influence in restraining that communication is, that the Dean receives the letters from them in the refectory, and holds them till they are called for by the postman; this has an influence, a slight one I must allow, in preventing persons from writing too many letters, or opening too extensive a correspondence that might interfere with their application to study; it also may have another influence in deterring them from corresponding with persons of suspicious or improper character.

What may be the number of letters sent out each day?—The number of letters is sometimes very considerable; it is very variable; at certain seasons of the year the number of letters perhaps is sixty, that is the greatest number, sometimes the number is forty, thirty, twenty, and sixteen in a day; it very seldom happens that the number is so great as fifty or sixty.

Did you ever know an instance in which it was thought necessary to open a private letter addressed to a Student?—No; the Dean has no authority to do so; nor is it considered that there is any power vested in the President, or in any member of the administration of the College to open the letter of any Student, whatever the necessity of any case may be, or however great their anxiety as to the correspondence which a Student may hold; they could never think of recurring to an expedient for which they have no warrant, and which is so directly contrary to the laws.

The question was not meant to refer to the opening any letter before it arrived at the hand of the Student; was there ever a case in which a letter, after it had been received by a Student, and opened by him, was afterwards read, contrary to the wish of the Student, upon the examination of his papers?—Yes, there is a power vested in the Dean by the statutes, of examining and reading the papers, and the open, not the sealed letters of the Students under peculiar circumstances. But in order to the exercise of this power on the part of the Dean, there is a form prescribed by the statutes which he is bound to observe; the form consists in this, that if he have any suspicion as to the correspondence of a Student, he is to consult the President, lay the grounds of his suspicion before him, and ask permission to inspect such correspondence. If the grounds of suspicion appear sufficient to the President, and that the case in question is so gross as to call for the exercise of this power, he gives his assent, and the Dean is then at liberty to inspect such papers and letters.

In point of fact have such letters been read?—Instances have occurred, but I must say very rarely, in which such letters were read.

Upon what occasions has it taken place?—I do not recollect precisely the circumstances under which it occurred.

You cannot recollect any particular instance in which it has occurred?—Not immediately; no instance has occurred, I suppose, within these last seven years. I cannot charge my memory at this moment with the circumstances under which at any time it took place. I am almost certain there was not more than one instance during that period.

Can you recollect what was the nature of the case; was it in reference to any impropriety with regard to religious or political feeling?—I am confident no case occurred during my time at College, having any reference to a religious or political feeling, in which the exercise of this power was deemed necessary; the cases in which it occurred must have had a reference to the discipline or internal government of the College. Upon reflection, I think there was an instance since I entered College, in which a Student had been removed for attempts to excite dissension, and disturb the good order of the community; and that shortly after his removal, or whilst at home during vacation, the Dean passing through the rooms recognized a letter from him in the possession of another, who had been suspected of being concerned in the same mischievous endeavours to overturn the order of the College, and that under these circumstances this correspondence was inspected.

Do you recollect any instance of expulsion from the College following such an examination of letters as you have described?—I know of no instance in which a Student was expelled in consequence of information procured by the exercise of this right vested in the Dean by the statutes.

What is the rule with respect to the admission of newspapers?—The Board of Trustees have made a law prohibiting the introduction of newspapers into the College; they have annexed the severest penalties to the introduction or reading of newspapers; but as the statute which they have framed upon this head, was not submitted to the Lord Lieutenant for the time being, as the Act of Parliament requires, it has not the force of law so as that we could feel warranted in inflicting such severe punishments upon those who are guilty of its violation. It is considered one of the bye-laws of the College, having of course considerable weight, and imposing a certain obligation upon the Students.

Have you reason to think that the rule is frequently broken?—I think, at present, it is not very much broken; in the course of last year, and particularly during a part of the preceding, I think the rule was violated to some extent, in despite of our efforts to prevent it.

Was there any discovery of the introduction of newspapers?—Yes, there have been some discoveries made.

Of late years?—Yes.

What punishment is inflicted?—From the nature of the law, as I have just explained, we can scarcely consider ourselves warranted in inflicting any severe punishment upon those who infringe the rule.

What course do you take when you find newspapers in the possession of any Students?—We have not discovered newspapers very frequently, but when we have succeeded, the usual course is to remonstrate with the Student upon the impropriety of his conduct, to remind him of the importance which the Board of Trustees attach to the observance of that regulation which prohibits the introduction of newspapers into the College; and convey to him an admonition, that he must expect to be visited with serious consequences, if he persist in the violation of the laws and discipline made to regulate his conduct whilst in College, and passed with a view of promoting the interests of the establishment.

With respect to punishments generally, what punishments have you the means of inflicting?—There are very few punishments inflicted in the College; the ordinary mode of proceeding at present is that pointed out by the statute, which directs that if the dean shall perceive any student neglecting his duty, or habitually violating any of the rules of the College, he shall cite that person before the President; and the President admonishes him, reminds him of the impropriety of his conduct, tells him that he has incurred the displeasure and censure of his superiors, by his disregard of the rules and discipline of the house, and that he must take care to conduct himself better in future; this, accompanied with some paternal and friendly admonition on the part of the President, is marked down as his first admonition. If he be found to repeat these transgressions, and to continue in the same irregular and disorderly manner of acting, he is cited a second time before the President, and admonished in a similar manner; if he persist, the same admonition is repeated a third time, and if after the third admonition he is found not to amend his conduct, he is liable to be removed from the College. This is the mode generally resorted to to preserve discipline.

Can you say, whether it is usual in other Roman Catholic Colleges that there should be no other mode of correction for offences, than admonition, followed, if not attended to, by expulsion?—There is a consideration that operates more powerfully than any punishment to which I have alluded, which is an apprehension on the minds of the Students, that if they do not shew good dispositions, respect for order and rule, habits of piety, and a regard for discipline, they are sure to be excluded from Orders.

Is that the usual course in Roman Catholic Colleges?—I believe so.

Is it not a very difficult thing to control slight offences by the application only of such severe

655

Appendix, N^o 15.Examination of
Rev.Philip Dowley,
24 October 1826.

severe punishments?—A young man is never denied Orders for a slight offence; denial of Orders must be the consequence of a grievous fault; when there is a question of slight offences, which are followed by an exclusion from Orders, they must be understood of a series of lesser irregularities, which show a want of dispositions in points that in our judgment are considered important.

Would it not be desirable to institute some system of slighter punishments better suited to slight offences?—Yes, I think it would be very desirable. I have had sometimes, seldom indeed, recourse to it; but that mode of bringing a Student before the President, and admonishing him, we do not consider a severe course of punishment, particularly as the person is not expelled till he proves his obstinacy in irregular conduct after the third admonition.

Is the admonition public?—No, private.

Is that found sufficient to maintain the discipline of the College?—That alone would not be found sufficient; but there are several other considerations influencing the minds of the Students, particularly the fear of exclusion from Orders, to which I have already alluded.

Are you in the habit of inflicting fines?—No; we are authorized by the statute to impose fines, but we do not resort to that mode of punishment.

Are the Students generally in a situation to be possessed of private funds of their own to any extent?—Several of them are in situations to possess funds of this description to some extent; there are others, I presume, who have barely what is sufficient to defray the expenses that must be necessarily incurred during their time in College.

Then evidently the mode of punishment by fine would be inapplicable?—With a great majority of the Students punishment by fine would not be inapplicable to the extent that we are authorized to inflict them; and I may observe that that mode of punishment was practised in the College for several years, but not since I was appointed to the situation of Dean, nor for some time before.

Has it often occurred since you have been Dean, that there has been resistance to the authorities in the College?—I do not recollect any instance in which there was resistance to the authorities of the College since I was appointed Dean.

What salary have you as Dean?—£. 112 British per annum.

What advantages or emoluments have you in addition to that?—None whatever, except that I have apartments and commons.

You have presented to the Commissioners a printed volume of the statutes of the College of Maynooth, published in 1820, and another printed volume, intituled, "Regula Pietatis et Disciplinæ domesticæ," published in the year following; are those printed volumes in the hands of the Students generally; do they know their contents?—They must know their contents perfectly well, as the statute must be read twice a year before the entire community; this regulation itself forms part of the statute.

In addition to that, are copies of them given to any of the Students?—The "Regula Pietatis" is put into the hands of the junior Students as soon as they enter College; the other book of statutes is in the library, and they may purchase it if any of them has a fancy to it.

Prior to printing the statutes in 1820, was any course taken to make their contents known to the Students?—Prior to that period the statutes were not read publicly before the community; there were very few copies of the statutes to be found either in Dublin or at the College. At what time exactly the reading of the statutes was abandoned I cannot say.

Was not the scarcity of the printed copies a reason the more for reading the statutes to the Students, so long as that scarcity existed?—Yes, it should appear an additional reason for the punctual reading of them.

Was it ever a subject matter of complaint, that they were not read; and further, that the Students could not learn their contents?—It was.

At what time?—Previous to the printing of the present edition of the statutes.

Was it not a well-founded complaint?—I do not think that the complaint originated in any injury which the individuals felt from the not reading of the statutes, but rather that they seized upon it as one of the grounds of complaint against an administration with which they themselves were dissatisfied.

Did not they complain very generally, that it had the practical effect of subjecting them to a rule of an arbitrary character?—I cannot say it was a general complaint; I know it was a complaint with some.

At present are there any bye-laws, rules or regulations, actually observed and practised in the Institution, that are not contained in one or other of the printed books now before the Commissioners?—There are a few. From a letter received this morning at the College from the Secretary, I apprehended that that question was likely to be put to me; on that account I have brought with me my copy of the statutes, which contains three or four regulations of minor detail, sanctioned by the Board of Trustees, which are enforced in the College.

[The Witness produced the same.]

Are there any regulations that are enforced in the College, other than the three you have now mentioned, and those contained in the printed volumes?—I do not immediately recollect any thing in the form of rule of discipline or a regulation enforced, that is not contained either in the statutes, or the "Regula Pietatis," or in those rules which I have submitted,

Appendix, No 15.

Examination of

with the exception of one duty, which is not specified in any of those regulations; it is, that the Students are obliged to attend a class of church music or learning to sing the Gregorian note, for half an hour on Wednesdays and half an hour on Saturdays.

Are we to understand then, that the Students are upon no occasion desired to do any thing, or expected to do any thing, that is not contained either in the printed statutes, in the "Regula Pietatis," or in those supplemental rules?—They are sometimes required to do certain minute things, such as to assemble in the prayer hall at a specified hour; at the time of Spiritual Retreat they attend to certain spiritual duties not specified in these rules or statutes. The importance of Retreats, and the necessity of conducting them, is pointed out in the "Regula Pietatis," but the manner in which they are to be performed is not determined.

Are there any bye-laws in existence that are not contained in the printed volumes?—I am not aware of any with the exception of those I have now submitted; there are a few regulations respecting the order and cleanliness of the Infirmary, which were made by the President last year, a copy of which I have brought with me.

[The Witness produced the same.]

Was there not some code of law that was understood under the name of Vetus Jus?—The allusion to Vetus Jus in the statutes I conceive to refer to the first statutes that were printed for the College; I may be mistaken, but I conceive that is what is alluded to.

But you do not think there are any unwritten rules of conduct now existing in the College, whether under the title of Vetus Jus, or under any other title?—I am quite satisfied that there are no rules of conduct or discipline, except those which I have already mentioned.

What is the hour of rising in the morning?—The hour of rising in the morning, during the months of September and October is, for the most part five o'clock; from the first of November till after Easter, the Students rise at six; and from Easter till the close of the academical year, they rise at five o'clock.

Do you recollect any time when the hours of rising were different?—I have been told, that at the commencement of the College and for some years after, the Students rose uniformly during the summer and winter months, at five o'clock.

Not at four?—Never at four.

Pray state any rules that may exist imposing silence on the Students, either with respect to the seasons of Spiritual Retreat, or any other periods?—Silence is to be observed by the Students in all parts of the College during the study hours, immediately before and after prayer, mass, and the participation of the sacraments; these are the periods of silence in the course of the year. During the Spiritual Retreats, which last sometimes four days and an half or five days, silence is observed during the whole time.

And during the whole night?—Yes.

How often do those Spiritual Retreats occur?—Twice a year.

At other times, the Commissioners are to understand that silence is enjoined, both during the hours of lecture and the hours of preparation for lecture?—Yes.

And also from the period of the conclusion of the evening prayer, till the commencement of morning prayer following?—Till the commencement of recreation immediately after breakfast the following morning.

During the entire of the night therefore silence is to be observed?—Yes.

Pray add together the periods of silence in the College, and mention how many hours out of the twenty-four, the rule of silence does not apply to?—The rule of silence does not apply to about forty minutes time of recreation immediately after breakfast, from half past eleven to twelve o'clock, from a quarter before four till five in the evening, and about three quarters of an hour after supper, upon four days in the week, Mondays, Tuesdays, Thursdays and Fridays; upon the Wednesdays the rule of silence does not apply to any time, except from morning prayer till breakfast, and during the hour of lecture from half past ten to half past eleven for the Philosophers and Humanists, and till twelve for the Divines, who have ordinarily half an hour's lecture longer than the Philosophers and Humanists; from that hour the rule of silence does not apply till six o'clock in the evening, except while the Students are at dinner; a few minutes immediately before dinner and supper, and from six till eight in the evening, as upon the other days of the week.

Does it not follow that generally speaking, there is something between three and four hours out of the twenty-four hours, to which the rule of silence does not apply?—Yes, upon four days of the week; but upon Wednesdays, Sundays and Saturdays, there is a much longer time to which it does not apply. The rule is observed to this extent only during what we call the study months of the year; during the summer vacation, the recesses at Christmas and Easter, and other intervals of relaxation which occur, the rule of silence does not apply, except to about an hour and half before breakfast in the morning and two hours in the evening from six to eight o'clock.

Is this regulation of silence merely a rule of academical discipline, or is there any thing of a religious duty understood to mix itself with it?—It is a rule of both religious and academical discipline. By its observance that quiet and stillness is diffused over the College, which is so favourable to study; temptations to idleness are considerably diminished, and interruptions to the studious from their more indolent or troublesome companions, almost wholly removed. In a religious point of view, it is deemed an observance of great importance from its immediate tendency to encourage a spirit of recollection and retirement, which it is the duty of ecclesiastics to cherish.

As

As expressed in the statutes, "Silentium ad pacem pietatemque fovendam, ad nutrienda studia, et animi perturbationes sedandas avertendasque maximé conducens, sancté omnes statutis temporibus servant," and again, "Horis studiis assignatis, altum silentium per totum Collegium obtineat?"—Just so.

Upon the whole are we to understand that silence is enjoined upon the Students at the times in which they are performing College duties, at the times at which they are at meals, and at the times at which they retire for rest?—Exclusively; never when they are at recreation.

Then in short, they are engaged in the performance of the College duties or supposed to be at least, during the whole of the day, except that portion of the day from three to four hours, in which they are allowed to indulge in conversation?—Yes; except the periods of the vacation which I already mentioned, and three days in every week on which the rule does not so strictly apply.

Pray describe particularly the manner in which the season of Spiritual Retreat is passed by the Students?—The manner in which the time of Spiritual Retreat is spent, is principally in spiritual reading, in exercises of piety in the chapel, in attending to spiritual instructions which they receive at that time, and in prayer.

How are the hours of the day which at other periods are allotted to recreation, passed during the season of Spiritual Retreat?—There is a distribution of time; certain duties are assigned to the several hours of the day, which points out to the Students the manner in which the whole time of Retreat is to be spent.

Is there any period of time allowed for walking or exercise at those periods?—There is a great deal of time allowed for walking in silence.

Do they walk in companies during that period?—They walk alone in silence.

May three or four be gathered together in walking, during that period?—Not together exactly; as they are not allowed to speak, they can have no inducement to walk together.

Is a breach of silence during the time of Spiritual Retreat, considered as a fault of that degree, as to require being mentioned by the person committing it in confession?—A person who by a violation of this rule contributes to disturb the order and recollection, which are so essential at that time to obtain the object proposed in Spiritual Retreat, must feel that he is doing wrong, that he is giving disedification to his companions, and of course that this is matter which may be mentioned in confession.

During the hour of dinner there is silence observed, with the exception of one who reads, is there not?—Yes.

Pray mention the nature of that reading?—The statute requires that a book of a religious tendency should be read in the refectory, during meals. The rule to which I refer is found in page 6 of the "Regula Pietatis," and runs thus: "During meal times let there be continual reading, and first of all, let there be almost an entire chapter of the Sacred Scripture read; the rest of the time should be employed in reading some religious work calculated to improve the understanding, and at the same time to direct the will; towards the end of dinner, let the Roman Martyrology be read."

In what language is the Roman Martyrology read?—In Latin.

Where was it printed?—I do not exactly know where the edition which we read at present has been printed.

Is it an old edition?—I rather think it is; it is an Italian or a French edition, I cannot say which.

In what language is the chapter of Sacred Scripture read?—In English.

In what language is the other religious book, of which mention is made, read?—In English.

What species of religious book is it usually?—Generally "The Lives of the Saints," "Sacred Biography," "Ecclesiastical History," and works of piety.

Pray define exactly the meaning of the word "feré" in the statute, where it says, "ac primo quidem totum feré Sacrae Scripturae caput legatur?"—I conceive that the statute was so framed, as that if a person found the chapter of the Sacred Scripture longer than ordinary, he should not conceive himself obliged to read the entire; but this is a restriction that is seldom or never observed, for however long the chapter may be, it is usually read through.

You were educated at Maynooth?—I was.

Did you attend Dr. Delahogue's lectures?—Yes.

Were the principles which he inculcated in his lectures as to the Cis-Alpine doctrine, the same as those which are inculcated in his Tract "De Ecclesia?"—Precisely the same.

Are those principles held through the College?—They are held through the College, undoubtedly.

Has the Trans-Alpine doctrine ever been inculcated or encouraged in the College?—The Trans-Alpine doctrine has never been taught, inculcated, or encouraged in the College.

Do you know whether the same rules as you have stated to exist at Maynooth, with regard to silence, are imposed and followed in other Roman Catholic Colleges?—I think the rules of silence, in some Roman Catholic Colleges upon the Continent, are more strict than ours. I am sure that, in the Seminary of St. Sulpice in Paris, the rules of silence are more strict; that there is less time for relaxation than we have.

Do you happen to know of any Roman Catholic Colleges in which the rule of silence is less strict than in yours?—It is much less in Carlow, and in all the Catholic seminaries in Ireland.

Is it a part of your duty to accompany the young men when they walk out?—Yes, it is my duty, or that of the Junior Dean. It sometimes happens that neither finds it convenient

Appendix, N^o 15.Examination of
Rev.Philip Dowley,
24 October 1826.

to accompany them; on such occasions a Senior Scholar is generally appointed to conduct the young men.

Does any inconvenience result from so large a body moving about together?—Some inconveniencies do; they sometimes spread over too large an extent of country. On such occasions it is difficult to preserve order on the public walks.

Does that ever occasion complaints from the neighbours?—Sometimes. There are a few of our neighbours who sometimes complain that we commit trespass upon their premises; that we break down their hedges, and do some injury in that way. But the number who have cause, or feel any disposition to prefer such complaints, I must say, is extremely small.

Can you exactly recollect any books that you may have had occasion to take away from any Student, in the last year or two?—In the last year or two I recollect to have taken up some work, I do not recollect the name or the author. It was a work written against the tenets and doctrine of the Catholic religion, which I found in a Student's room. I believe this was the only one of that description I took up last year. It was a work which I would have permitted the same Student to read in the library, but we do not allow such works to be freely circulated in the College.

Is there any matter about which you have not been examined, that you would wish to state to the Commissioners?—I consider it would be extremely desirable that the several Faculties or Schools of the College were separated. The community is now grown so large, that in the course of time it will be found very difficult to preserve order and discipline. The class of Divinity is become so numerous, that the Students cannot make the proficiency which might be made in a smaller division, for want of sufficient exercise, and means of ascertaining their attention to study.

Is not provision made for that by the statutes?—There is not a provision exactly against the inconvenience to which I allude. The statute to which you refer, regards the lectures only which they are to receive from the Senior Scholars. The entire class of divinity, which may be divided into smaller portions for these lectures, forms one body under the Professor; and it so happens, that from its extent, the several Professors in Divinity cannot call upon a Student to give an account of the subject matter of the class more than twice in the year, and then only for a few minutes. From these two occasions, and the two general examinations alone, which are only of a few minutes each, the Professor can ascertain the talents of the Students, their attention to and proficiency in their studies.

Seeing that it must be known to the Students, that they are not likely to be called upon more than once or twice in a year to give an account of the subject matter of their studies, do not you think that circumstances may, in many instances, have the practical effect of making them neglect them?—I think, practically, it has not the influence to the extent that might be supposed, because they are under an apprehension that they will be called upon to answer in the entire matter they have studied, in the course of the year, at the public examinations. Hence, at the approach of the examinations, if they should have previously neglected their studies, they endeavour, by increased efforts, to make up for the previous loss of time. That often proves injurious to the health of the Student.

What provision would you suggest for that purpose?—I should desire to see the Rhetoricians and Humanists, the Classical Department, form one distinct house, the Philosophers another, and the Divines a third. I would suggest that the class of Divinity be divided, and two Professors be appointed for Dogmatic, and two for Moral Theology. By this means many of the inconveniencies felt at present would be avoided, and the Students in Divinity would have much more practice in the way of answering upon the subject matter of the treatise which they study.

Do you think it would be desirable to go so far as to divide one part of the Students altogether from the others?—Yes; I think it would be very desirable.

So as to form altogether a different establishment?—Exactly; in looking to the duties they will have to discharge, and the discipline that should be preserved in a Catholic Seminary, the obligation incumbent upon us of ascertaining their dispositions and fitness for the ecclesiastical state, I feel strongly the necessity of their being separated altogether, or of reducing the number of the College; if it is left under its present arrangement, I think it will be found very difficult after some time, in so immense an establishment, to attend to those several duties, to ascertain the dispositions of individual candidates for the ministry, to see how such numbers employ their time, and to prevent them from getting into habits of irregularity and disorder.

The building at present has accommodation for about four hundred?—Four hundred cannot be conveniently accommodated in it.

There is that number at present is there not?—There is that number, though not conveniently accommodated.

Are you aware of any intention of increasing the buildings, or the number of Students?—I am not aware of any intention to increase the number of Students; there is some idea I believe of increasing or improving the buildings, without adding to the number of the Students.

Further Examination of the Reverend Philip Dowley; 15th November 1826.

THE Commissioners understand that there is a certain Confraternity, intituled, "The Sodality of the Sacred Heart of Jesus," introduced at Maynooth?—There is.

Who keeps the register containing the names of the members of that society?—I do.

Do you keep it by virtue of your office as Dean, or is it your spontaneous act as an individual?—The duty of keeping it is not attached to any office in the College; it was put into the hands of the Dean as the person more immediately engaged in directing the minds of the Students to practices of piety.

Are you a member of the Sodality yourself?—Yes.

Is any other superior of the College a member of it?—Yes; a few of the superiors are members.

If you were to be appointed to another office, and some other person were to be appointed Dean in your place, do you conceive that that other individual would keep the register as attached to his office, or would the custody of it still remain with you?—In that event, the register would be probably transferred to my successor in office, or it may be left in my hands, or put into those of any other superior in College, as the keeping of it is not attached to any situation on the establishment. It is so much a matter of indifference in whose hands it lies, that I entertain at this moment an idea of giving it in charge to some other, lest the relation in which I stand towards the community, as the guardian of its discipline, should have the slightest influence upon any individual in becoming a member of the Sodality; that it should be absolutely discretionary and optional with the Students to become members or not.

What number of members does the Sodality consist of?—About two hundred; a few of these are externs, persons living in the country, who have sent their names to some of their friends in College, and begged that they might be enrolled, as we have the privilege of keeping a register for this purpose.

What is the greatest distance at which any extern resides, whose name is enrolled in the register?—I think the greater number of the externs are from the counties of Meath and Westmeath; there may be one or two from the province of Connaught. I have no means of ascertaining it, except that the Students from those quarters have applied to me to have their names inscribed.

How long is it since the institution was introduced into Maynooth?—It was introduced in the year 1822.

At whose recommendation was it introduced?—At the recommendation of the Board of Trustees; I beg leave to say that I cannot help observing that it strikes me as somewhat singular, that so long and serious an investigation should take place at this Board, respecting a practice of piety established in the College, exclusively with a view of promoting ecclesiastical piety and perfection; and which in its nature, or in any thing connected with it, bears no relation to any civil duty, which as subjects, we have to discharge. My astonishment is increased, by the reflection that it is matter of notoriety, that Sodalities of the Sacred Heart, or of a similar description, are established in the several parishes throughout the greater part of France, in other parts of the Continent, and in several parishes in Ireland.

Pray state at whose recommendation the institution was introduced into Maynooth?—Doctor Troy, at the suggestion of the Board of Trustees, recommended its introduction into the College, by virtue of a permission obtained to that effect by the Most Reverend Doctor Murray, when at Rome in 1814.

The Commissioners would beg to suggest to your consideration, that the College had existed for 27 years without the introduction of the Sodality; they therefore felt a desire to know under what circumstances it was introduced?—Without being able to conceive the object of the Commissioners, I have stated what the circumstances were.

Is there any written entry in the minute-book of the Trustees, recording their desire that that sodality should be instituted at Maynooth?—Yes, the recommendation is found on the minute-book of the Board of Trustees.

Pray explain what particular sanction of the institution of such a sodality is necessary, as a matter of ecclesiastical discipline, after a wish had been expressed upon the part of the Trustees for its institution?—Neither the institution of this or of any other sodality, nor the works of devotion recommended by them, constitute a necessary part of ecclesiastical discipline; they are merely practices of devotion calculated to promote that piety which ecclesiastics ought to cultivate.

Pray state whether any of the inmates of Clongowes are members of the Sodality of Maynooth?—Not one.

Do you conceive that there is any tendency in the institution of the Sodality of the Sacred Heart of Jesus at Maynooth, to produce any particular connection or intercourse with the members of the society of the Jesuits?—None whatever that I conceive.

Is it a fact, that that sodality in its commencement was connected more naturally and more intimately with the order of the Jesuits, than other sodalities which are known to the Roman Catholic church?—It does not form a more intimate connection with that order than it does with any other in the world?—The Confraternity of the Blessed Virgin, as being the one most recommended and most prevalent among the Jesuits, would seem to connect its members more intimately with that body, if these sodalities formed any such connection as the question would seem to imply.

Pray state the origin of the institution of the Sodality of the Sacred Heart of Jesus?—The devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, which is the object of the sodality, is very ancient in the church, as appears from the writings of St. Bernard, St. Bonaventure, and others; but I am not aware that any Confraternities of the Sacred Heart received the sanction of the Holy See, by the grant of indulgences, before the middle of the seventeenth century; about which time, or a little later, Clement the Xth imparted those privileges to some pious sodalities, under the title of “The Sacred Heart,” formed in the churches of the seminaries which were then under the direction of F. Eudes, in France, an ecclesiastic of distinguished zeal and great sanctity, the founder of a congregation of secular priests, whose principal object was to educate young ecclesiastics in the principles of science, and in sentiments of sublime perfection.

Has it not experienced considerable objection, and even some opposition on the part of many members of the Roman Catholic church?—Yes, for some time it had experienced objections similar to those raised against other objects of devotion in the church, and which continued to be urged till their nature was fully explained, and properly understood.

Will you explain the nature of those objections?—Some persons complained that the institution of a feast in honour of the Sacred Heart, would increase the number of festivals of devotion which they determined to be already sufficiently numerous; others alleged, that they did not comprehend why the heart of our Blessed Lord should be selected as an object of special devotion; and others, again, objected to the devotion, on the ground that they imagined it involved an adoration and homage of the humanity, or of a portion of the humanity of our Blessed Redeemer, prescinding from the divinity. This conception of the devotion was pronounced erroneous by Pius the Sixth, who declared “That the adoration is directed to the heart of Jesus as the heart of the Person of the Word to which it is inseparately united.”

Is it not an historical fact that Father Claude la Colombiere of the Society of Jesus was the first Roman Catholic ecclesiastic that was concerned in the establishment of the Sodality?—That Confraternities of “Devotion to the Sacred Heart,” existed before his time I am convinced; that some of these obtained the sanction of the Holy See, is equally certain; and from the nature of the devotion itself I must infer that it existed at all times in the church.

We have before us a book that bears this title, “The Mass of the Sacred Heart of our Lord Jesus Christ, appointed to be said on the Friday after the Octave of Corpus Christi. Dublin, printed by P. Blenkinsop, 129, Capel-street, stationer to the Roman Catholic College, Maynooth.” In that book the origin of the Society is stated in page 9, as follows: “On a certain day within the Octave of Corpus Christi, Jesus Christ appeared to the Mother Mary Margaret, a holy Nun in the Convent of the Visitation of our Blessed Lady at Parroy, in the province of Burgundy, and spoke thus to her: ‘Thou cannot,’ (says he) ‘testify thy love for me better than by doing what I have so often asked at thy hands;’ and disclosing his sacred heart, he said, ‘Behold this heart, which has loved mankind so tenderly, and spared nothing even to the wasting and consuming itself in testimony of its love; and yet in return I generally meet with nothing but ingratitude, contempt, sacrileges, irreverences, and coldness, even in the very sacrament of my love; and still what more sensibly affects me, is, that I receive this usage from hearts peculiarly consecrated to my service. Wherefore I demand of thee that the first Friday after the Octave of the Blessed Sacrament, be consecrated to a special feast in honour of my heart; that a solemn reparation of honour, and a public act of atonement be offered to it on that day, and holy communion received, with an intention to repair by it, as far as possible all the injuries and affronts it has received when exposed on the altars; and I promise it shall dilate itself to pour profusely the gifts of divine love on all such persons as shall pay to it this homage, and induce others to the performance of the same religious office. Address thyself to my servant N. and bid him from me to do all he can to establish this devotion.’—It is evident from the context of this revelation. 1. That Jesus Christ wishes to establish a particular devotion to his sacred heart. This is what his words express, this is what he asks of this holy soul. He declares that nothing can be more agreeable to him. He therefore commands her to address herself to his servant, and to desire him to do all that he can to establish this devotion. He will have it to be a particular festival, and appoints a day for its celebration. 2. It is equally evident, that all this is to be understood of the heart of Jesus Christ, in its proper and natural state, and not in a metaphorical sense. It is evident from his opening and showing his heart. Behold that heart, &c. He speaks of the heart which he shows. It is this heart he wishes to be honoured by a particular festival. We can give no other sense to the repetition of the word heart in this revelation, without offering violence to the words and to the actions of Jesus Christ.” And again in page 21, there is the following passage: “Happy to find that the devotion was to be established, she trembled at the thought of being employed in it, her youth, her natural diffidence, and her retirement from creatures, made her conclude that the execution of the design, must, in her hands, be impossible. Under this impression, she studiously concealed the revelation. But God still urging her to obey, she at length conceived that she could no longer resist without guilt. Father Claude la Colombiere, of the society of Jesus, coming providentially to Parroy, she determined to open herself fully to him. This holy man whose eminent sanctity and excellent writings still preserve his memory fresh in the minds of the faithful, full of the spirit of “ God

" God, not content with hearing from her mouth, all that had passed as above mentioned, obliged her moreover to deliver in writing, a circumstantial account of the revelation she had received, and so long concealed, concerning this devotion to the sacred heart. We have in the foregoing chapter quoted and explained it." Do you consider the passage referred to in that book as containing a true view of the origin of the Society?—Not having read the work that is now produced, I am unable to pronounce that it is inaccurate as to the account which it gives of the origin of this devotion. In passages different from those referred to, perhaps an authority may be found to give this exercise of piety an earlier origin, and which may be reconciled with the publicity which it receives from the circumstances just mentioned.

You observe that the work is printed by Blenkinsop, the stationer to the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth, and it is a fact that it contains no other account of the origin of this sodality but that to which your attention has been called?—I perceive that the work has been printed by him, but from that circumstance it derives no sanction or authority upon which I can rely.

Do you conceive that Blenkinsop, under the circumstances of his connection with Maynooth, would publish a book of this description, without the approbation of some ecclesiastical authority?—I am satisfied that he would; as I am convinced that Catholic booksellers in town have not unfrequently printed books of devotion which are in many respects inaccurate, without taking the trouble or precaution of procuring the approbation of the proper authorities.

When an authority is granted for the publication of a work, is it not generally stated in the beginning of the work, that it is published by such an authority?—Yes; the circumstance of his being stationer to the College of Maynooth, gives that book no sanction or authority whatsoever.

Is there any statement in the work going to show that it was published by authority?—There is none.

Has not Blenkinsop printed many books for the College of Maynooth?—I am not aware that he has ever printed a book for the College of Maynooth. I would observe, however, that I should not take on myself to pronounce that book to be inaccurate from what I have seen of it. I should require to read the book through in order to give an opinion of its accuracy.

From the absence of any statement in the commencement of the work that it was published by authority, does it appear to you that there is negative evidence that it was not published by authority?—It does clearly.

Is there any other account of the origin of the Sodality than that which you have read in the book now shown to you, that you conceive to be a more correct statement; if such be the case we will be obliged to you to mention it?—I am not aware of any, except that to which I have already alluded.

Was not the time of Claude la Colombiere, referred to in this passage, about the close of the seventeenth century?—Yes.

We beg now to direct your attention to this passage in page 22, "The works of Father la Colombiere were published after his death, and among the rest, the journal of his Retreats, which, among other things, contained the revelation we are speaking of; another Jesuit going to Parroy, and enjoying the confidence of this holy nun, published a Treatise on the Devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus." The passage referred to has been read to you merely to suggest, that as the society appears to have originated with one member of the society of the Jesuits, so it is here stated, in the next place, to have passed into the hands of another?—I should not conclude from the passage that has been read, that the Sodality is connected with the society of the Jesuits; the fact of the papers of Father Colombiere having fallen into the hands of another of that order, does not more fairly warrant the inference, that this devotion is an institute of the Jesuits; that its members are in connexion with that society; than it may be justly denominated an institute of the Carmelites, and be supposed within the reach of their influence and direction, had this nun selected a friar of the Carmelite order, as her director, and that through him her pious sentiments had been communicated to the public.

We now beg to direct your attention to a passage in page 137 of the same work. There is "The devout clients address to St. Aloysius," which begins thus "Angelical youth, Aloysius, by the particular appointment of God's vicar upon earth, patron of those who apply to studies;" in the litany which follows, addressed to St. Aloysius, he is thus addressed, "St. Aloysius, model of young Students, particular client of St. Ignatius, pray for us." Do not you think that the tendency and bearing of the passage which has been read from this litany, is to point out St. Aloysius, who was a member of the society of the Jesuits, as a peculiarly appropriate pattern and model for young Students?—Yes; although I admit the tendency and bearing of that passage be to recommend St. Aloysius as a model of young Students, I cannot perceive how the arbitrary, unauthorized insertion of prayers to St. Aloysius, and devotions to the Sacred Heart in the same tract, establishes a connexion between the members of the Sodality and the order of the Jesuits.

Is the litany of St. Francis Xavierius enjoined to be read by members of this Sodality?—By no means; it forms no part of the devotion of the Sodality.

Is it in any manner necessarily connected with it?—It is in no manner whatever connected with it.

Is the litany of St. Aloysius, from which a passage has been read to you, a litany which is to be read by the members of the Sodality of the Sacred Heart?—No, it is prescribed as no part of the devotion of the Sodality of the Sacred Heart.

Appendix, N° 16.

Examination of
Rev.

Philip Dowley,
15 November 1826.

We beg, however, that you will look at the table of contents of the book in question, and say whether you conceive that it is not a book connected with the Sodality of the Sacred Heart of Jesus; you will observe that it professes in the title page to be "The Mass of the Sacred Heart of our Lord Jesus Christ appointed to be said on the Friday after the Octave of Corpus Christi." [The book being handed to the Witness]?—I perceive from the title page and contents, that it professes to be a book connected with that Sodality.

Can you form any opinion, looking at the whole of the book, which the Commissioners beg you will again examine, whether it is adopted or made use of by the members of the Sodality of the Sacred Heart?—I presume from the title and the nature of the work that it must fall into the hands of many members of the Sodality of the Sacred Heart. I am not aware that it is used by any in the College of Maynooth.

Do you conceive that if that book with that title, were to fall in the way of the members of the Sodality at Maynooth, that they would or would not consider it to be a legitimate volume for them to make use of for the purposes of the Sodality?—They might consider it as a book of devotion in which many useful prayers and appropriate devotions for the Sodality may be found, without deeming it a work of authority.

Could they consider it a book which they were bound to use?—By no means.

We have understood you to say, that there is no binding obligation upon any member of the Sodality, either with respect to that book or any other?—No, there is no binding obligation with respect to any book whatsoever, nor with respect to any thing connected with this particular exercise of devotion. It is entirely left to the discretion of individuals to become members, or to comply with its pious conditions.

The Commissioners have before them a work, intituled, "The pious Sodality of the Most Sacred Heart of Jesus, universally propagated throughout the Christian World," to which is added, "Fifth Edition improved, with the approbation of Most Reverend Dr. Murray, A. D." Is that book in general circulation amongst the members of the Sodality?—Yes, I think that work is in general circulation among the members of the Sodality in Ireland.

Do you consider that work to be a work of authority?—Yes; for it bears the approbation of the Most Reverend Doctor Murray, upon the title page.

Do you consider that the other work to which your attention has been called, is a work of authority?—I cannot consider it a work of authority, as it appears to have been printed without the approbation of any ecclesiastical superior.

Do you consider it as a work that in point of fact, is not made use of by the members of the Sodality of the Sacred Heart?—I cannot say; but seeing that the book has been printed and sold in Dublin, I must presume, that it is in the hands of some of them.

Do you not conceive it possible that persons who are anxious to bring the peculiar views of the Society of the Jesuits into repute in this country, might have recourse to the expedient of publishing the volume in question, and of incorporating with it in furtherance of their own views, a variety of passages calculated to produce that effect?—The idea of such an expedient I must admit is possible; but from my knowledge of the work in question, or from those detached passages read to me, I am unable to draw such an inference; I am unwilling to believe, that the work was ever compiled for this ingenious purpose.

For the purpose of trying the question whether this book has been published with that object, we beg your attention to the following passage, in page 128; "For the more effectual prevailing with St. Francis Xavierius, it will be convenient every day to make a special commemoration of Saint Ignatius of Loyala, whom St. Francis Xavierius honoured, respected and loved, as his father, master and superior. Upon one of the nine days, the person performing this devotion must confess and communicate, making a most diligent preparation to please God and St. Francis Xavierius, for the more ready obtaining of the thing desired;" Can you have any doubt that the publisher of that book, wished to create in the mind of the members of the Sodality who might read that book, an excessive veneration for the order of the Jesuits?—I should require to read the work through, to be enabled to give an opinion as to the particular views or motives, which influenced the mind of the individual who gave this tract to the public. The compiler of this little tract might have entertained a particular devotion to those two eminent Saints, without any settled intention of furthering the views or interests of the society to which they belonged. The litanies and exercises of peculiar devotion from which those passages are selected, might have been added to swell the bulk of this little volume, and thus by an increase of price insure to the publisher an increase of profit. I can suppose it originally published even by a Jesuit, without imputing to him this concealed object. The frequent, almost continual consideration of the lives and virtues of those Saints of his order, may have an effect of exciting in his mind a peculiar veneration for them; his zeal to extend their honour and patronage, may impel him to recommend them to the faithful as patrons, or models in virtue, without intending thereby to create, in the minds of the readers of his works, an excessive veneration for the society to which he himself belonged.

Have you observed that the passage which has been last read to you, is a passage taken not from the devotion of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, but from matter added amongst other matters at the end of the devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus?—I have not been able to observe that, being scarcely at all acquainted with the work. But I perceive it now.

Is not the very circumstance of its being interwoven with a book professing in the title page to be the Mass of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, a proof of a wish existing somewhere of bringing the honour and merits of the leading Jesuits under the more particular consideration of the members of the Sodality?—These passages have a direct tendency I acknowledge, ledge, of impressing on the minds of the readers of them, the idea, that the original founders of the Society of the Jesuits were eminent Saints. But what motives influenced the mind of the person, who gave insertion to them in this work, I am not prepared to determine. A wish to the effect alluded to might have existed. But neither the title or contents of this book appear to me as evidence of the fact.

663

Philip Dowley,

Are you prepared to say that the book, such as it is, (and you are requested to examine it more particularly,) would be disapproved of as an improper book for the use of the members of the Sodality of the Sacred Heart?—Yes, I am prepared to say, that from any extract read to me, it would not be disapproved of as an improper book for the members of the Sodality. It may contain errors and objectionable matters which would render it an improper book for their use. But of this I am not aware.

You are requested to examine this book at your leisure, and to communicate to the Commissioners, whether there is any portion of it that you think would render it an unfit book for the Students at Maynooth, who may be members of the Sodality to make use of?—As there is no intention of putting this book into the hands of the Students at Maynooth, and as we feel no disposition to recommend books of any description to members of the Sodality elsewhere, I would, with great deference to the Board of Commissioners, beg leave to say, that I do not perceive how it becomes incumbent upon an individual filling the situation I hold in the College, to offer an official opinion of a work, which a bookseller in Dublin has published at his own risk and discretion.

Do not you think it a very natural and a very probable event that a book published with this title in Dublin, by the stationer to the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth, should fall into the hands of the Students at Maynooth, who are members of that Sodality?—As there is another more convenient little tract published by authority on the subject in the diocese, this is not likely to meet with much encouragement with us. Should it be found in the College of Maynooth, it shall be taken up, examined agreeably to our statutes, and if it be found to contain any thing exceptionable, its use must be prohibited to the Students.

The Commissioners will beg to point your attention to this recital in the Letters Patent of Aggregation constituting the Sodality, which will be found at page 89, of the Work: "And whereas a confraternity of the Sacred Heart, erected in the church or domestic chapel of the English Fathers of the Society of Jesus, at Bruges, has applied to us through its solicitor in Rome, Signior Joseph Monionelli, in order to obtain leave to be thus associated to ours, and to share in all its privileges and grants; we have thought fit, considering the many good works of piety, penance and charity performed in that confraternity at Bruges, (which as to all essentials is modelled upon the same plan as ours) to unite and associate it to our arch-confraternity, pursuant to the power given us for this purpose by the Holy See; and we grant to it and its members all the indulgences and particular favours mentioned in the Pope's briefs, still keeping within the terms of the decree of Clement the VIIIth, which directs such associations and communications of spiritual treasures;" does not that paragraph suggest to you, that there is more particular connection than you apprehended to exist between the Society of Jesus and the Sodality of the Sacred Heart?—None, more than I had already apprehended.

Does that paragraph do more than show this, that amongst some Jesuits who were at some particular period at Bruges, there was a Sodality of the Sacred Heart established?—Nothing more.

Pray state your view of the advantages or inducements to belong to the Sodality, that are connected with the Institution?—They derive those advantages which arise from a frequent and devout contemplation of the infinite love which glowed in the heart of Jesus, for the redemption and salvation of man; this exercise of piety tends to excite in our hearts corresponding sentiments of gratitude and love. They enjoy also the benefit of indulgencies, granted by the Holy See to all the faithful where this sodality is established. In fine, they have no inducements or advantages, as members of this pious confraternity, but such as are entirely and exclusively spiritual and religious. Here, with sentiments of great respect for this Board, I beg leave to submit, whether subjects purely and strictly religious, practices merely of Catholic discipline adopted in the College, are legitimate matter of investigation. The authority of the Visitors of the College is restricted by Act of Parliament, and does not extend to points which belong exclusively to the doctrine or discipline of the Roman Catholic religion. Whether the powers of this Commission are more extensive, it is not for me to determine.

[The Witness was informed that the question would not be pressed.]

Was Dr. Lingard, the author of the History of England, at any time a Professor in the College at Maynooth?—He was appointed Professor of the College, by the Board of Trustees, but did not accept of the situation.

Is there any Professor of the Irish language now at Maynooth?—The place of Irish Professor is vacant at present.

How long has it been vacant?—About two months.

Is it in contemplation to have it filled?—It is.

What has been the course of that Professor's duties?—His course of instruction consists in teaching the Irish Grammar, the Elements of the Language, and in directing his pupils in the translation of the Sacred Scriptures into the Irish language; in giving rules or assistance to compose or translate sermons into the language.

What Students attend his class?—The Students of the second year in divinity.

Appendix, N° 16.

Examination of
Rev.
Philip Dowley,
15 November 1826.

For that year only, or during the entire of their stay in the house?—For that year only. By a regulation of the Board of Trustees, the Students of the second year in divinity are obliged to read in the Irish class; that is, the Students from those parts of the country where the Irish language is prevalent.

What proportion of the Students of Maynooth do you think are able to maintain a conversation in Irish?—I should suppose something over one-half.

Do not you conceive the Irish language to be much less prevalent now throughout the country than it was ten or twenty years ago?—Yes, I think it is.

Do you think that its declension is to a very great extent?—I am not sufficiently acquainted with the country to be able to give an opinion as to the exact extent, but I am confident that it has been on the decline for some years.

By whom are the Monitors appointed?—Their appointment is vested in the Dean, but the ordinary mode of their nomination is, that they are selected by the Dean and proposed to the President for his approbation. In his absence, the Vice-President approves of the selection that is made.

Are the Monitors selected from every class of the Students, or from the Divinity class exclusively?—They are taken exclusively from the divinity class.

Are their duties confined to the superintendence of the Students of that class, or do they extend to all the Students in the house generally?—They extend to all the Students of the house.

Have any complaints ever been made to the superiors of the house, of the manner in which the Monitors discharge their duties?—I do not recollect that complaints to any extent have been made to the superiors of the College upon that subject, during the last twelve or thirteen years; there might have been a particular instance in which an individual felt grounds of complaint, but any thing like a general feeling of objection to the manner of discharging their duties has not existed in the College during that period.

Are the Monitors in general favoured by the superiors?—They are not favoured by the superiors because they are Monitors, but they are generally entitled to favour upon another ground, that they are the best conducted and generally the most talented portion of the Students of the College. They owe their appointment to these recommendations.

Appendix, N° 17.

Examination of
Rev.
P. J. Carew,
26 October 1826.

YOU are Professor of Greek and Latin in the College of Maynooth?—I am.

How long have you been appointed to that Professorship?—Two years last September.

What salary have you as Professor?—My nominal salary is 80*l.* Irish; from that there is a deduction of 30*l.* to be made, which is allowed for grocery.

Is your salary smaller than that which was enjoyed by your predecessor?—Yes, 30*l.* less.

Was any reason for that stated to you upon your appointment?—No reason whatever; the regulation was made before my appointment.

In other respects are you upon the same footing as the other Professors?—Yes.

You live in the house, and at the same table with them?—Yes.

Will you describe, as far as it has come within your knowledge, in what way the Professors are selected?—I believe the regulation by which they are appointed at present, commenced with me; before that, I believe, they were appointed at the discretion of the Board of Trustees; but the statutes underwent a revision some years since, and at the time that the Humanity chair became vacant, the new statute requiring the chairs to be filled by concursus, the Board ordered it to be enforced, and a concursus was announced, but no opposition having been made to me, I was appointed; since that time the same mode has been adopted in filling up the chairs.

What Professors have been appointed since that time?—Dr. Kelly, the R. C. Bishop of Dromore, was appointed without opposition to the chair of Theology; after him, Dr. Higgins, who is now Professor of Theology, and Dr. Callan, who is Professor of Natural Philosophy.

When you offered yourself as a candidate for that Professorship, did you undergo any particular examination as to your qualifications?—The knowledge which the Trustees had of my previous studies in the College, they considered a sufficient testimonial of the acquirements I had made.

In point of fact, there was no examination?—No; since that, lest persons without proper qualifications should be introduced to the Professorships (for the statutes allow a person not educated in the College to stand for a Professorship) a rule has been made by the Board, requiring that when there is no opposition, the candidate should be subjected to a particular examination.

At what time did you enter the College as a Student?—In the year 1817.

How long did you continue as a Student?—I was six years going through the regular course; I was appointed to the Dunboyne establishment after the regular course, and after having been on the Dunboyne some time, I was appointed to my present situation.

Were you only one year in the Dunboyne class?—Only one year.

Did

665

Did you obtain any premium during the course of your studies?—I did; I obtained a premium in the Humanity class; in the class of Natural Philosophy. In the class of Theology, I obtained six premiums, and on the Dunboyne I obtained two.

From what diocese were you originally recommended?—The diocese of Waterford.

By whom were you ordained?—By Dr. Murray.

Did you ever officiate as priest in any parish in Ireland?—Never; I never left the College since I entered it as a Student, except at the time of vacation.

Were you in the habit always of going to your friends at the time of vacation?—For the most part the Superiors and the Board are not willing that the Students should leave the house at every vacation; I left at two vacations during the course.

Will you state whether, for the most part, the young men who go into the College keep up their connection with their relations and friends?—The communication by letter is constant between the Students and their friends during the time of their course; in every case that I know of, it was always constant; with regard to going home at vacations, some of the Bishops obliged their subjects to write to them when they have any occasion to go home at vacation, when family circumstances may make it necessary. Some of them are very strict in this respect, and not at all willing to give this indulgence to them; other prelates are not so strict, and the Superiors of the house, when the Bishops have not issued any prohibition, generally speaking, allow them, especially when the physicians recommend them to retire to the country for the vacation; for the most part I suppose that every Student goes home two or three vacations during his course.

What do you understand to be the reason why the Superiors in the College wish that the young men should not avail themselves of the permission to go home every vacation?—The principal reason, I understand is, that they have an opportunity of improving themselves very much; during vacation the library is open, and the Students who have access to it are allowed to spend two or three hours a-day in it; and in the junior classes, lectures are appointed in Logic and Natural Philosophy, and the Board wish that the Students should avail themselves of those opportunities. They have also other reasons of a moral kind which influence them; there can be no doubt that the Students sometimes suffer in their morality, by going home at vacation. The intercourse with society sometimes diminishes that piety for which they before were remarkable, and they consider that by their remaining in the College during the entire time allowed for the College course, they will enter the ministry with more pious and fervent dispositions than they otherwise would.

How many persons were in the Dunboyne class when you were in it?—I think about 10; I am not very positive as to the number; this was about the number at the close of the year. In the early part of the year there were, I think, 16 or 17.

Will you be so good as to state, as nearly as you can recollect, what books you were possessed of, being your own private property, during the first year that you were a Student at Maynooth?—The first year I had only books connected with the classical department.

Will you state what books they were?—To distinguish between the books that were actually my own property, and those that I had got a loan of from my friends, I could hardly do; but I recollect that the course of classics required that we should have the ordinary school books, such as Horace, Livy, Homer, &c.

Had you the books mentioned in the card?—The card was not enforced at that time, though the books pointed out were nearly the same; we were also obliged to read Demosthenes, Homer, Horace, Livy, &c.

Had you those books of your own?—Generally I had; when I found it convenient to borrow such of them as I had not, of course I did. I had the ordinary school books of my own before I came to College; but when I came to College some of the books that were required there I had not; those that I had not I borrowed.

In the first year, what instruction did you receive on subjects connected with Religion?—There was a class of Scripture which was superintended by Mr. Montague, the Vice-President; he explained a portion of the Old Testament during that year; there were also catechetical instructions given by him during that year; and during the succeeding year, viz. the first year of the course of Philosophy, the same plan was followed up.

What books were you possessed of, with a view to enable yourself to take advantage of the instruction given by him?—I had Reeves's History of the Bible; others had the Douay version. Such as happened not to have the Scriptures, or this history, generally borrowed one. We were obliged to commit one or two chapters to memory; since that, there has been a regulation made, to oblige every Student, on entrance, to procure a Bible of his own.

That was not the regulation when you were in the class?—No.

Were you, in point of fact, yourself possessed of either a Bible or a New Testament?—I was of a New Testament, but not of a Bible. I had Reeves's History of the Bible. I got a large one with annotations, afterwards, as a premium. I had also the Greek Testament.

When did you obtain that as a premium?—In my Theology.

How soon after you entered did you get a New Testament?—I had a New Testament when I entered, but I did not bring it with me from home; I sent for it in some time after my entrance. I found no difficulty in procuring a loan of one, when I required it.

Had the young men in the class in which you were, Testaments in general?—Understanding the question to apply to the Old Testament, they must have been very common among them; otherwise they would not have been able to prepare their lecture twice a week. This must be understood of the second year, when the History of the Bible began to be but little used in class.

Appendix, N° 17.

Examination of
Rev.P. J. Carew,
26 October 1826.

Can you state, in point of fact, from your own knowledge, that many of them were in possession of Testaments?—I could not say what number possessed them as their own. I believe that many could have procured them in the College.

Do you think there were only a few, or do you think that the greater part were possessed of Testaments?—I rather think at that time the younger Students, for the most part, borrowed them.

What year do you refer to?—The first year, and second also.

Was there a regulation requiring them to procure Testaments of their own?—Not at that time. Since that time there has been a cheap edition of the New Testament printed by Coyne, and they are able to get them more easily. There was the small edition of the Douay Bible, divided into five volumes; and as the Students in the Theology class generally read the New Testament, they had no difficulty in lending the volumes of the Old Testament to the Junior Students.

Had the Students in Theology, in general, copies of the New Testament among themselves?—The copies must have been very numerous, otherwise they could not have prepared for the class.

In point of fact, do you believe that the great body of the Students of Theology were severally provided with the Testament in general?—In general, I rather think they were.

Can you go a step beyond opinion upon the subject; can you say that you know, that as many as one half were in possession of the Scriptures as their own private property?—I would not like to state that positively.

What is your belief?—I think they were.

Speaking of a period as far back as the time when you were yourself in that class?—Yes.

Have you any knowledge upon that subject now?—I believe that they have a greater number of copies of the Scriptures now than they ever had, in consequence of the new regulation, and in consequence of their having the opportunity of getting the Bible much cheaper than they could get it then.

Will you describe the course that is pursued in the Scriptural lectures that are given in Mr. Browne's class?—The plan that was followed in my time, and which I understand is persevered in, was, that one or two chapters were marked out. It sometimes happens that one chapter is more difficult than another, and of course they devote more time to that chapter than to the others. They study the commentaries on that chapter, and then they are called on in class, and interrogated as to the exposition of the text, and the Professor supplies any defects that they, in consequence of their inexperience, or their not having studied the matter sufficiently well, may labour under.

In pursuing the lectures upon one of the Gospels, are the chapters selected successively, and in such a manner as to give a comprehensive view of the whole?—Generally we commence with the first chapter, and follow on.

It is not a succession of lectures upon insulated accidental chapters?—No; the chapters are generally followed on in the whole course of Scripture, that is read under Mr. Browne. In the latter part of the Epistles the moral part is ordinarily contained, and this not requiring much explanation, is passed over lightly.

Are the Commissioners to understand, that those chapters are omitted only because they are such as are easily in themselves understood, and therefore not requiring much explanation?—Exactly.

There is nothing in the nature of reserve of chapters?—Nothing whatever.

When the Professor explains those chapters, are notes in writing taken by the Students who hear him?—Sometimes it is the case; not generally.

Are they examined upon a subsequent day upon the subject of the lecture he has delivered on the preceding day?—Generally they are prepared before they come to class, upon the chapter, and he interrogates them, and the defects of their explanation he supplies.

For instance, does he interrogate them upon the first chapter of the Gospel of St. John, upon the same day on which he explains it himself, or upon the next day?—It is not usual to give a regular exposition of the chapter. They are ordered to read over the chapter, and they come to the class, and are interrogated as to the exposition of it, and the defects of their exposition he supplies. He sometimes gives a regular exposition, and then it is usual to interrogate afterwards upon it.

Does he address them in Latin?—No, in English.

But the chapter in which he lectures is in the Vulgate?—The Vulgate edition of the Scriptures is that they make use of, for the most part, when called upon to answer in class.

Is the whole of the Scriptures gone through in the course of those lectures?—Not all.

Are there any parts which are not gone through?—A great many parts. During the first year the Student enters the house, they read a portion of the Old Testament under Mr. Montague, and I believe during the second year also; but when they commence their Theology, they read select portions of the New Testament, some of the Epistles of St. Paul, and some of the Gospels; but generally in their reading they connect those parts of the New Testament, which have relation to one another. For instance, when they are explaining the Gospel of St. Matthew, they have recourse to the other Gospels, in order to reconcile the discrepancies which the younger Students may think exist in the Evangelists.

Do those lectures of Mr. Montague extend to any part of the Old Testament, except the Pentateuch?—Yes, I believe the Book of Tobias is sometimes read.

Any

Any other?—I think not; I am not positive with regard to the Book of Tobias. On reflection, I recollect that the books, at least some of the Books of Kings, were read whilst I attended the class. Tobias was not read.

Will you state the course you pursue in delivering lectures to your own class?—The card of studies I suppose the Commissioners have seen. The books appointed for the second class, are the four first books of Homer, the two first books of the Anabasis and Epictetus, from the fifth to the eighth book of the Æneid of Virgil, inclusive, the Odes of Horace, some of the select Satires of Juvenal, some of the select Orations of Cicero, and the three first books of Livy—those are the works pointed out for that class; they are not able to go through the entire course, in consequence of being obliged to attend to a great many other exercises, but they read a considerable part of this course; they are able to read more or less of it according to their abilities; sometimes it may happen that one class will contain a greater number of Students who have received the advantage of a better early education, and are possessed of better abilities, and they will be able to do more than another class who have not enjoyed those advantages to the same extent.

Do you find when they come into your class, that they have for the most part obtained a competent knowledge of Greek and Latin, so as to enable them to construe the easier works?—There are a great many that have received a good previous education, but there are some that are very deficient.

Can you state at all the degree of acquirement that the young men who come in now appear to possess, as compared with that which was possessed by those who came in when you were first admitted into the class?—When I was first admitted, there was no examination in Greek required; I believe it was sometimes required, but in my case there was none; now, a Student is not admitted without being subjected to an examination in Greek, he must be able to answer in part of the Greek Testament, and in the first book of Lucian, and in the three first books of the Cyropede.

Upon the whole do you think that the standard is rather raised than otherwise, since the time you first entered the College?—Considerably.

And that the proficiency of those who enter the College, is greater than it was at that period?—Yes.

Will you state what proficiency they generally attain to during the time they are in your class; do they acquire a competent knowledge of the ordinary classical works?—Those parts that are read, they generally know very well; they are also obliged to attend to composition both in Greek and Latin, and in order to give them some knowledge of ancient history, the subjects are generally selected from the Grecian and Roman Histories. I oblige them this year to write the History of Rome in Latin, and the History of Greece in Greek.

Speaking not of a few selected individuals of your class, but of as large a portion as one half or two thirds, do you think that they could, upon having put into their hands any work that they are in the habit of reading, construe three or four pages without your assistance and without much previous study, in such a way as to show that they really understand the spirit and meaning of the author?—I have no doubt that a greater portion than an half could do that.

What portion do you think could do it?—I think I should not over-rate it by stating that three-fourths could do it.

To what works would that apply?—With reference to those parts which they read in the course of the academical year, of Homer, Xenophon, Livy, Horace, Virgil and Cicero, I think that nearly three fourths of the class would be able to answer satisfactorily.

Does your observation apply to the works of Lucian?—That is not one of the class books; they are liable to an examination in the first book of Lucian when they enter, and they must give satisfaction in it.

Do they compose much in Latin?—They do a great deal.

Upon what sort of subjects?—Generally speaking, the subject is history; but I have occasionally given them other subjects to write on, for instance, I gave them last year a number out of the Spectator; and at one time I gave them to write, a Dissertation on the Benefits arising to the Country from the institution of the College, and different other subjects which occurred to me when they were about to compose.

Are their themes preserved?—Yes, I have got them; if the Commissioners wish to see them, I can send them up at any time. I have preserved the pieces of all those that obtained premiums in the class.

Do they ever compose in Latin verse?—Yes.

Frequently?—After Christmas for the most part in Latin verse; during the preceding time I find it necessary to occupy from September to Christmas in giving such instruction as will prepare them for composing in Latin verse; but from Christmas to the end of the academical year they are employed in the composition of Latin verse, and their success during the last year has been very great.

It appeared from the manner in which the Commissioners had an opportunity of hearing them read, that you are very attentive to prosody?—I pay the greatest attention to it; they have constant exercise in it. I have no doubt but the Commissioners would feel highly gratified with inspecting some of the pieces they have written in Latin verse.

Have you tried them in other verse, besides the hexameter and pentameter?—Yes.

Are they in the habit of composing in Greek verse?—Last year they did; the first year they did not do so with me, but the last year they did, and with great success, I mean all those who got premiums, except one.

Appendix, N^o 17.Examination of
Rev.P. J. Carew,
26 October 1826.

Have the goodness to state what is the age generally of the young men in your class?—

The general age of the young men in the class is about twenty, from eighteen to twenty, I have some much younger in the class.

Have you any in the class that were not thought fit to be removed to the higher class at the regular period of removal?—The custom at present is, that they pass always, almost without exception, from the Humanity class to the Rhetoric class, even though they should be somewhat deficient; there is a rule of the Board that authorizes the superior of the College to continue them another year in the Humanity class if they should be deficient, but that is very seldom acted upon; it has not been acted upon at all since I was appointed Professor.

Has it ever occurred to you to think, that any improvements could be made in the mode of instruction given in your class, either as to the arrangement of time or the division of the Students?—The class is not too large to be directed by one Professor; the only improvement that occurs to me that could be made consistently with our present system, is one that I suggested to a Committee of the Trustees that was appointed to inquire into the studies of the house; and that was, that in the vacation which succeeds the first academical year, the Students should have a certain portion of Classics appointed for them to prepare before they commenced the course of Rhetoric. This observation was attended to by the Board of Trustees; they took a note of it, but it has not as yet been acted upon, but I believe it will. I am particularly desirous that those parts of the Classics that are pointed out for the Humanity year, which they are not able to read for want of time, should, during the vacation be read by them, and that they should be prepared to answer in them before they are allowed to commence their course of Rhetoric.

Will you state, whether there is any Monitor connected with your class, who assists in the instruction of the Students?—Not one; it is not necessary to have an assistant, as there are two lectures every day, except Wednesdays, Saturdays and Sundays; on Saturday there is one lecture.

There are persons connected with the Institution called Monitors, are there not?—There are, they have nothing to do whatever with the instruction of the Students; their duty is to assist in enforcing the discipline of the College.

Will you describe on what occasions, and in what manner, they assist in enforcing the discipline of the house?—They always return to the Deans the names of the persons absent from the morning and night prayer. When the Students assemble in the winter season in the halls, two of them are appointed to preserve order in the hall; and in the class of Theology there are persons appointed by the Professor, also to return to the Professors the names of those that do not attend.

What number of Monitors are there?—I believe the number varies according to the extent of the community; but I should think, in general, there must be about fourteen or fifteen of them.

They are selected of course from the senior Students?—Yes.

By whom are they selected?—By the Dean; the appointment comes from the President, but I believe with the advice and approbation of the other superiors, principally of the Dean.

When once selected as Monitors do they so continue?—Generally; some of them may happen to be appointed to the Dunboyne establishment.

Are the gentlemen on the Dunboyne establishment Monitors?—There are two of them Monitors for their own class only.

Were you at any time yourself a Monitor?—I was, in my second year of Theology, and in my third year of Theology.

Is it thought to be a situation of considerable confidence and authority?—They are, generally speaking, Students whose conduct gives satisfaction to their superiors, but as to any authority with which they are invested, it is merely nominal.

Do they not, in point of fact, exercise considerable superintendence?—Not further than I have stated; they return to the Dean the names of persons absent from prayer in the morning, and at night if they found any persons absent from the study in the winter season, they would return their names; and if they saw any Student very irregular in his conduct they might communicate his name.

Are they in the habit of communicating with the Dean upon the subject of the discipline of the College?—Pretty much so; the Dean frequently asks them, how the Students under their care are conducting themselves; then of course they give an account to the Dean.

Does that occur as often as once a week, or not so often?—Not so often; if I were to speak from my own experience, I should think that while I was Monitor, the Dean did not speak to me upon the subject more than two or three times in the course of the year; the second year I was Monitor, I was appointed to the superintendence of the Students who were in the College for their first year, and generally the Deans have more communication with the Monitors appointed to superintend the junior Students.

If it should be necessary for the Monitors to admonish any of the Students upon the subject of their conduct, in such cases are they generally attended to, or is their authority recognised?—I think that, generally speaking, every well disposed Student in the house would receive an admonition from a Monitor very gratefully, provided it were communicated in a proper manner.

Does it frequently happen that they are so admonished?—I rather think it does not.

In your own experience, when you were a Monitor, was it necessary for you frequently to speak to the young men as to their conduct?—Very seldom; when I did happen to do so, I always found them respectful.

Will you state, whether on the day of recreation, when the young men walk about the country, the Monitors then had any superintendence over them?—Generally one of the Deans accompanies the Students on the public walk, and if he should not find it convenient, he appoints one or two of the Monitors to superintend the public walk; otherwise they have no more care of the walk than the other Students; in his appointment of persons to superintend the walk, he is not limited to the Monitors, he may appoint any other Students, but generally the Monitors are selected.

Is it any part of the duty of the Monitors to enforce the obligation of maintaining silence at particular times?—In the hall principally it is; it is expected also, of course, that they will contribute to do so even outside the hall; but it rarely happens that they do interfere unless there is a gross violation of rule.

Is there not a part of the day in which the young men refresh themselves by walking in the ground within the walls of the College?—Yes, after meals, and at other times also.

Under what superintendence are they at that time?—Under none, except that of the Monitors, who are subject to the same rules with the other Students; they, the Monitors, are always on the walks along with them, but the Students do not feel themselves under any restraint in consequence of their presence; at present I find scarcely any distinction to exist between the Monitors and the other Students; they associate together as companions and friends, and no person feels himself under any restraint; of course, a Student that was inclined to commit any irregularity, would not wish to do it in the presence of the Monitor.

As far as conversation goes, is it then unreserved and unrestrained?—It generally is; I am well aware, however, that a Student of a turbulent disposition would not express his sentiments generally in the presence of a Monitor.

Will you have the goodness to state with reference to the state of mind of the Students during the time you were there, whether there was much feeling upon, or much interest taken in, or much conversation about political subjects?—During the early part of the time during which I was a Student, as well as I recollect, political subjects were very rarely spoken of by the Students; the question of Emancipation was sometimes talked of I believe. I do not recollect any particular occasion on which it was discussed, but the impression on my mind is, that it was sometimes discussed, but in no other way whatever than that in which persons in society are in the habit of talking of it. I never heard any observation made, which I could not hear with propriety from any gentleman here present upon the subject; there was no feeling whatever of disloyalty or sedition, or any tendency of this kind ever manifested. I never heard or witnessed any thing of the kind amongst them; they were anxious no doubt that the measure should be accomplished, but they did not talk of it in any way which I conceive at all incompatible with the strictest and most faithful discharge of their duty.

Were those conversations frequent?—No.

When held, were they of the character of an eager anxious public discussion, or were they the discourse of one Student walking with his friend?—That was exactly the character of them.

Were those subjects discussed in an eager and heated state of mind?—Not by any means; Students walking together as friends and companions conversed in a calm tranquil manner on the subject.

Was there at any time an anxious desire to obtain a knowledge of public transactions, to know the news, and to know the state of parties?—At all times I believe a Student would have felt obliged if a Professor were kind enough to lend him a newspaper, this I dare say was the case with some Students particularly who were more anxious than others about news; but with regard to the introduction of newspapers into the house, or resorting to illicit means to obtain information, I believe that was very rarely the case.

Was there at that time amongst the young men, a prevailing feeling that it was a part of the duty of the priesthood of Ireland to interfere in the guidance of the political feelings of their flocks as well as of their religious feelings?—I never heard such an observation when I was a Student.

Have you ever had occasion to trace such an idea among them?—Never during the whole time I was a Student; I never heard such an observation.

In the conversations which you say took place between persons at that time, have you ever heard the idea discussed of the wisdom of a separation of Ireland from England, and the good effects likely to result from a Union with any other country, or a hope entertained that it might ever come to pass?—I do not recollect that I ever did; perhaps in the course of conversation it might have occurred, but I recollect no occasion on which it ever did; or if it was ever introduced into conversation, it was in a calm tranquil manner, discussed rather in a speculative way than with any view to its ever taking place. I do not recollect any conversation upon the subject, but I do not deny that some conversation might have taken place of a purely speculative and abstract kind, in the same way that I would suppose any persons to discuss a point of theology or a point of philosophy.

Was the state of the Established church ever a subject of conversation?—Never that I recollect; the impressions on my mind are too indefinite to allow me to speak positively on the subject; but I am quite certain that those subjects were not at all frequent among the Students; they might have said, perhaps, that they conceived that the revenues of the Established church were too large, but I do not recollect any occasion on which they did

Did you ever hear any wish expressed among them, that the possessions of the Established church should be transferred to the Roman Catholic church?—Never.

Did you ever hear any discussion as to the degree of right, or the contrary, that the Established church might have to retain those possessions?—Never; if I heard any conversation on the subject it was a wish that those funds might be appropriated by the government to some other purpose that might be conducive to its welfare. I recollect having discussed or rather conversed with one or two of my companions on the right which the law on tithes confers, and on the nature of the law which prescribes the payment of them.

Were the events of the history of Ireland frequently, or ever the subject of conversation?—Very rarely; the conversation for the most part turns on the business of the class, as the Students in the same class often associate together and talk on the business of their respective departments.

Of course they sometimes speak on other subjects?—They sometimes do; but generally speaking their conversation is on their own class business, and the best means of improving themselves; if it be not of that description it is generally some easy conversation that will afford them relaxation, but I never heard any political disquisition on the antiquities of Ireland.

Were there any literary societies held for the purpose of discussion, in your time?—I believe during my first year there was a Belles Lettres Society, but after that, I never heard a word of it.

That was in the class above you probably?—It was amongst those who were more advanced than myself; I had no connection whatever with it.

Nor was there any such society in the higher class when you were advanced to it?—Not any.

Did you attend Dr. Delahogue's lectures?—No; I attended Dr. Mac Hale's lectures. Dr. Delahogue for a short time lectured in the absence of Dr. Mac Hale, but Dr. Mac Hale was Professor when I was in my course of theology.

Are you acquainted with Dr. Delahogue's Tract de Ecclesia?—I am; I studied it, and obtained a premium in it.

Did Dr. Mac Hale, while he filled the chair of theology, inculcate the same principles as Dr. Delahogue does in that work?—Precisely; I never heard him differ, in my recollection, on any point at all; there are some particular opinions, not at all connected with any thing political, directly or indirectly; on those, and in the mode of reasoning, he may have differed from Dr. Delahogue.

Did Dr. Mac Hale inculcate the principle that the Pope has no civil or temporal power, nor any right to interfere, directly or indirectly, in matters of a civil or temporal nature?—Most explicitly; I recollect to have been myself questioned by Dr. Mac Hale on the subject of the temporal power of the Pope, and to have maintained the opposite proposition. I recollect at that time to have answered some of the Ultra-Montane difficulties, and to have been appointed to a second premium at the succeeding distribution of prizes.

Are the Commissioners to understand, that you maintained the principle that the Pope had not any civil or temporal power?—Yes, with regard to the premium of which I spoke. It sometimes happened that two or three or more persons were appointed ex æquo to cut for a premium, and I was one of those on the occasion to which I referred.

Did Dr. Mac Hale inculcate the principle of allegiance as due by Roman Catholics to His Majesty?—I never heard any thing, directly or indirectly, from which the contrary could be inferred; on the contrary, I heard a great deal explicitly on the subject, and I never heard a word containing the least disrespect whatever for the established authorities of the country, or any thing whatever from which the slightest disrespect could be inferred; I cannot use language too strong to express what I am saying.

Have you ever heard it taught in the College, that it was lawful for Roman Catholics to violate the oath of allegiance, for that there was in the Pope a power to absolve them from the obligation of it?—I am quite satisfied that if any person were seriously to lay down such a proposition, and that the superior got notice of it, the person would be instantly removed from the College, unless he retracted the proposition and apologized for his conduct, and I do not know that that would save him from expulsion; I do not think it would.

Do you believe that any such principle is held or maintained by any persons in the College?—I do not.

Do you believe that any such principle was maintained at any time during the period in which you have been a member of the community, either as a Student or as a Professor?—I am quite certain there was not; I never heard any thing whatever that could induce me to entertain the slightest suspicion that such a principle was maintained by any person, either Professor or Student, in the College.

Would you consider such a principle one that it is possible to maintain or defend?—I do not conceive it possible to maintain it.

Do you look upon it as an atrocious principle?—I do; a principle that would lead to the subversion of good order in society, and that would interfere with every established civil right.

Do you believe that that is the view generally taken of the subject in the College?—I do believe there is nothing upon which the Students and Professors in the College are more unanimous.

Do you know that Dr. Mac Hale, while he was Professor of Theology, addressed a letter to to the Archbishop of Tuam about three years ago?—I never saw the letter; there was an allusion to it in a letter which appeared lately from him.

You were not aware that he had written a letter to the Archbishop of Tuam?—Never before I saw that allusion to it.

Are you aware that he has addressed a letter to the Archbishop of Tuam more recently?—It was from that letter that I inferred that he addressed a letter to him before.

Do you conceive that Dr. Mac Hale's sentiments, with respect to the constituted authorities of this country generally, and the established church in particular, when he was lecturing a year ago in the College of Maynooth, were essentially different from those which he now holds as Roman Catholic Bishop of Killala?—Whilst he was Professor of Theology, the only occasion on which I had an opportunity of knowing his sentiments, with regard to the established authorities of the country, was, when he was teaching the treatise of the church, that is the only treatise in which the Professor of Dogmatic Theology has an opportunity of expressing his sentiments upon the subject; when he was doing so, he most explicitly maintained the doctrine contained in Dr. Delahogue's treatise.

You must have heard him discuss the marks of true and false churches?—Certainly I did.

Are the Commissioners to understand, that he did not discuss the marks of false churches as applicable to the established church of this country?—Certainly he did discuss the marks of a false church as applicable to the Protestant church of this country.

Do you conceive, that his opinion with respect to the established church, as expressed upon those occasions, was different from that which he expresses at present as Bishop of Killala?—When he spoke on the subject, as a Professor, in the class, he always considered the matter in a purely spiritual point of view. The question of the temporalities of the established church was never by any means introduced even by accident in the class.

Are the Commissioners to collect from you, that his view of the subject was not merely spiritual but respectful?—He did not differ in any way whatever from the treatise; he did not deliver a single sentiment that is not contained in the treatise, with regard to the established church, or any other establishment separated from our communion.

Have you read his recent letter to the Archbishop of Tuam?—I have.

Upon the subject of the established church?—Yes, I have just glanced over the letter.

Have you observed what he has said as to the origin of that church, as to its present right to its possessions, and as to the probability of its continuing to retain them?—I read over the letter.

Do you consider the mode in which those topics are treated evinces that respect for the established church to which your preceding answers have referred?—I thought that I had explained myself sufficiently well on that subject, but I have no hesitation in giving a more full explanation. When talking of the marks of the true church, he showed in the clearest manner that he could, and he possesses great abilities, that those marks were applicable to the Catholic church, and that they were not applicable to the Protestant church; further than that he never went at all into the discussion on the subject. When he came to that proposition in the treatise of the church, which discusses the temporal power of the Pope, he was most explicit in maintaining that the Pope had no temporal power whatever over the monarch of these countries; he maintained every thing that was maintained in the treatise, and further he did not enter into this subject. I never heard any thing more from him upon the subject in the class.

Did you ever hear from him any opinion as to the probability of the duration of the established church, and the continuance of the Protestant religion?—I never heard him say how long he thought the established church or the Protestant religion would continue. The impression on my mind is, that he sometimes observed that the established church and the Protestant religion would, like other societies separated from the Catholic church, decay, and that the elements of decay were already visible. On this point, however, I cannot say any thing with certainty or precision, having no distinct recollection of any occasion which could call on him to express such an opinion.

Did you ever see a pamphlet published under the title of Hierophilos?—I did.

Was that written by Dr. Mac Hale?—It was generally attributed to him; I never heard him say that he wrote it.

Do you recollect it being distributed at Maynooth?—It was sold at Maynooth.

Do you mean that it was sold within the walls of the College?—Yes, there were copies sent down from Dublin.

Was it generally understood to be the work of Dr. Mac Hale?—It was, and it is still understood to be so.

He being at that time Professor of Dogmatic Theology in the College?—Yes.

It was published about two years ago?—About two or three years ago.

Was there more than one work published under that title?—No; but the letters came out at different times, and some of the editions consequently are larger than others.

Have you not understood, that there is a regulation against pamphlets being sold or distributed at all in the College?—There is a regulation that would seem to prohibit the introduction of pamphlets, and which prohibits certainly periodical publications of any kind among the Students; but a work of that kind was not considered to come within the limits of the regulation.

Was it pretty generally bought by the Students?—It was, pretty generally.

When you were appointed Monitor, what instructions did you receive, or did you receive any particular instructions with respect to your duties?—None whatever; the superiors principally expect that the Monitors will contribute to the good of the community by giving good example.

Examination of Rev.Christopher Boylan,
27 October 1826.

WHAT Professorship do you hold in the College of Maynooth?—I hold two Professorships at present; the one in virtue of an appointment in 1818, the other has been a matter not of my own choice. The first chair is that of English rhetoric; the other is the chair of French, which I have been obliged to hold, and for which I get no remuneration. I first held the chair of Oriental Languages; I was nominated by the Board to study those languages, with a promise that I should be appointed to a chair in the College, as soon as I should be qualified to teach them. Having been introduced to Dr. Barrett, the late Vice Provost of Trinity College, I received from him private lectures in Hebrew and Chaldee for about eight months, and upon my return with his certificate, I was appointed Professor of Oriental Languages. (I had previously received lectures from another individual. In both cases, my expenses were defrayed by the Trustees.) In the year 1818, the class which had been previously a class of elocution, was raised to the rank of a class of English rhetoric, and given to me as my ordinary class, on condition of giving up the Oriental Languages, which chair was assigned to another gentleman, who had been Professor of Scripture. The change in the class of elocution was effected, besides other reasons, for the purpose of enforcing more attention to the studies connected with English rhetoric, than had been before required by the ordinary regulations of the College.

Does this arrangement appear to you to have been injurious to the method of instruction established at Maynooth, or advantageous to it?—I believe it has been generally admitted to have been very advantageous, so far as regarded the departments I have mentioned, of composition and declamation.

Is it advantageous to the Students, in your opinion?—I wish to speak diffidently of arrangements with which I have been myself connected; but I think it was advantageous to the Students; they had by it better opportunities of cultivating those subjects than they possessed before.

Has the arrangement been productive of personal inconvenience to yourself?—I did not give up the chair of Oriental Languages without some regret; but the arrangement with regard to the English class, was productive of no other inconvenience whatever to me.

Will you be so good as to state your object in giving this explanation to the Commissioners?—I can assure the Commissioners, that my only object is to answer such questions as they have proposed. In reference to the French class, I certainly wish that the Commissioners would esteem the labour of teaching it for more than six years, entitled to some remuneration. With regard to the class of English rhetoric, I have only to remark, that there have been changes in it within the last two years and a half, which, as far as my experience goes, have not been for the benefit of the class.

Will you describe the changes to which you allude?—The principal change to which I allude is, that in June 1824 the Board of Trustees limited the time which the Students were, by existing regulations, obliged to attend the class; they had been in the habit of attending the class from the time of their entrance into College till they joined the class of Natural Philosophy; this was changed in so far, that the attendance was limited to a single year; formerly the younger Students attended the class for two years, sometimes for three, but by the new regulation, the attendance has been confined to a single year.

Do you think that that time is insufficient?—I think the time is not at all sufficient, because there are many who do not come to College much versed in those matters, and because attention to them in College is in many cases confined to the hour of class. When that is limited to a single year, many of course leave the class very imperfect in this useful branch of knowledge, and can therefore have no great facility of expressing their thoughts, either by speaking or writing, or of giving useful public instruction.

Will you explain the course of instruction you pursue?—The instructions which I give are for the most part with a view to practice in the two departments of declamation and composition, and their minor branches; of course, teaching to read correctly, and pronounce correctly. This course of instruction was prescribed by the College Board at the time of my appointment. The classes are four in the week, on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday; these are the regular class days of the College; they are held on the evening of each of these days, from five to six; one evening in each week is appropriated to declamation, and another for explaining the principles of composition; there is one evening in each fortnight set apart for a composition during the hour of class; that composition is afterwards examined as minutely as I can; some of the pieces are brought publicly to be read in class, in order to remark upon the faults or beauties of them; sometimes I bring forward nothing but the faults of the exercises, and have them corrected by the class. Occasionally, of course, there were lectures upon pronunciation and reading; in general, however, the rules of pronunciation were repeated whenever it appeared necessary, and I am always careful, during the course of the year, to ascertain whether the Students make themselves masters of those rules; besides these exercises, there are private essays written at the leisure and choice of the Students, upon a certain line of subjects. Generally once in three weeks there was an evening allotted for their perusal, when the best were brought forward, and read in the class. In the present year these essays have not been so numerous as formerly.

Of what number does your class consist?—Of about 60 or 70; formerly it was 125 or 130; it is this year 68.

It

It is not a separate class entirely?—It is not; the Students attend other classes of the College at the same time.

For the most part what other class do they attend?—At present the greater part attend the classes of Humanity; some few attend Logic.

Do they attend during the first or second year of their studies?—During the first year they are all engaged in other studies; at the same time, the other studies are very heavy, and of course their attention must be greatly divided.

It seems, from the account you have given of it, that the studies which the young men prosecute under your instructions, are quite incidental to their other studies?—There is no year set apart for them exclusively.

In what hall do you lecture?—I used to lecture in the Hall of Logic; but for the last two years, in the Humanity Hall.

Has the Professorship you hold always existed?—Under the name of English Rhetoric it has not; nor have the duties of the class been conducted in the same manner heretofore: formerly the instructions were merely in reading or pronunciation; the chief objects with me have been composition and declamation. I may remark here, that in both, the exercises are of a religious character.

How frequently do you make them show compositions to you?—There is always one every fortnight.

Does every boy in the class show you a composition?—Always.

Do you set the theme upon which that is composed?—I set the theme always myself; in the beginning of the year, I announce the theme generally an evening or two before, and afterwards, when they are more advanced, I generally leave them to their own resources at the moment.

What instruction in French do you give?—I became connected with the French class in 1820, in the manner already stated; since that time, the instruction has been confined to the elements of the language, and to the translating of a few works in prose and verse. I believe it did not embrace a wider range at any former period. The very limited time allowed for the class would not suffer me to extend it.

Were you educated in France?—No, I never was in France; I have been educated at Maynooth.

From what diocese were you recommended?—From the diocese of Meath.

Where were you at school before you went to College?—I went very early to Maynooth; I have been there these 22 years. I came to the Lay College young, and after being there part of three academic years, I got a bursar in the Royal College; I remained there for seven years. After the close of the Maynooth long course of studies, I was recommended to the Board for the study of the Oriental Languages, as mentioned before.

Will you describe what class of Students you have who learn French?—At present the Students who attend the French class are the Logicians; formerly they were those of the class of Natural Philosophy.

What number of them attend?—The number this year is 67.

What hours do they attend?—Twice a week; on Tuesday morning for an hour before mass, and on Saturday from one to two o'clock.

Do they attend for one year only?—For one year only.

What degree of proficiency do they attain during the time they are under your instruction?—I think that when the class of Natural Philosophy attended the French class, they made greater proficiency than is done now. The present Students, however, learn the grammar, and read, generally, three or four, and sometimes five books of Telemachus; always three, and sometimes five books of La Fontaine's Fables.

Do the majority of the class attain the power of reading French with ease?—Far the greater number read it so as to understand it.

Do they compose in French at all?—The time assigned for the study is so short as not to allow us to attend to composition in French, but sometimes French dialogues have formed a part of the studies.

It is not to be supposed that under such circumstances any of them learn to speak French?—Unless with a great deal of private industry, added to their attendance upon class, they could not; some, however, do speak French.

Does La Fontaine's Fables appear to you to be a proper work to be put into the hands of the young men?—It has been used there a long time. Whenever we meet a fable which is not considered correct, it is passed by*.

So far as you are acquainted with the principles taught and maintained in the College, are the principles, that the Pope has no right to interfere, directly or indirectly, in any matter of a civil or temporal nature, and that it is the bounden duty of the subjects of these countries to pay allegiance to His Majesty as their Sovereign, maintained there?—Always; the allegiance which we owe His Majesty is not a matter of opinion; we all swear that no foreign power, whatever be its prerogatives or pre-eminence, can interfere, directly or indirectly, with the obedience due to the temporal sovereignty of our country. Our practice corresponds with this solemn profession; nor do I think that the Royal College of Maynooth yields to any portion of His Majesty's subjects in dutiful attachment to the person of the King, or in respect for the constituted authorities of the Empire.

[Subsequently added by the Witness.]

* It is the best work that can be put into the hands of any person who wishes to learn the idiom of the language, and the laws of its versification.

Appendix, N° 19.

Examination of the Reverend Jeremiah Donovan; October 26th, 1826.

Appendix, N° 19.

Examination of
Rev.Jeremiah Donovan,
26 October 1826.

WHAT Professorship do you hold in the College of Maynooth?—I am Professor of Rhetoric and Belles Lettres.

How long have you held that situation?—I have held it since 1819.

Were you educated at the College?—I read my Ecclesiastical course in the College; I was at Carlow before I came to Maynooth; there I closed my classical course, and in 1811 entered Maynooth. At the close of my Ecclesiastical course at Maynooth, I obtained a Professorship in Carlow, and from Carlow I returned to Maynooth as Professor of Rhetoric, which situation I hold at present.

What Professorship did you hold in Carlow?—A Professorship in the classical department.

Was the Dunboyne class established when you were at Maynooth?—Yes.

Were you in that Class yourself?—No; I got an appointment for Carlow immediately at the close of my Ecclesiastical course in Maynooth.

From what diocese were you recommended originally?—From my native diocese, Cloyne and Ross.

What salary do you receive?—It was 110*l.* Irish, and it is now that sum reduced to English money, from which, in common with the other Professors, I am obliged to purchase groceries, wine, &c.

Be so good as to describe the course of instruction you give to your class?—The course of instruction for the Rhetoric class is confined to the ordinary academical year of ten months; the Latin treatise of rhetoric that I teach is Quintilian; I am however allowed a certain latitude with regard to the selection of books, and I have occasionally taught the Dialogue on Oratory, sometimes Tacitus, and also the six last books of the Æneid, and the Georgics of Virgil; I uniformly teach the Art of Poetry, upon which, of course, I find Boileau's Art of Poetry, and Vida's also, and Pope's Essay on Criticism, useful. I explain the Art of Poetry principally on account of the rhetorical precepts it contains on composition in general, and on delivery. In Greek, the treatise of rhetoric that I teach is that of Longinus. I call it a treatise on rhetoric, though it professes to be a treatise on the sublime, because, as Blair justly observes, and as the division of the work, and its substance clearly evince, it is a treatise on excellence in writing, or on rhetoric, rather than a treatise on the sublime. Though Longinus treats very particularly, and in a strict sense of the sublime, his treatise comprehends much more, embracing, as I have said, the general principles of rhetoric. Aristotle's Treatise of Rhetoric I should not approve of as a class book, it is so like his own mind—though profound and philosophical, dry and abstract, yet I think there are many things in Aristotle which it would be inconvenient for a Student of rhetoric not to know, particularly in his second book, to which even Cicero is said to have been so much indebted; I therefore introduce Aristotle to the notice of the Students, and bring before them more immediately select passages from the entire work. As a practical illustration of these precepts, and as a model, I teach the orations of Demosthenes; with regard to these too I feel myself justified in taking a certain latitude. We read, for instance, last year, the celebrated oration of Eschines; I also require of the Students to bring in an abstract of the oration in English, which is read publicly, and which is supposed to contain the historical circumstances that led to the oration, and an analysis of it, and is also supposed to point out such passages as are more particularly deserving of notice, and any rhetorical management on the part of the orator; in a word, the whole economy of the oration; this is read publicly. There are, however, many things with which a Student of rhetoric should be made familiar, that are not contained even in these treatises, though the best that antiquity has transmitted to us. I have therefore drawn up a supplemental treatise on rhetoric, which contains many things that are not found in those ancient writers, and in which, in fact, is embodied in a small compass, the whole substance of rhetoric. This I have done chiefly in order to impress the principles of rhetoric on the minds of the Students, for they commit the entire to memory, and account for it at the close of the year. The figures of rhetoric I also teach; and those also the Student commits to memory, with a classical quotation to illustrate each, in which they answer publicly at the end of the year. Of course I myself in private consult other works upon the subject, ancient and modern, such as Cicero de Oratore, Lejay, Gibert, Rollin, Maury, and Kames, Pope's Essay on Criticism, &c. &c. I also call to their recollection the principles of prosody, though the year preceding my course is, properly speaking, the year of poetry, the year of poetry usually preceding that of rhetoric in a course of collegiate education. These matters, with compositions in Greek, Latin and English, constitute the substance of the rhetoric course in the College of Maynooth.

Is your supplemental treatise of rhetoric amongst the works that have been forwarded to us?—No; it is in manuscript.

Will you state what is the substance of it?—It comprizes the origin, definition, and division of rhetoric, the different sorts of styles, the rules for each sort, the nature and rules of figurative language, of metaphors, &c. the different parts of an oration or sermon, the rules that regulate each part, an analysis of Addison, Blair and Burke, on what are called the Pleasures of the Imagination, or the Sublime and Beautiful, an analysis of Quintilian, of Austin and of Spalding, on the principles of delivery; also, in going through Quintilian, when I come to the chapter on delivery, I explain those different systems of which the supplemental treatise contains an abstract, and illustrate them myself; in the course of the year year I endeavour to concentrate all these matters. This is the substance of my supplemental Treatise on Rhetoric, and the outline of the collegiate course in my department.

What number have you at present in your class?—The number I have at present is, I should suppose, about fifty-four; the number is generally between fifty and sixty.

In what compositions do you exercise them?—In Latin, Greek, and English.

How frequently do they compose in Latin or English?—In the Latin it is a regularly appointed business of every day; in the Greek it is a regularly appointed business of every day; in the English, an abstract is always required. When I say always, I must observe, that possibly it may occur that I would allow them to pass by an oration without requiring an abstract, but I speak of the general rule, which is, that they do write an abstract of the oration in English, and also I very frequently make the Students bring in with them a translation of the lesson of the day in English, of a certain portion of it sometimes, and sometimes of the entire, and when they come to the different parts of an oration, my general plan is to give them then a sermon; for instance, when I come to the exordium, I then give them a subject for a sermon; I expound the matter of the sermon to them, and give them a text, and tell them, you have read the rules for an exordium, they are so and so; now the exordium you are to write will turn upon such and such matters, you will consider it in your minds, and bring me in an exordium written in English, and so in the other parts.

Are there any prizes given in your class?—Yes.

How frequently in the year?—Once; at the close of the academical year.

What number?—Four.

Upon the whole, are you satisfied with the acquisitions that the young men make?—Indeed, I find that the Students, generally speaking, give satisfaction.

You are of opinion that they attain a competent knowledge of all the different matters, extensive as they are, which you teach?—I examine them publicly in those matters, and I believe they are generally considered to give satisfaction; the system is one that I myself have arranged, and gradually adopted, as suited to the business of a rhetoric class in general, and to ecclesiastical Students in particular.

From your class they pass to logic?—Yes.

Who was the head of the College of Carlow when you were there?—Dr. Staunton was head of the College when I entered a Student; Dr. Fitzgerald when I returned, as Professor.

At the time when you attended the course of Theology at Maynooth, was Doctor Delahogue the Professor of Theology?—He was.

Are you acquainted with his tract, De Ecclesia?—I am; I bestowed a good deal of time and attention on it when reading it under him.

Did he inculcate the principles that are found in that work?—Unquestionably.

Were those principles generally received as sound and correct by the body of the College at the time you speak of?—Unquestionably.

Did you ever hear principles of a contrary nature maintained in the College?—Never, otherwise than in disputation.

You have heard such principles maintained in the way of disputation, for the purpose of argument?—Yes, not otherwise.

Not as the principles of the persons disputing?—Not as the theological doctrines of the house.

Or of the persons who maintained them in disputation?—No; I must observe, that when I give this answer, it must be understood to refer of course to the doctrine of his tract; there may be a casual opinion upon which persons will differ as a matter of opinion, but I speak now of the doctrine of his tract.

Doctor Delahogue in that book maintains, that the Pope has no right, directly or indirectly, to interfere in matters of a civil or temporal nature; was that principle held in the College?—Most unquestionably, and no other.

And that the Pope had no right to absolve His Majesty's subjects from their allegiance?—Beyond all doubt; no person ever thought of any other opinion in the College; that is a matter that we attest under the sacred and inviolable obligation of an oath, and a doctrine, of course, from which no dissent could be tolerated for a moment.

Have you ever heard it maintained as the opinion of any person in the College, that the Pope could absolve a Roman Catholic from the oath of allegiance?—Never; and I know he cannot.

Have you any reason to believe that any such opinion was entertained in the College?—I have reason to know the contrary.

Do you think it possible, that the Students in the College in communicating with one another, could maintain such an opinion?—Impossible.

What was the general feeling of the College as to the allegiance due by His Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects to his Crown?—That that allegiance is a strict religious obligation, sacred and undivided.

Do you take upon yourself to state, that to the best of your belief, that was the general feeling of the house, Students and all?—Unquestionably.

You were in your Ecclesiastical course in the year 1811?—I commenced it then.

Do you recollect a person of the name of Dixon in the College at that time?—I do.

Were you acquainted with him?—I was.

Were you in habits of intercourse with him?—Not very freely; he was in the same class with me, but I did not adopt him, nor did he adopt me, as a companion.

Did you ever hear him express any feeling with respect to the allegiance due by Roman

Appendix, N^o 19.Examination of
Rev.Jeremiah Donovan,
26 October 1826.

Catholics to the King, either way?—That, I should suppose, was a subject towards which his mind did not then particularly turn.

Why do you suppose that?—Students at that period of their studies do not dwell upon matters of that kind particularly; but I never heard him speak upon that subject at the time.

Do you mean, that the Students receive it as a clear settled principle, that the Roman Catholics do owe allegiance to the King?—Most certainly; I mean, that it is a settled opinion that we owe allegiance, and it must have been then so considered, and unless he was an exception to the body of Students, he must have entertained that conscientious conviction; and if he had entertained any other conviction, than that he owed allegiance to the King, and had expressed it, and it became known to the competent collegiate authorities, unquestionably he would have been removed from College; however, what his opinions upon the matter were, I know not.

Was there any feeling amongst the Students at that time, that it would be lawful for Roman Catholics, by rebellion or violence, or lawless acts, to wrest the property of the Established Church from her, for the purpose of transferring it to the Roman Catholic Church in this country?—I never heard such an opinion uttered by any individual in that establishment.

Have you any reason to believe that such an opinion was entertained?—I have no reason whatever to believe that such an opinion was entertained.

Have you ever, when you were a Student, heard it discussed by the Students in the College, whether a separation between the British Islands would conduce to the good or to the evil of Ireland?—I cannot call to my recollection any instance in which I heard that question discussed.

From the general habits of conversation of the Students, do you conceive that it was likely or unlikely that such a topic should occasionally be discussed amongst them?—Individuals may perhaps have discussed such a topic, but I am convinced it was at no time a general topic of discussion in the house, and I never heard it discussed, but if discussed, it certainly was not as a matter intended to be rendered practical in any shape. Of course, with regard to political views of the relative happiness of a country, under these or those circumstances, this or that government, these are abstract matters on which persons may entertain different opinions; whether, for instance, it had been a blessing for Ireland at any time to have been connected with England, or whether it is a blessing now, or whether it may be hereafter, is a matter upon which much speculation could be indulged by politicians, but I am not aware that with any view whatsoever to any practical result such an opinion was ever discussed by any one within my hearing, either in the College or out of the College.

The question is not as to the agitation of such questions out of doors, but it is strictly confined to what you can recollect to have passed upon the subject among the Students while you were a Student yourself, either in the College or in their walks, or upon any other occasion?—After a pause for recollection, I cannot bring to my mind any one instance, in which I did hear the Students discuss that subject, either in the College or on their walks, or upon any other occasion whatsoever.

Is it your impression that no such instances have existed?—Possibly, there may have been such discussions amongst them; but I am convinced such discussions were by no means general, for they never reached me, though living in College so many years.

Have you ever heard the right of the Established Church to her temporal possessions discussed among the Students?—I never heard the Students talk upon that subject in my whole life, to my knowledge, as far as I can now recollect.

It is a subject that never enters into their consideration?—I am not aware that I recollect ever to have heard the Students discuss that matter.

Have you ever heard it discussed among the Students, whether it was probable that the Established Church would last long in this country?—I do not recollect ever to have heard a discussion amongst the Students upon that subject; at the same time that it is very possible, that they as well as others may talk upon such matters, and, like ourselves, entertain different opinions upon the matter.

You mean distinctly to negative by your evidence, that at any time while you were a Student yourself within the College, there was any thing like a lively interest taken on the part of the Students in any one of the three subjects last alluded to?—I distinctly state, that I do not recollect ever to have talked upon those subjects with any of the Students; and I distinctly state, that I never understood, when I was a Student, such topics to occupy the attention of the Students at all; at the same time that I have stated that, I by no means undertake to say, that they may not possibly have talked upon such matters.

You took the oath of allegiance, did you not, as a Student, upon your entering the College?—I did, of which I have the certificate in my possession.

Was your attention particularly directed to the nature of that oath, and to the extent of it?—I was aware, of course, of the nature of the solemn declaration that I made of allegiance.

Was your attention directed in any way to the possibility of circumstances occurring, which would invalidate that obligation, or not, or the impossibility of such circumstances?—I do not think that my attention was particularly directed to such a crisis; as to opinions upon government, of course, we know perfectly well, from the nature of the British constitution, that passive obedience is not one of its doctrines. The fact of the government recognizing a revolution as glorious, and every revolution is, of course, a successful resistance to previously established authority—The general doctrine of British jurists, of Locke, Blackstone, Paley and others; the trial and conviction of Dr. Sacheverel by the Parliament of Queen Anne,

Anne, for having preached the doctrine of passive obedience and indefeasible right; the condemnation by Parliament of the famous decree passed in the convocation of the University of Oxford, which asserted the same doctrine, and which was committed to the same fire by the hands of the common hangman—The very nature of the oath of allegiance, which in its present form was introduced by the convention parliament, whose authority was the result of a successful opposition to an acknowledged sovereign, and by which we swear allegiance to the present Royal Family, being Protestant, which seems to affix a certain condition to our allegiance—These and a variety of other considerations prove, that passive obedience is no doctrine of the British constitution; neither is it a doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church. The nature of our allegiance is, of course, qualified by the nature of the government under which we live, and our loyalty is unimpeachable whilst we hold the doctrine of the constitution. Whilst, however, all good men must shudder at the contemplation of the extreme case, and the extreme remedy, I think with Dr. Milner, in his end of controversy, that “Mankind have been always sensible that the duty of civil allegiance and submission cannot extend beyond a certain point, and that they ought not to surrender their lives and properties, and morality, to be sported with by a Nero or a Heliogabalus;” allow me however to add, that Catholics, and of course the students of Maynooth, take the oath of allegiance in its strict constitutional meaning, and in the extension of that meaning go as far at least as loyal Protestants.

You state, that at that period it was not usual for the Students to pay particular attention to subjects of that nature?—Not particularly.

You mentioned in a former answer, that the subject of the oath of allegiance was not a particular subject of consideration with the Students at the period at which they usually were called to take it; what is the import of that observation; do you mean, that they did not fully comprehend the nature of it, or what other meaning do you attach to the observation?—I mean, that comprehending the meaning, they acquiesced in it without making it matter of question; I mean simply, that the Students hearing the oath of allegiance read to them, and, as I believe, generally happens, previously admonished with regard to it, took the oath freely without questioning at all the obligation which it imposes, and hence of course, it did not exactly become a matter of general discussion amongst them. There are individuals more scrupulous than others with regard to taking an oath, and who therefore, in order that their consciences may be better satisfied, make particular inquiries as to the meaning of certain clauses in the oath of allegiance (and some of these clauses by the bye are, very unnecessarily offensive to Catholics), but I never yet met an instance of a Student who felt any conscientious reluctance at taking the oath of allegiance, when explained and properly understood.

Have you ever met with any Student who thought that it would be lawful for him to break that oath because it was taken to a Protestant sovereign?—I have paused for a moment, from a feeling of indignation at the general charge that is brought against us and against our religion, of indifference to oaths. It is intolerable that Catholics should be charged with such detestable doctrine, and when a Catholic priest who is conscious to himself of having always been taught, and of always teaching the contrary, is asked as to the nature of the oath of allegiance, and the obligation of oaths in general, and when manifestly nothing whatever stands between Catholics and situations of honour and emolument but the obligation of an oath, it is certainly very mortifying that they should be supposed for a moment to entertain a doubt of the inviolability of that sacred obligation. I need scarcely add, that no Student ever fell within my observation who would not fully participate in these sentiments, and who would not, of course, deem it unlawful to break an oath made to his sovereign or to any other individual, be he Protestant or Catholic.

How many Students of Maynooth have you ever heard of that have conformed to the established church?—The number I cannot exactly say; but I never yet heard of any Student whatsoever of the College of Maynooth conforming, that was not under the influence of causes, that do no credit whatsoever to the establishment to which he transferred himself.

Are the Commissioners to understand, that of the number of Students of Maynooth, who have embraced the established religion, you mean to say that there are no respectable characters among them?—I never knew a single individual Student, educated at Maynooth, to have embraced the Protestant religion, that I do not consider to have been under the influence of causes discreditable to his morality or to his general character.

Do you mean independently of the mere fact of their changing?—I mean independently of the mere fact of changing; I assure the Commissioners, that if a man were so to change, under the influence of deep conviction, which I consider to be a merely possible case, I should not consider that discreditable to his morality.

Have you ever heard of such a possible case being realized in practice?—Never.

Do you think that the individuals who have changed have been operated upon by pecuniary considerations?—Such considerations may have their influence; but I think they have been principally operated upon by the force of other passions not less dangerous in their nature, and which if not kept under due restraint lead to an habitual neglect of duty.

Do you believe that Mr. Dixon gave up an income of 300*l.* a year, and exposed himself to the loss of the esteem of all his friends and relations upon the occasion of his conversion?—I do not know what Mr. Dixon might have yearly, but this I know, that from the testimony I have seen of Mr. Dixon before the Parliamentary Committee, I would question very much any thing that Mr. Dixon would say on such subjects; a man who could declare on oath, that the priests and bishops of Ireland are favourable to the Ribbon system, and this, in consequence of the commands of the Pope; that the priests of Ireland are opposed to education, and that he was the only priest in his native diocese favourable to education; that Catholics hold that the end justifies the means, and that he was taught this doctrine in the College of Maynooth; that Catholics hold, that when taking an oath, there is, as he calls it, a salvo which exempts from its obligation and justifies its infraction; that the generality of Catholics in Ireland, priests and people, hold that without repentance, sin can be pardoned by the mere absolution of the priest; that the bishops, clergy and people of Ireland believe, that were the Pope to issue a mandate to take up arms against their lawful sovereign, they would be bound to obey it. The man, himself at one time a Catholic and a priest, who could deliberately, and upon oath, swear to such notorious yet mischievous calumnies, dis-entitles himself, I must say, to my belief, even on his oath.

Do you believe it likely, that Mr. Dixon, a young priest in the county of Mayo, could get a country parish of 300 l. a year?—I think it not at all likely; I do not however know exactly the nature of his incumbency, or the extent of its emoluments.

Rev.
Charles M'Nally,

WHAT Professorship do you hold in the College of Maynooth?—Professor of Logic, and Metaphysics, and Ethics, jointly.

Were you educated in the College?—I was.

In what year did you enter it?—In August 1808.

From what diocese were you recommended?—From the diocese of Clogher.

Where did you receive your preliminary education?—During part of the time I attended day-schools in the neighbourhood where my father lived. I read classics for some time under a master who lived with three or four families; afterwards I attended a Mr. Collins's school at Monaghan, and then I went to the county of Longford, to Granard, and spent some time there under Mr. O'Riely, and afterwards under the Rev. Mr. Hughes, and afterwards I was in the county Tyrone, at Mr. Murphy's school, near Dungannon, for a very short time; and after that I was sent to College.

Were you admitted into the Humanity class?—No, I stood for the class of Philosophy, and was admitted to that.

How many years did you pass in your studies at Maynooth?—Two years in Philosophy, and three, the ordinary course, in Theology. I finished my course in 1813, and I was some time upon the Dunboyne establishment, after finishing the ordinary course of studies.

Was the course of instruction, when you entered the College, much the same as it is now?—It was substantially the same.

Do you perceive any difference at all, either in the character of it, or in the method in which it is given?—The general character and method of instruction may be said to be the same as when I entered, but some changes have since taken place. When I entered, the Students were under the necessity of writing the whole course of Philosophy from the dictate of the Professors; they have at present printed treatises. The course of Natural Philosophy has been changed; the one then used was compiled by the Professor, Mr. Darrè, who has since gone to France; but latterly they have adopted the Cambridge course of Philosophy, which is different from what I read; also, in Moral Theology, the class-books have been altered since I read; Bailly's works have been substituted for Antoine's, which was the class-book for Moral Theology in my time.

How long has Bailly been adopted as a class-book?—I cannot exactly say; I believe it was the year after I finished my course.

With reference to the time when you yourself were a Student at Maynooth, were you, upon your admission into the College, in possession of any books of your own?—Yes.

Will you state what they were?—I brought with me from home some classics, and some books of religious instruction, but at this distance of time I do not remember the names of all. I recollect Cicero's Offices, a copy of the Douay Testament; Dr. Hay's Sincere Christian, and St. Augustin's Confessions.

Had you a New Testament at the time you were admitted?—I brought the New Testament with me.

Can you say, whether the Students possessing themselves of Testaments or Bibles was a thing encouraged or discouraged?—I never knew the slightest discouragement given to it; on the contrary, I am sure it was always deemed proper for a Student to have in his own possession a copy of the Scriptures; for the advanced Students, the study of the Scripture was then, as at present, matter of obligation. Besides, when I was a Student, the Dean read every day a portion of the New Testament for the Students of all the classes, assembled together in the common hall; after which a short meditation was made before going to dinner, and at dinner every day a Student read for the others an entire chapter of the Old Testament; but to purchase copies of the Scriptures at their entrance into College, was not then obligatory on the Students, as it is now.

At present the rule is different from what it was at that time?—Since that time a number of class-books have been completed for the use of the College; there has been also a new edition printed of the Douay version of the Scriptures, and a Commentary on the Scriptures; and every Student, on his entrance, is, by the regulation of the Trustees, to provide himself with those works.

Are

Are the Dunboyne Students in the habit of providing themselves with many books for their own private study?—That depends entirely upon the taste of the individual, and his means; generally the Students are anxious, as far as they can, to provide themselves with books of useful information.

Do you happen to know what books they are in the habit of procuring for their own private reading; is it left to their own taste, or is there any regulation connected with it?—I may have heard of works purchased by individuals, but I do not know what works they are in the habit generally of procuring for private reading, nor am I aware of any regulation connected with it. When I was appointed to the Dunboyne establishment, there was no particular person, no Prefect of Studies, then placed over it as there is now. In our Theological studies we were still left under the guidance of Dr. Delahogue, and he told us, that the first thing we should commence would be to revise the course of Theology we had already made in the house. For our own private studies we had the use of the library, but were left in a great degree to our own taste and discretion in the selection of books. On the treatise of the Trinity, with which we commenced, he recommended Bull's Defensio Fidei Nicænæ, and, I believe, Petavius, but particularly his own tracts, for which he always entertained a just partiality.

Are not the young men permitted to purchase books for themselves?—Certainly.

Under what restraint do they make those purchases?—Of course, in purchasing books in Dublin every man is left to his own discretion; but if he introduces books that contain principles dangerous to society or to religion, he will incur a penalty; by the statute, he will be liable to expulsion. The Students are aware of this, because the statutes are published. With regard to books purchased at the gate, which frequently happens, a catalogue is generally supplied to one of the persons charged with the discipline of the house, and he revises the catalogue, and if he perceived a book of the tendency I mention, he would notice it, and would not permit it to be sold.

Is there any other mode of enforcing this rule, than what arises from the inspection which the Dean necessarily has of the rooms of the young men, and the manner in which he becomes acquainted with the books they are in possession of?—There must be the general feeling that every person has in his own mind of what is proper. Our divines do hold, that there is a power in our church to regulate the use of the books that are to be read, that is, to prohibit certain books, and many are actually prohibited. On the Continent, they prohibit, under censure, certain books, and the principle of the law is held to be binding generally. In looking to our authors upon that subject, I find that to be the general opinion of our divines. With regard to the practice, I believe, the bishops in this country consider the prohibition limited to books that would be held to be injurious to society and religion, or dangerous to the individual, and it is not enforced exactly to the letter. In fact, persons of a certain standing, and properly instructed, are permitted to read any books, except they are in their own nature immoral, or of a pernicious tendency, and then, of course, they could not be read at all.

A list is supplied of the books brought to College for sale?—Any person that comes to offer books sends in a list; and it often happens that clergymen, especially in distant parts of the country, send their books to the College to be sold, and they are brought into the public hall, and a sort of auction gone through; by these means the Students become provided with a great many professional works.

Of what number does your class at present consist?—I believe about sixty; the number is variable; it was last year about ninety.

Will you describe the course of instruction you give?—The substance of it is contained in the class books that have been printed, and which are already in the hands of the Commissioners. As to the manner of proceeding in the class, it has been usual with me to explain vivâ voce the substance of what is afterwards to be discussed, to state the question, to mention distinctly the propositions to be maintained, and to distinguish between what is certain and what is probable or doubtful, to bring forward the arguments by which the propositions are proved; to point out the difficulties that may be urged against them, and to place them in juxta-position with the arguments; then, after going through an exposition, I interrogate the Students upon the substance of what is contained in the class book, and on what I have explained vivâ voce; if the question is imperfectly treated in the class book, I endeavour to supply the deficiency in the explanation; for instance, I give a more full explanation of the nature of syllogistic reasoning than is to be found in the class book; it may be proper to remark, that the manner of proceeding in my class is what may be termed the scholastic method. When the Students are somewhat advanced in the course, there is on one day in the week an exercise in scholastic disputation, that is, one student is called upon to maintain a conclusion; suppose, for instance, that the subject be the liberty of man, that man is a free agent; he is to state the question in the manner I have already described, and to maintain that conclusion against such objections as other persons who are appointed to object may think proper to bring forward, and the Professor of course is to moderate that exercise, and if any difficulty occurs that might be above the capacity of the person, to explain it himself.

Are you in the habit of addressing your class in Latin?—Usually.

Do they reply to you in Latin?—Generally; my class is considered particularly a preparation for Theology, as it is now taught, and it is in my class particularly that they acquire the habit of speaking school Latin.

What hours in the week do you lecture?—During the academical year, I attend my class on Mondays, Tuesdays, Thursdays and Fridays, from half-past ten to half-past eleven, and

Appendix, N^o 20.

Examination of
Rev.
Charles M^r Nally,

from two to three, and on Saturdays, from half-past ten to eleven, two hours on each of the four preceding days mentioned, and upon Saturday, one hour.

Are the students enabled to acquire a proficiency in the different matters that you have to teach them during the short period of a year?—I think that, generally speaking, they become pretty well acquainted with the principles and precepts of reasoning and Logic, and they also acquire a pretty good knowledge of Metaphysics, particularly of that part which treats of the proofs by which the existence of God is established, and of the Divine attributes. We dwell upon this part particularly, for in the course of Theology the treatise De Deo et Attributis Divinis does not make a part; in Psychology also we give more time to the discussion of important questions, such as the spirituality and immortality of the soul, and the liberty of man; with regard to the Ethics, it sometimes happens from interruptions, that we are not able to get through the entire course.

Do you think that, upon the whole, the system of instruction in the College, and the management of the College generally, have been improved lately; is it in a better state altogether now, than it was when you were first acquainted with it in 1808?—I think the facilities of studying have been considerably increased since I myself was a Student; the practice of transcribing every thing we were to study was a very serious obstacle to the improvement of the young men, and very injurious to their health, and in that respect I think the printing the different treatises is of great use, but as to the general management of the College, it is difficult to draw comparisons between the past and present, and I therefore offer no opinion on the matter.

Has the great increase of the number, made the discipline of the College more difficult to enforce?—I am decidedly of opinion that it has; I am decidedly of opinion that the establishment is too large; I do not mean in reference to the objects of the institution, because I know it is insufficient for the general purposes of the mission, but I mean as an establishment to be managed, and of course the difficulty of maintaining subordination must increase with the number, and the consequences, if perchance, disorder and insubordination should get in, would be disastrous in proportion.

At any period during the time you were a Student in the College, did political subjects engage much of the attention of the Students?—I had a great deal of intercourse with the Students from different parts of the country, and I can state with truth, to the best of my recollection, that I never knew political subjects to be a matter of discussion at all; there was, I think, among the persons with whom I conversed, a general anxiety on the subject of Catholic Emancipation, and a desire to know whatever was connected with the Parliamentary discussions on that question; that subject of course was occasionally spoken of among the Students; some also expressed their opinions upon the consequences likely to result from the interference of Government in the appointment of our bishops; there were a few who were fond of knowing and speaking of passing events, as reported in the newspapers; I doubt whether these matters come within the scope of the question.

Were they much matter of conversation privately among the Students?—My answer was particularly with regard to the private conversations of the Students; with regard to the public doctrines, they are the same as are contained in the class books.

Did you ever know the subject of the connexion of Ireland with England, and the subordinate state of Ireland with respect to that country, a matter of discussion?—I never knew it to be a matter of discussion, unless some person remarked on the wild expressions of some of the persons engaged in that unfortunate business in 1798. I may have heard persons remark casually upon the extravagant opinion, that if Ireland was free for a moment, it would be free for ever; but I never heard any person look seriously at the possibility of separating this country from England; on the contrary, my conviction is, that the feelings and the opinions of those educated in the College are most favourable to the connexion with England, and that any attempt to separate the country would be mischievous; but that question has not been mooted, so far as I could perceive.

Do you think it is possible that there could have existed amongst the Students at the time you were there, a general and prevailing opinion, that the object of all Roman Catholic priests was to forward the re-establishment of their Church upon the footing on which it once stood in Ireland, and to effect, if possible, a political separation from England?—That a Catholic priest would be anxious, by discussion, and fair means, to bring every person to a conviction that the Catholic is the true religion, I think is the fact, but that he would be disposed by violence, or by any unfair means, to overthrow the Establishment, for the purpose of putting his own Establishment in its place, is a question that I think never was entertained.

Will you mention the names of the several Vice-Presidents who have been at Maynooth within your recollection?—The person who was Vice-President when I entered was Dr. Power, who is since deceased; the Vice-President after him, was Dr. Magennis, who is also dead; the Reverend Mr. Kenney was Vice-President for a short time; the Reverend Mr. Fitzpatrick, who is since dead, was a Vice-President, and I believe the present Mr. Montague succeeded him.

How long was Mr. Kenney Vice-President?—He was Vice-President, I believe, for part of two academical years, that is, he continued as such on the Trustees books for that time, but he did the duty of Vice-President, I believe, for one academical year only.

Do you know where Mr. Kenney is at present?—He is at the Establishment of Clongowes.

Was it supposed among the Students at Maynooth, at the time he was Vice-President, that that he belonged to any particular religious society?—It was supposed that he was of the order of Jesuits.

Was there any other person to whom that supposition applied at Maynooth, within your recollection?—None holding any situation in the College.

Was that supposition applied to any of the Students?—No; some few persons, (I believe but three,) who have been at our College, have gone to that order.

Have any persons come from the order to the College?—None whatever; we have received a few young men as Students, that were educated as boys at Clongowes, but no person who was a religious.

From your recollection, can you inform the Commissioners, whether the circumstance of Mr. Kenney being of that society, operated in the way of recommendation to the good opinion of the Students, or to the contrary?—I think the opinion was favourable to Mr. Kenney on account of his learning, and zeal, and piety, and his anxiety to give the Students spiritual instruction.

The question is, whether you conceive that the circumstance of his belonging to the order of Jesuits, was in itself a title to respect, or the contrary, according to the estimation and opinions and feelings of the Students?—I could not take upon myself to say what might be their feeling and opinions upon the subject; of course, there is an impression that the Jesuits are a learned body of men, and I cannot say that they might not have heard of that, and been influenced by it, but I think whatever estimation Mr. Kenney was held in, was owing to his talents, and piety and zeal, which he exerted to a very great degree in the College.

Will you describe any particular species of spiritual instruction which he used to give?—He conducted the Retreats. We begin every academical year by a spiritual Retreat, and as he was the superior, he gave the instructions at that time, and also at Pentecost, when there is a second Retreat previous to the ordination. On these and other occasions, he instructed the Students in the moral truths of religion, in the practices of Christian piety, and in the virtues and dispositions necessary for the ecclesiastical state. He also composed meditations on these subjects, which were read for the Students at their morning and evening devotions.

And that extended to all the Students in the College?—To the whole community.

They were under his spiritual instruction at that period?—Yes; and the instructions given by him were such as I have already described.

Do you know why he left the College of Maynooth; was it a matter of notoriety?—I think I heard myself that his being there, and being supposed to be a Jesuit, gave some offence to the government of the country; however, I am not sure of that, but I rather suppose that the real cause was, that he had his own establishment to superintend; he intended, of course, to procure a suitable place, and to open it as soon as he could conveniently; he came with his Grace, Dr. Murray, who was then President of the College; it was Dr. Murray's wish to have him, on account of the high opinion he entertained of his talents and piety.

Is Mr. Kenney an Irishman?—He is.

Do you know where he had passed the few years immediately preceding his becoming Vice-President of Maynooth?—I believe he had returned from the Continent some short time before; I believe he had been in Italy, perhaps at Rome. He made his theological studies at Palermo, in Sicily, as I understand.

Will you state when the establishment at Clongowes was opened, whether it had any existence, or was in preparation during the time that Mr. Kenney was at Maynooth?—It had no existence then; I do not think I heard of the intended establishment when he was at Maynooth. He was in College when I was finishing my studies the last year, and he was, I understood afterwards, in treaty for different places before he made the purchase of Clongowes.

Is the doctrine, that the Pope has no civil or temporal power within this country, a doctrine favoured or otherwise, at Maynooth?—With us there is not a diversity of opinion upon the matter. We hold it to be quite certain that he has no such power. But as the opposite opinion was formerly maintained by some divines, and as some of the Popes (of whom we always speak with reverence and veneration) assumed that power, we do not characterize it by any harsh epithet, we do not say it is heretical or impious; but the opinion which rejects the temporal power of the Pope we hold to be quite certain.

Do all the Professors maintain that opinion?—Undoubtedly they maintain it; perhaps there is no one conclusion that Dr. Delahogue was more solicitous to inculcate upon the Students than that particular conclusion. I know, when I finished my course in 1813, it was the conclusion that I had to sustain at the public disputation. I had to sustain the conclusion, that he had no power, either direct or indirect; by saying that he had no direct power, I mean that he could not depose a Sovereign at his own will and pleasure; and by saying that he had no indirect power, I mean, that if he even excommunicated the King, I was still bound to adhere to him. The King in that case would be deprived of the spiritual advantages enjoyed by the faithful members of the church, but the divine natural law renders our sworn allegiance inviolable.

Are there any books that you particularly recommend for the private study of the gentlemen who attend your class?—The students generally provide themselves with a great variety of books; I have reason to know, that on Logic, many of them have the treatise used in the Dublin University; they have what is called the Art of Thinking, compiled at Port Royal, and translated into Latin; they have Burgersdicius; that, I believe, is the Cambridge logic; they they have Watts's Logic, and a variety of other books; these treatises, generally, I have neither approved nor prohibited. I have generally cautioned the Students against vague and desultory reading, at the commencement of their philosophical studies. I have recommended, in the first place, to make themselves well acquainted with that portion of the class-book marked out for the daily lecture, and with the explanation given, but (except the class-books) I have not recommended to the Students any works treating of the whole course which I teach. In explaining parts of the course, I have had occasion to direct their attention to a variety of books. The authors, or works to which I have occasionally referred, or from which I have read extracts, are principally the following: St. Thomas Aquinas, of whose Secunda Secundæ I have often spoken in terms of the highest commendation, as being, in my opinion, one of the best treatises of Ethics; Hook de Religione; Bossuet's Discourse on Universal History; the Art of Thinking, (L'Art de Penser), a methodical and accurate Treatise of Logic; the Philosophical Works of Cicero; Clarke on the Being and Attributes of God; Cartesius de Methodo; Valsecchi on the Foundations of Impiety; Malebranche's Search after Truth, (De la Recherche de la Verité); Locke's Essay on the Understanding; Beattie's Essay on Truth; Reid's Inquiry into the Human Mind; Stewart's Philosophy of the Mind, and his Moral Philosophy; Blackstone's Commentaries; Paley's Natural Theology and Moral Philosophy. I notice some of these writers, when confuting opinions maintained in their works; even when I praise any particular work, or part of a work, I do not hold myself responsible for all the opinions that writers may happen to maintain.

Are there no particular books that you recommend to their perusal?—No, except the works already mentioned, and in the manner stated.

Do you conceive it an advantage that the business of the class should be conducted in the Latin language, or that it is attended with any inconvenience?—I am not free in that; it is a regulation of the College which has been established before my time, and it is my duty to conform to it; for my own part, I think for those subjects, generally, that they can be advantageously treated in Latin, and that the Students, on account of being obliged to express themselves in a foreign language, are under the necessity of paying more attention to the subject than if they were to speak in English; because, in that case, they might acquire, by a mere superficial reading, an imperfect knowledge of the subject, and talk about it when they did not well understand it, and without having it sufficiently impressed on the memory. Besides, the most useful works on the subjects of which we treat are in Latin, and the practice of discussing them in that language is sanctioned by the usage of most Colleges and Universities.

Then you consider it an advantage?—I do; but I admit that it has some disadvantages; to obviate them, I permit the Students to speak occasionally in English, and sometimes I explain in English myself; any Student of course has permission to ask me any question that he thinks proper upon the business in English, and to receive an explanation from me.

Has there been at any time any interference or any correspondence from the Pope with the Superiors of the College of Maynooth?—Sometime after the foundation of the College, in 1796, in the pontificate of Pius the VIth, there was a communication from the Cardinal Prefect of the Propaganda; a letter directed to the Trustees, containing among other things instructions for the Professors, by which they were to be guided in their classes. In that letter, the Trustees are directed to have impressed upon the minds of the Students the duty of allegiance and attachment to the government by all the general principles by which such duties are enforced; by the authority of Scripture and reason; and in addition to that, by motives of gratitude, as we derived our support from the bounty of government. That letter is still in existence; I am sure there are many copies of it in the College.

[The Witness was requested to furnish the Commissioners with a copy of the letter.]

Is that the only communication that has been received, either direct from the Pope, or from any of the Secretaries, by the College?—That is the only communication of that kind which has come to my knowledge. They have sent class-books; among others the Treatise on Moral Theology, by Antoine, which was supposed to be an excellent treatise on Theology. I also understood there was a communication about the power of conferring degrees made to the Trustees, but which was not communicated to us. We understood there was a disposition on the part of Rome to give the power of conferring degrees in Theology, but subject, of course, to the Placitum Regis, i. e. to be carried into effect with the concurrence of the civil authorities.

Is there any subject on which you are desirous of making a statement to the Commissioners?—I wish particularly to remark upon a statement that was made to the Committee of the House of Lords by the Reverend Mr. Dixon, who had formerly been a Student at Maynooth; he stated in his evidence, in connection with the course of Ethics, that he had imbibed the doctrine at Maynooth, that the end justified the means, and that if the intention was good, any act, no matter however immoral, might be committed. Now the very reverse is the doctrine we teach. We have established it as a conclusion, that the morality of an action is derived from the end, the object, and the circumstances, as we express it. Hence an action, in order to be morally good, must not only be good in its end, or in the intention of the person who performs it, but it must be in itself a good action, and it must be good in every circumstance connected with it, according to the general axiom, that we adopt "bonum ex integra causâ, malum ex quocunque defectu;" that is, that an action is rendered defective by even a minute circumstance; not only must the action be good, good, but it must be good in all the variety of circumstances which may affect the morality of the action, and a defect in any one of them will render it morally imputable; and we hold that as the dictate of right reason, of natural law, and of divine authority. We adopt the very language of the Scripture itself, that “non sunt facienda mala ut veniant bona.” To such false imputations we may apply the passage of St. Paul, when he speaks of himself and the first Christians, in the third chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, and tells of some persons that slandered the Christians, alleging, that they said “Let us do evil that good may come,” and he says, “whose damnation is just.”

Is the doctrine you teach upon those points the same as that which was taught when you were a Student in the College?—Certainly; the treatise I teach, in which that doctrine is contained, was compiled by Mr. Anglade, who was the Professor of Ethics. The same doctrine is contained in the class books of moral theology, both in Antoine and Bailly. I have read many works on Ethics and Moral Theology, and I never met any Catholic writer who held that the end justified the means.

Did you ever hear any person advance the doctrine that the end could justify the means?—Certainly not; such monstrous doctrine would excite horror and indignation, and the person who would advance it would certainly be a corrupter of morals, and as such, expelled the College and disqualified for the Priesthood; for my own part, I had been taught the contrary as soon as I could read and understand; for this reason, that I had learned in my Catechism this question, “Is it lawful to tell a lie for a good end?”—“No” is the answer, for no reason or motive could excuse it.

You brought that principle with you to the College?—Yes, under the conviction that even to promote religion or the good of the church, I could not tell the most trivial lie, or do an act in its own nature immoral, contrary to the law of God, and the law of right reason.

You did not learn any thing in Maynooth to weaken that impression?—Nothing; what I learned there confirmed the conviction that I had before.

Appendix, N° 21.

Examination of
Rev.
N. Callan, D. D.
27 October 1826.

HOW long have you held the chair of Natural Philosophy in the College of Maynooth?—I was appointed about the 18th of last September.

Do you lecture upon Natural Philosophy only?—Mathematics and Natural Philosophy.

What is your salary?—90 l. Irish yearly, including an allowance for groceries.

Were you educated within the College?—Yes.

In what year did you become a Student?—I believe in 1817.

From what district were you recommended?—From the diocese of Armagh.

Were you on the list of Dunboyne Students at any time?—I was; I spent one year on that Establishment.

Were you elected to the Professorship from that class, or did you leave the College?—I left the College about two years ago.

By whom were you ordained?—By Doctor Murray.

Did you discharge any parochial duties during the time you were absent from the College?—I had faculties in the diocese to discharge parochial duties, with the leave of the parish priest, while I remained there; but I had no appointment to any curacy or parish.

Where did you receive your early education before you became a Student?—I was first at school in Dundalk with Mr. Nelson, and afterwards in the academy of Navan.

Were you a boarder in those establishments?—I was a day scholar in Dundalk, and a boarder in Navan.

Do you recollect how much a year you paid for your instruction in Navan?—I think it was 30 l. a year, there might be some additional charges.

Of what county are you a native?—Of the county of Louth.

In what situation in life were your parents?—My father was possessed of several farms, and a pretty extensive flour mill.

Into what class were you admitted at Maynooth?—Into the first class of Humanity.

Did you obtain any prizes or distinctions in that class?—In Humanity I believe I got one distinction, but no premium.

Did you subsequently obtain other premiums?—Afterwards in Mathematics and Natural Philosophy; I was called along with two others to the first premium, and I was called to the second premium in Dogmatic Theology and in Scripture, and the third premium in Moral Theology; on the Dunboyne Establishment I obtained the first premium in Theology, Church History and Canon Law, I believe—I am not quite certain whether it was for all or only for some of those things.

Have the goodness to describe what course you pursue in instructing your class as well in Natural Philosophy as in Mathematics?—Since the time of my appointment I have followed the treatise, I believe it is the Cambridge course of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy, except the Geometry and Trigonometries, which were written by Mr. Darré, formerly Professor in the College of Maynooth. In teaching the class, I always explain the matter of each lesson to the Students, and at the succeeding class, I call upon two or three of them to give an account of what I explained at the preceding lecture. With refer-rence to the course I shall pursue hereafter, I have not made up my mind; as there are some parts of the treatises that must be omitted, and others that must be illustrated by experiments; for example, Mechanics and Astronomy, and if we read the treatises upon Hydrostatics and Optics; for the last six or seven years, there was no part of the treatises on Hydrostatics or Optics read in the College, or at least the year that I read the course of Mathematics. Some experiments have been exhibited with some of the optical instruments; I do not know whether any part of them was read in any other year; if we have time this year I expect to give some lectures upon each of those treatises.

When the young men are admitted into your class, it is presumed that they have not been previously instructed in mathematics?—In general, they are ignorant of mathematics, except a little of arithmetic; some of them even do not know arithmetic well.

How long do the Students remain in your class?—Only for one academical year.

If many of the young men are even unacquainted with arithmetic when they come into your class, pray state the degree of proficiency which you expect them to attain during the year they are under your instruction?—I think that those who have extraordinary talents, or even very good talents, will make a very good proficiency in arithmetic. I do not say that they will be acquainted with all the questions that can be treated of in arithmetic; but with the four rules of Addition, Subtraction, Multiplication, Division, and with the Square or Cube Root, and the reasons upon which those four rules are founded; and I think they will also make a good proficiency in the four rules of Algebra, in Involution and Evolution. In Involution I include the use of the binomial theorem, but not the demonstration of it; and also in the solution of simple and quadratic Equations and of Problems; they will not be able to solve every problem that may be proposed to them, but they will be able to solve a good many of them. Those who have good talents also know pretty well the principles of proportions, variations and progressions, the nature and the use of Logarithms; there are but very few pages in our treatise in Logarithms, and therefore we do not extend that part. The whole of them read Geometry and the two Trigonometries, and even those who commence almost completely ignorant of arithmetic, provided they have good talents, will become well acquainted with Geometry, and with the two Trigonometries; and also with a good deal of Conic Sections, and a good deal of Mechanics and of Astronomy.

How many lectures are you able to give in the course of that year in which this very comprehensive course is included?—We have two classes each day for four days in the week, of one hour each, and one class on Saturday.

How many hours of lecture, in the course of a week, has any individual the benefit of?—They have the benefit of nine classes, that is, nine hours each week; but then there are some vacations; there is a fortnight or three weeks vacation at Christmas, and a fortnight at Easter, and there is a vacation of two months in the summer; neither is there class, I believe, during the greater part of the month of June, because the examinations are going on.

Altogether, how many weeks in the year are devoted to this study?—There are perhaps thirty-four or thirty-five weeks in the year during which the lectures proceed, and sixteen or seventeen in which they do not. About three of the sixteen vacant weeks are devoted to preparation for the examinations.

During the weeks in which your lectures are given ordinarily, each Student attends your lectures for nine hours in the course of a week?—Yes.

How many more hours does he, according to the regulations of the College, spend in preparing for your lectures in the course of the week?—There are two hours in the morning, from the time the studies commence in September till the first of November, there is an hour after breakfast, there are two hours between the first and the second lecture, and there are three hours in the evening. I do not know whether there is a* class during those three hours in the evening or not; it was not so when I read the course, that is, eight hours a day for study.

Independently of the lectures?—Yes, that is for four days in the week, and that is only from the time the classes commence in September till the first of November; from the first of November till about the first of April they have an hour less, because they get up an hour later in the morning.

Pray state what you conceive to be the general average, one week with another, of the number of hours during which a Student, attending your class, is occupied in preparing for your lectures?—I should think, one week with another, about forty hours a week, that is, according to the rules of the College; but I am not sure that they are all devoted to preparation for the lecture.

Must it not require talents very superior to the common average, to enable a Student, in the course of thirty-six weeks, to accomplish such a course as that which you have mentioned?—I think, that a Student of good talents, may accomplish that course with great advantage; but there are a good many parts of each treatise which are left out; but there is scarcely any part of the treatise of Geometry omitted.

How many does your class ordinarily consist of?—I believe it generally consists of between fifty and seventy; this year the number, I think, is seventy-five.

How many are you ordinarily able to examine in the course of one lecture?—On some days I call upon four to answer during the hour, and upon others, I call upon three; sometimes

[Subsequently added by Witness.]

* I have been since informed, that the Students of the class of Mathematics have no evening lecture.

585

times I do not examine them for the whole lecture; I explain a part of the lecture myself, and call upon them for the remaining part.

Do you call upon them pretty generally in turn, so as to be able, within any given time, to have examined every pupil?—Yes, I call upon them all before I interrogate any the second time; since the opening of the class in September, I have called the whole class, to the number of seventy-five, with the exception of one or two.

Does it not arise from the nature of those studies, that if a young man is once thrown out in such a course, and is no longer able to follow your explanation, either from idleness or from the want of the peculiar talent that is required for such subjects, that he is afterwards almost utterly hopeless of ever being able to recover himself?—I should think, that if he were to neglect algebra, it would be impossible for him to proceed with the remainder of the course, because we introduce algebra into geometry, and all the remaining treatises; even geometry is equally necessary in the remaining parts.

Do not you think it must necessarily happen, that during the first two or three months, many individuals are not able to keep pace with the general course of the lectures?—I think there are some that are not able to keep pace, and there are others who do not understand them perfectly, but I think at least half the class have a pretty good knowledge of what is taught even at the commencement of the lectures; from the general answering, I am inclined to think, that more than half the class have a tolerable knowledge of what is taught at the commencement.

It is to be presumed, that as the course proceeds, the number of those who are thrown out will continue to increase; pray state what proportion you suppose towards the very end of the course are able to follow you in your explanations?—Generally, I should think, that more than half the class are able to follow me in the explanations, because instead of going back they go forward, as the algebra and geometry being introduced into each of the treatises afterwards, and the Students seeing it constantly made use of, obtain a better knowledge of it than they had at the commencement, that is those who had a middling knowledge of it at the commencement obtain a better knowledge of it afterwards. I am not quite sure that the number increases towards the close of the year.

Suppose the case of a Student being thrown out in the 47th problem of the first book of Euclid, do you think that such a person has any chance of being able to recover himself afterwards?—I should think, if they were not able to follow me in the explanation of that, it would be difficult for them to understand me in the remaining part of the course, because it is one of the easiest propositions in the whole; but there are some who do not understand me in the explanations, and who, when vacant days occur (as, for instance, at the commencement of November, there are always a few vacant days), may be presumed to spend all the vacant hours they can find in looking over the business that has been gone through before.

Pray describe how far you carry the class in astronomy?—I have not as yet taught any part of astronomy, nor shall I till towards the end of the year.

No doubt you are apprized of what was done by your predecessor in that respect?—He generally, or at least the year that I read the course, explained the doctrine of the sphere, refraction as connected with astronomy, the parallax, and something about the eclipses, and the aberration of the stars. I dare say there were some others. He also explained the phases of the moon, and the Copernican system, which he adopted, and which is adopted in the treatise read in the class. I do not recollect any other parts that he explained.

About what proportion of the class would be able to answer the questions contained in the ordinary books of astronomy about eclipses?—I should think that there are very few in the class who would be able to explain the principles upon which an eclipse is calculated, because they are not fully explained to them*; the year is at a close at the time they are reading that part of astronomy, and therefore the Professor has not time to explain those principles fully; but I think, that the majority of the Students perhaps, and a good deal more than the majority, would understand the cause of an eclipse; they are able to tell why an eclipse happens at certain times; that is, they are able to tell that it happens from a shadow being projected in a certain way.

How much further than the fact of its being the shadow of the earth that causes an eclipse of the moon, does their knowledge on that subject proceed?—They are taught also the cause of an eclipse of the sun as well as of the moon.

How many Students in the whole class do you suppose could state "What is the greatest and what is the least number of lunar eclipses that can take place within a certain period?"—I could not tell how many could answer that question.

Do you think that two or three could answer it?—I cannot say, whether they could or could not, because I do not know whether it was taught in the class.

The question is mentioned merely for illustration, and as being a very obvious one?—I cannot tell what any one of the class would know, unless upon a point that is explained in the class, because it might happen, if the point was not explained, that they might know nothing about it; but if the question were explained, I should think that more than two or three would be acquainted with it; I think that the most difficult questions explained to the Students, are understood by more than two or three.

What

[Subsequently added by Witness.]

* On reflection, I find that some of the principles for calculating an eclipse, have been explained to the class.

Appendix, N^o 21.Examination of
Rev.N. Callan, D. D.
27 October 1826.

What proportion of the class do you think could demonstrate the 47th proposition of the first book of Euclid, at the end of the year?—After revising the business of the year for the examination, I am not certain that three-fourths could; but I should think two-thirds at least would be able to demonstrate it.

There is a pretty good apparatus connected with the course of Natural Philosophy, is there not?—There is.

Has it been the practice to exhibit experiments with it?—Yes, it has been the practice to exhibit experiments with this apparatus on Saturdays, from about the middle of November till about the middle of April; however, when Saturday happened to be a vacant day there were not usually experiments.

To illustrate the lectures on Mechanics?—To illustrate part of the course of Mechanics.

And Hydrostatics?—Hydrostatics were not taught when I read the course.

Pneumatics?—A good many of the principles of Chemistry were illustrated with this apparatus, but not every year; also the principles of Electricity were illustrated some years, and Galvanism some years, and some of the laws of Motion, and a few of the principles of Optics.

Pray describe the nature of any course upon Mechanics that you had an opportunity of attending at Maynooth?—I attended the ordinary course of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy which was taught in the year that I read in the class; the whole treatise was taught in that year with the exception of the Appendix of some propositions, I believe upon the mechanical powers and projectiles, and perhaps upon the collision of bodies, but the greater part of the treatise was read; there was more of that treatise read than of any other in the course, except the treatise on Geometry.

Pray describe the nature of the experiments by which it was illustrated?—I do not recollect precisely the experiments by which it was illustrated; I recollect there was one experiment made by Mr. Atwood's machine, but I do not recollect what the experiment was.

Do you think there were as many as half a dozen different experiments exhibited to illustrate that course?—I dare say there were, perhaps more; I cannot say precisely, because it is six years since I read that course.

About how many experiments do you hope to be able to have recourse to in illustrating what you have to say upon Mechanics?—I can form no idea of that as yet, as we have not commenced the course, and as I have not laid down a plan for teaching that part of the course, it is impossible to say what are the experiments by which I shall illustrate it; I hope to illustrate some of the laws of Motion.

What proportion of the class you have attended, do you suppose could have demonstrated the ordinary propositions relating to the pendulum. The question is asked merely as supplying some test of their general proficiency?—There are some of the principles relating to the pendulum which I believe were explained, and I should think there were others omitted. I am not quite sure how many were explained, or how many omitted; I cannot say how many in the class were acquainted with the principles that were explained.

Is the subject matter of the sixth book of Euclid studied in the course?—I don't know what the subject matter of the sixth book of Euclid is; the writer of our treatise makes no reference to the books of Euclid; but after the definitions, commences with parallel and perpendicular lines, and afterwards explains the theory of angles. (I have since found that a good deal of the 6th book of Simpson's Euclid is contained in our Geometry.)

Are we to understand that you have never read Euclid?—No; because I have read a treatise of Geometry in which the more useful principles of Euclid are contained, and which makes no reference to the books of Euclid.

Does the system of Geometry which you read treat much of the doctrine of proportion?—Yes, of proportional lines and similar figures.

Are there any of the Students who attend a second year in your class?—I believe there is not one in my class who read the course a year before this; I do not know precisely the regulations; I do not know whether they are obliged to read the second year, if they do not study it well in the previous year; I think I have heard something about a regulation of the Board, obliging those that do not give satisfaction to the Professor to read the course a second year.

The knowledge therefore which they obtain of Mathematics and of Natural and Experimental Philosophy is acquired by them in the course of one year?—In the course of one year; there are some lectures given in the vacation before the studies commenced, and in those lectures I believe there is a good deal of Arithmetic and Algebra explained, and those that remain in the College during that time have a very good opportunity of becoming acquainted with Algebra.

What proportion of the astronomical class do you suppose are aware of the law which determines the ratio which the space through which any of the heavenly bodies moves in a given time bears to the time?—That is not explained every year, and I cannot say how many of the Students are acquainted with it*.

Is it not a very elementary truth?—It was explained to the class in which I read. It was given to us in a dictate by the Professor. As well as I recollect, in that dictate it is stated, that the angular space or surface which the body describes varies as the time; we were not required to study it in the treatise. The dictate was not explained every year. The

[Subsequently added by Witness.]

* I have been since informed, that the dictate in which that law is contained, or a portion of it, has been taught every year but one, since I read the course.

The words of the dictate to which I alluded are, "If a body describe a curve round any centre of force, the radius vector will describe areas, which are proportional to the times of description."

What proportion of the class do you think are aware of the ratio which exists between the periodic times of the heavenly bodies, and their distances from the centre of their motions?—I cannot tell.

Is not that one of the most elementary truths in astronomy?—It is*.

What proportion of the Students in the class you attended do you think could state the velocity of light?—I cannot say.

Do you think that two or three could?—I do not know whether it was mentioned in the course or not, and therefore cannot say whether two or three could.

The question meant not how many could demonstrate it, but how many could state it?—I cannot say.

What proportion of the class do you think were aware of the principles by which the distances of the planets from the sun are ascertained?—I could not say, as I have not taught the course.

Are you acquainted with Dr. Delahogue's Tract de Ecclesia?—Yes, I know the treatise; I have not read it very lately.

Did you hear Dr. Delahogue lecture?—No; I commenced my course of theology under Dr. Mac Hale.

What doctrine did Dr. Mac Hale teach as to the question of the Pope having any right to interfere in matters of a civil or temporal nature out of his own dominions?—I believe Dr. Mac Hale always maintained that the Pope had no power, by virtue of his authority as head of the church, to interfere in civil matters out of his own dominions.

You say you believe he did?—I am quite sure of it; I have no doubt that such was his doctrine.

What is the principle generally taught in the College, as to the allegiance due to His Majesty?—In the College it is taught, that all the allegiance due to a sovereign is due by us to His Majesty; an undivided allegiance.

Has it ever been taught or maintained, as far as you know, in the College, to be lawful to violate the oath of allegiance taken by Roman Catholics to His Majesty?—I never knew it to be considered lawful to violate the oath of allegiance, in consequence, either of a dispensation from the Pope, or from a General Council, or from any power upon earth.

Appendix, N° 22.

Examination of
Rev.
James Browne,
25 October 1826.

YOU are Professor of Sacred Scripture and Hebrew in the College of Maynooth?—I am.

Did you ever hold any other situation in the College before you were appointed to that?—For one year before my appointment to that chair, I was Junior Dean of the College.

What is your salary?—My salary is 112*l.* British, including an allowance for groceries.

In addition to which you reside at the College, and live at the Professor's table?—I do.

Where were you educated yourself?—In the College of Maynooth.

Where did you receive the education that was necessary to a certain extent, previous to your being admitted to the College of Maynooth?—For some time I went to school in the country at a small academy that had been established by a private gentleman.

In what part of the country?—In the county of Wexford; I went for some time to school also in the town of Wexford, but it was in the country principally that I made my preparatory studies.

Were you at what is called the College of Wexford?—No; the College had not been established at that time.

What was the annual payment at which you received your education?—Half a guinea a quarter; I lived at my uncle's house, and occasionally at my father's.

Is it a fact, that the education which a Student must necessarily receive before he is admitted into Maynooth, is one that he can obtain at a very low expense?—It depends upon the part of the country he may happen to be in. In some parts of the country a person can obtain a competent knowledge of Latin and Greek at a very small expense, when he is enabled to live at his father's house; but at present some change has taken place in that respect; there are seminaries now established in many dioceses, and the bishops think it useful that all the young men that are sent to College should be prepared in those seminaries. Their expenses there are much more considerable than they would be if they had been educated at the country schools.

Are

[Subsequently added by Witness.]

* I recollect, that in an answer to another question, I stated that some parts of Astronomy might be understood without the knowledge of this truth; and I might have added, that although it be a very elementary truth, all those parts of Astronomy might be known without it, which were known before the time of Kepler.

Appendix, N^o 22.Examination of
Rev.James Browne,
25 October 1826.

Are those what you would call Roman Catholic diocesan schools?—They are.

Will you state what is the expense that the young men are put to in obtaining their education there?—I understand that in the seminary of Wexford, the first expense of the College is about 25*l.* British; there are other additional expenses for books, for washing, and for some sciences which the young men may wish to study. I dare say in the whole it would amount to at least 40*l.* British a year.

According to any observation you have been able to make, do you think that the young men who have been educated for the Roman Catholic priesthood of late years, are of a higher or lower rank than they were when you first knew it?—I must answer that question with reference to what I know of my native diocese. I think that the character of the persons who have been sent to the College from the diocese of Ferns, has been pretty much the same, as long as I can recollect; they are the children of respectable farmers, of shopkeepers, or people in business in the town.

Does it occur to you, that the farmers in Wexford are in more comfortable circumstances than in many other parts of Ireland?—They are comfortable, but not rich; their farms are small, but they are a very industrious and comfortable people.

Will you have the goodness to state generally what are your duties as Professor of Sacred Scripture and Hebrew?—I have two classes each week in Scripture, one on Wednesday, and the other on Saturday, an hour each day; after the class of Scripture on Wednesday, it is part of my duty to hear the Students giving exhortations on the Gospels or Epistles for the following Sunday; or if I do not employ them in that duty, I generally take up the half hour myself in giving them an exposition of some passage of Scripture that may not be sufficiently explained during the hour of class; the class being only two hours in the week, and being obliged to interrogate the Students, there is very little time left for my own exposition of the Scripture, and therefore occasionally I use that half hour on Wednesday for the purpose of a more extensive explanation. On Thursday I have a class of Hebrew for one hour. We commence the elementary parts of Hebrew, and afterwards we read the different parts of the Bible. I am at liberty to use the half hour after class on Wednesday, either for the exposition of Scripture, or to give an opportunity to the young gentlemen of giving expositions of the Epistles or Gospels that are read in the church on the Sunday following, in order that they may be trained, when they go out on the mission, to give a just view of the Gospel, and the moral instruction connected with it, or naturally flowing from it.

What part of the Students attend your class?—All those at the College that are studying Theology attend my class.

They amount at present to nearly 200?—They amount at present to about 160 or 170.

Is not that a larger number than you can well instruct?—The instruction that is given to one is at the same time communicated to every person; what is really difficult for use is, that I am obliged to interrogate every person in the course of the year, in order to make an estimate of their relative merits; for this I find the time very short. In order therefore to ascertain their relative merits, I give them occasionally during the year subjects for composition in writing; I select one or two chapters which may contain some difficult passages; I require them to analyze and give me a true exposition of those different passages in writing, and afterwards I privately read those compositions, and mark their relative merits; this is understood of two compositions in the year, one at November and the other at Christmas; I have also a public examination at the end of the year, when every person is called and examined publicly before the house on the proficiency he has made in the study of the Scriptures. At the latter period of the year, I generally reserve a few days of class in order to give some general idea of the questions connected with the Scriptures generally; such as of the Hebrew text, of the Greek text, or of the Latin text; or of general subjects, such as the authority on which the Scriptures rest, their genuineness, integrity, &c.; such questions are discussed generally at that period of the year.

Do your lectures comprehend both the Old and the New Testament?—I confine myself principally to the New Testament, but occasionally I discuss some passages of the Old Testament; in a preparatory class, the young men are taught the history of the Old Testament.

Are there any books that you refer to, or use particularly in the explanation you give of the New Testament?—The class book that the Students use is, the Commentary of Menochius; and as that gives merely a simple exposition of the text, without going into any argument or disquisition on it, occasionally I do refer them to other comments, where such texts are more largely explained. For my own part, I read of course a variety of comments of all descriptions, in order that I may be able to interrogate them on the difficulties that may be proposed on each text, though they do not read so many; however by hearing the questions proposed by me, and the expositions afterwards given, they acquire a knowledge of them.

Will you name some of those commentaries to which you refer?—The commentary to which I refer the Students on the Epistles, is generally the Commentary of Estius, and occasionally the Commentary of Cornelius Alapide; sometimes I refer for a particular point to some others, to Bossuet's Works, &c. I use very much myself a commentary called the Synopsis Criticorum, by Polus Estius, and occasionally other commentaries.

Will you state what is your plan of proceeding in your class?—For the hour of class, I mark out a particular chapter, or more, if the chapter be short, and I require of the young men to be prepared to analyze and explain every text in that chapter; I use the Vulgate edition; it is read in Latin in the class, and after being read in Latin, the person answering gives gives an exposition in English; after he has given his exposition, if I have any remarks to make, I propose them; I may ask them for example, cannot that text be understood in this or in that other manner; it will be their duty then, by comparing that text with collateral texts of Scripture, with the scope and with the expositions of the Holy Fathers, to establish the genuine sense and exposition of it; and until he has satisfied me, I of course continue to interrogate him. It also happens occasionally, that a Student may not be satisfied with my exposition of the text; in that case, he has permission to propose any difficulty that occurs to him upon it, and I will either answer it immediately, or if I have not time to answer it immediately, I refer it to the half hour that I spoke of before, as being allotted to such exercises, and at that particular time I give whatever exposition may be necessary.

Do you refer to the Greek version at all?—I always refer to the Greek, when I discover any difference between it and the Vulgate version.

In point of fact, do the young men in the class become well acquainted with the Greek version?—In the minor classes the Greek testament is read, and in the Scripture class the Students often refer to the Greek text.

Do they read more of the Greek version than the Gospel of St. John?—I apprehend that the Gospel of St. Luke and the Acts of the Apostles are read in the minor classes; when I was reading Greek, they were read.

Do you refer to any other English translation than the Douay version?—I do not generally refer to any English translation in the class; we take the sense from the Latin Vulgate. If I have discovered, by comparing the English versions together, that there was any discrepancy between them, I might give notice of it to the Students in class, in order that they might investigate it, by comparing it with the Latin and with the Greek.

Do the Dunboyne Students come under your instruction at all?—In the Hebrew class they do.

But not in the Scripture class?—No.

Necessarily they have passed through that class?—They have passed through that class; they must have studied three years in the Scripture class, and must have distinguished themselves there to be promoted to the Dunboyne establishment.

Have you any thing in the nature of disputation upon themes connected with this course of instruction?—There are exercises once a month in the classes. The Professor gives a written syllabus, as we call it, of the contents of the chapter in the Testament or Bible; the young men are called on to argue one against the other, and in this case one will take up a particular point, which he conceives to be the true sense of the passage, and another will object to him.

Are your lectures applied solely to the explanation of Scripture, or do you take a wider range of theological instruction?—When I meet a text that supports a point of doctrine, I always mention the doctrine that is supported by it; and by the comparison of different texts, I sometimes show what is the true principle of morals that is taught in the Scripture.

Do your lectures comprehend the whole of the New Testament?—No, not the whole; the most difficult parts. We see in detail the Gospel of St. Matthew, comparing it with those of St. Mark and St. Luke; afterwards we see pretty much in detail also, the Gospel of St. John. We read in detail the Epistle to the Romans, with reference to that to the Galatians; we read also in detail the Epistles to the Corinthians and to the Hebrews; also the Epistles to Timothy and to Titus, with some of those of St. Peter; so upon the whole, we have a tolerably extensive view of the New Testament.

Do you lecture at all upon the book of Revelations?—No.

You read the book of Exodus, of course?—We have never read the book of Exodus in class, but we have had reference to it occasionally.

The Commandments are given in the book of Exodus?—They are.

Do you ever go through the Commandments?—I never went through them publicly in class; I might have referred to them occasionally, but I never gave an exposition of them in class.

Do you read the Prophets?—We have not read the Prophets.

Do you read the Psalms?—We read some of the Psalms in Hebrew, but we have not had time for the Prophets or Psalms in the ordinary class.

Do you read the Maccabees?—No, we never read the Maccabees.

Do you read Tobit?—No.

About how many chapters constitute, ordinarily, the subject-matter of a lecture?—One chapter generally; we go through it very minutely; we examine every word in it; we compare every text, one with the other, and investigate the argument contained in it, the scope and intention of it. We have sufficient employment for an hour generally in one chapter; if easy or short, we do more.

At the end of the year do you begin a new course, or go over the same one again?—We begin a new course every year.

Do you take a new set of chapters?—A new set of chapters.

At the rate of two chapters a week, making allowance for the vacations, must it not take a series of many years to go through the extensive course you have suggested?—We read generally a chapter; but there are some chapters so very easy that we pass over them lightly. The chapter that I mark out for exposition is generally one that has the greatest difficulty, and is the most interesting; the other chapters that are easy and simple I sometimes pass over without any exposition at all.

How many young men usually attend on these lectures at a time?—The whole class of Theology, which I suppose contains about 160 or 170 individuals.

Appendix, N^o 22.

Examination of
Rev.

James Browne,
25 October 1826.

How many of that number are you enabled to interrogate upon the subject-matter of the lecture in any one day?—Generally four; sometimes five, sometimes six.

Then the greater part of the time, it is presumed, is occupied in the exposition of your own views, rather than in interrogating them as to theirs?—Very little of the time of the class is occupied in the exposition of my own views. I interrogate every individual; and agreeably to the matter, I suggest an improvement to his exposition, where it may require improvement; but where there is any part that requires a lengthened exposition, I refer it to the half hour on Wednesday which I have marked out for that purpose; occasionally, but seldom, I may occupy the entire hour of class by an exposition of my own.

Do you find the Students generally well prepared with the subject-matter of the lecture?—They are generally tolerably well prepared; they have a great deal of other duties to attend to; they have also to attend the class of Speculative Theology and the class of Moral Theology.

Will you define exactly the distinction you take between Speculative Theology and Moral Theology?—Speculative Theology I understand to refer to the dogmas of faith; it is sometimes called Dogmatic Theology; its objects are the mysteries of religion; Moral Theology is confined to the duties of man to God, to his neighbour, and to himself.

The one relates to faith, and the other to conduct?—Just so.

How long have the Scripture lectures existed at Maynooth, upon the present footing?—They existed before my appointment, but were not so regular and fixed.

How long is that ago?—This is the eleventh year.

Will you describe the number that usually attend your Hebrew lecture?—The number that attend the Hebrew lecture is rather small; it is about twelve or thirteen; there are thirteen, I think, attending this year.

That is the eleven Dunboyne Students and two others?—Not the entire eleven of the Dunboyne Students. The regulation regarding the Hebrew class is this: the Dunboyne Students are bound to attend it for two years; they are three years on that establishment; of course, those that have attended it for two years are exempted from attending it in the third year; hence, there are some at present on the Dunboyne establishment that are not obliged to attend, in consequence of having attended two years before. The Students of the classes of Theology are at liberty to attend; but they are generally so engaged with other studies, Theology and Scripture, that they find very little time for the study of Hebrew, hence it is that very few attend.

Can you give to the Commissioners any tolerably distinct notion of the proficiency in Hebrew that the young men at present attending your class have made?—Last year some of them were able to translate tolerably well passages in the Old Testament. We commence with the Grammar, and in the course of two years some of them are able to translate Hebrew tolerably freely.

Have you any means of forming any estimate in your own mind, as to the degree of proficiency that the Hebrew class make, as compared with the degree of proficiency made in other Universities?—No, I have not.

What do you conceive may be the amount of time spent in preparation by the young men, upon an average, for your Scripture lecture?—It is only by conjecture that I am able to answer that question; I imagine two or three hours for each lecture.

How many hours in the week do the lectures in Speculative Theology require?—Four for one week, and five for the other.

Then there are nine hours in each week occupied in class by Dogmatical and Moral Theology?—There are.

How many hours do you suppose are occupied in each week in preparing for those lectures which occupy nine hours?—For the morning class there are three hours in the morning; for the second class, there are two hours in the middle of the day; after the second class, there are three hours in the evening, which they may apply to either study, or to the study of the Scripture.

Are those eight hours per day occupied in preparation for the Dogmatic and Moral Theology classes?—Yes, that may be the case.

Does that amount to forty-eight hours in a week?—It does; but then they are not bound to give that time exactly to it; they are at liberty to study what they please in Theology during those hours. They may study Scripture if they please during those hours, or they may study Moral Theology at an hour when it might naturally be expected that they should study Dogmatic Theology.

But the Moral and Dogmatic Theology occupy, according to the College regulations, about nine hours in class, and about forty-eight hours of preparation in the week?—I think pretty much in that way. I cannot say exactly that that time is devoted to the study of Moral and Dogmatic Theology; the Student may, if he please, give eight or ten hours to the study of Scripture.

You have mentioned, that the Students are permitted to propose any doubts or difficulties which they may entertain, respecting your exposition of particular passages of Scripture; is that privilege frequently used by them?—Frequently used indeed.

At what time does that usually take place?—Often in public class, and generally during the half hour that I have appointed for that purpose.

You mentioned also, that there is an annual examination of the Students on the subject of your class; is there an opportunity at that time of examining each of the Students, as to their proficiency?—Yes; every Student is examined at that public examination.

What

What period of time does that examination occupy?—It occupies three days, generally.

Do you mean the examination of your particular class?—Yes.

In Scripture and Hebrew?—In Scripture alone; it occupies the greater part of three days; it generally takes twelve or thirteen hours to examine the entire class. There is an examination afterwards in Hebrew; but as the class is not so numerous it does not occupy so much time.

When did you enter the College originally?—In the year 1807.

Did you attend Dr. Delahogue's lectures?—I did; I never read under any other Professor of Dogmatic Theology.

Are you aware of the principles inculcated in his tract with respect to the Catholic doctrine, as to the civil or temporal power of the Pope, and his right to interfere with the rights of Sovereigns, and his infallibility, speaking alone?—Yes, I have received his opinions.

Were the principles and opinions he inculcated and delivered from his chair, the same as are found in his tract?—Precisely the same as are found in his tract on the church.

Are those principles generally held by the Professors in the College of Maynooth?—They are; there are no other principles taught or held in the College publicly.

Are they your own principles?—They are.

You say that there are no other principles taught or held in the College publicly; so far as your information goes, are any other principles taught or held privately, or in private discussion in the College?—As to the private discussions that we may have in the College, I must say, that every sort of opinion is discussed. In our private disputations, we discuss every opinion for our amusement, and sometimes defend this opinion, and sometimes that; but this is in order to give us a facility in establishing the true opinion in public. The opinion given in public is the serious opinion of every individual.

Have you ever heard it discussed whether what are commonly called the Gallican Liberties, ought to be considered as liberties or fetters?—I do not doubt but I have heard that expression.

Do you think there is any individual in the house who seriously considers them as fetters?—I am sure there is not one that considers them as fetters. In the Gallican Liberties there is one, if it may be called a Gallican Liberty, which denies to the Pope any interference, directly or indirectly, in temporals; this is embraced by every Catholic in these countries, and I never heard that part of their liberties said to be a fetter in any sense, even privately.

Does it not become material to be able to distinguish, by some certain criterion, between temporals and spirituals?—Yes, of course.

Can you suggest any definition that would convey your own view of that matter?—Spiritual power regards the supernatural order, temporal power the natural order. When the object is in a supernatural order, it is spiritual power; when it is in a natural order, it is civil power. To ascertain the limits of each, we have only to consider the object of the act or precept; if its immediate tendency is in the supernatural order, it is clearly spiritual power; if it be terminated in the natural order, or in the civil relations of man to man, it is clearly a temporal power. Of course, if we consider these principles with reference to the power of the Pope, we see that whatever he directs for our spiritual interest in faith or in morals, has a clear relation to a supernatural order, and of course to spiritual power; but if he should direct us as to our relations with regard to temporal rights or temporal privileges, we may easily see that he is speaking then of things of an inferior order, a natural order, and of course, of things that come under the jurisdiction of temporal power.

Do you think that all men, or most men, would be found to agree, as to whether any particular subject might belong to the natural or to the supernatural order?—For my own part, I conceive that it would not be difficult for any person to perceive clearly the distinction. If a man tell me that I am to believe a certain point of doctrine, I see clearly that the act recommended appertains to the supernatural order; if he tell me that I cannot hold a certain legal privilege of society, or that I cannot use a certain civil right, I think it clear that the act appertains to the natural order.

If the Pope were to inform you in any manner, for instance, by a bull directed to this country, that any particular act of yours, or any particular course of conduct of yours, was necessary for your salvation, would you consider that as relating to a natural or to a supernatural order?—I should consider the nature of the act that he requires; for although the end that he proposes is of a spiritual nature, I should consider the nature of the act also, to form my judgment.

The Pope's bull, putting it to you upon the footing of your spiritual advantage, you would not yourself consider as referring the act to the supernatural order?—I conceive that I should consider the motive of the act as certainly supernatural, because it refers to my own salvation; but I should consider also, whether the tendency of the act itself is supernatural.

Are the Commissioners to understand, that you would not necessarily consider the Pope as a sufficient judge upon that matter, whether the act belonged to a supernatural or to a natural order?—I consider that the Pope does not pronounce a judgment upon the nature of the act, he merely tells me that such an act will be conducive to my salvation; but I am to see what that act is, and it is from the consideration of the act itself that I am to estimate whether it refers to a supernatural or a natural end.

Does your answer imply, that you conceive the Pope might be mistaken upon the subject?—It is possible that he might be mistaken on the subject.

Suppose the Pope to tell you, that it was essential to your salvation to take up arms against His Majesty; would you think the Pope right or wrong in that case?—Evidently wrong.

Appendix, N^o 22.Examination of
Rev.James Browne,
25 October 1826.

Would you consider it a duty in that case rather to disobey than to obey him?—My allegiance is a duty which I am bound by the law of God, and by every other consideration, to give to the authority which protects my life and property. It is so clear a duty that any declaration to the contrary I should reject without hesitation.

Suppose this case, however improbable it may be, that the Pope were to inform you, that preserving your full allegiance to your temporal Sovereign, it was yet right and fitting that you should take a certain course for procuring a restitution to the Roman Catholic church of the civil and temporal benefit of which by the events of history in this country it has been deprived, and was to enjoin that course to you upon the peril of your salvation; what would be your feeling under those circumstances; you will observe your allegiance is not touched by the hypothesis?—I conceive that to be decided on the same principle as the preceding supposition, because the right to property must be directed by law. The Pope has no right to interfere in what regards property, and his interference, as supposed, would be rejected on the same principle.

With reference to the question just put to you, supposing you received a bull from the Pope, stating that a certain course of conduct was necessary for your salvation, would you feel yourself justified in judging for yourself, whether you should or should not obey that bull in opposition to the opinion expressed by the Pope, the head of your church?—Understanding the question in reference to the exercise of temporal power, I apprehend that such a doctrine, or rather direction, would not be proposed to me by the Pope as a matter that would command my obedience of belief. I do not know that there is an instance on record, where such a doctrine is propounded in such a way that any Catholic would conceive himself bound to obey it.

Does not that proceed upon the assumption that the Pope would not suggest any thing inconsistent with the Catholic faith?—It does not proceed upon the assumption that he could not suggest any thing inconsistent with the Catholic faith, but that in such cases, he could not command my obedience.

The question assumed that he might do so?—On the supposition that such a thing would be done, I should conceive myself perfectly at liberty to exercise my judgment about it.

In other words, you conceive yourself fully justified in holding an opinion upon a point of faith connected with your salvation different from that which the Pope, as the head of your Church, adopted?—It could not be propounded as a matter of faith; it might possibly be proposed as a matter of prudence and discretion.

Do you mean, that it is not to be supposed that the Pope would propound any doctrine or any duty contrary to that which it is the duty of the Catholic Church to adopt?—I mean, that in matters of prudence, and appertaining to discipline, we are not bound to admit the decisions of the Pope, because these things depend upon prudence and discretion, and do not appertain to faith in any sense.

With respect to a matter of moral conduct, which may or may not lead to salvation, supposing the opinion of the Pope should be found one way, should you feel yourself at liberty to discuss in your own mind, whether you should act according to the Pope's opinion?—Perfectly so, on all matters appertaining to discipline, and regulated by prudence.

Suppose that the passage in the Pope's bull began with the expression "Id certum est," or "Id certum comperimus," or "Id certissimum est," and then propounding distinctly a matter of religious doctrine, would you feel yourself at liberty to question it?—The doctrine that we teach on that point is simply this; when the Pope defines a matter of faith, and proposes it as such to the entire Church, if there is no reclamation on the part of the Church, if the Church assent to it, then we admit it as a matter of faith, but it must be proposed as a matter of faith; we have rules to ascertain, whether the matter proposed appertains to faith or merely to discipline; in order to appertain to faith, it must be declared as revealed; it must be proposed to be believed; it must not be a matter of temporary regulation, or imply any kind of prudential arrangement or discipline; when it is proposed in this manner, and received by the Church, we all admit it.

By being assented to by the Church, do you not rather mean not dissented from?—In that case, not dissenting is assenting.

That is, if the Church does not protest against it, it becomes binding, in the case you have put?—Just so; it becomes binding when it is proposed as matter of faith to be believed by the entire Church, which in the supposition does not dissent.

If the Pope were to address a bull to this country, including of course yourself as an inhabitant of it, and if he used the expression "Id certissimum est," and then propounded a matter distinctly of religious belief, would you feel at liberty to reject that doctrine, whatever it might be?—If we suppose that the doctrine which he proposes is received, or assented to by the whole Church, we of course receive it.

But if you considered that the doctrine he so put forward had not been received by the whole Church, would you feel at liberty to reject it afterwards, supposing that doctrine so put forth is distinctly a religious matter, and put forward by the Pope under the expression of "Id certissimum est," or "Id certum comperimus?"—I think the mere expression of "Id certissimum est," or "Id certum comperimus," is not sufficient to characterise the doctrine as a doctrine of faith; it must be declared fully and explicitly to be of faith, or there must be some punishment annexed to the disbelief of the article, which will mark it out as appertaining to the deposit of faith, but the vague expression "Id certissimum est" may be referred perhaps to a matter that does not appertain to faith at all.

If the Pope annexed penalties to the disbelief of it by you, you would then consider it as propounded as a matter of faith?—When the Pope proposes a doctrine of faith, it is not sufficient that he address it to me as an individual; it must be addressed to the Church generally, generally, and after it is thus addressed to the Church, and there is no reclamation on the part of the Church, it becomes a matter of religious belief; the penalties annexed to the disbelief of it sometimes designate it as a matter of faith.

Do you say it is never done, that the Pope should address a bull to an individual?—Not for the purpose of establishing a dogma of faith.

Suppose this case, that a doctrine should be propounded by the Pope, and not reclaimed from by the Church, professing to be a decree on a matter of faith or morals, but which you (let the case be supposed) in your own individual opinion conceived and looked upon to be a matter of discipline, would you still consider yourself or not at liberty to disobey that decree; would you consider that you had the power of exercising your judgment upon the question?—I would take the sense of the entire Church in the case, because if the entire Church supposes it to be a matter of faith or morals, and it is propounded as such, my individual opinion will correspond with theirs.

Is there any matter connected either with the discipline or the instruction at Maynooth, that you think might be altered advantageously for the College?—I have not turned my attention very particularly to that subject, and I was under the impression that our Board of Trustees would take any thing into consideration for the domestic government of the house.

Examination of
Rev.James Browne,
25 October 1826.

Appendix, N° 23.

Examination of the Reverend Francis Anglade, D.D., Thursday, 31st October 1826.

YOU hold the Chair of Professor of Moral Theology in Maynooth?—I do.

How many years have you held it?—To the best of my recollection I came to Ireland at the end of November or December in the year 1802, at the time of the peace of Amiens. I held the Chair of Logic about nine years before I was promoted to the Chair of Moral Theology.

You are yourself a native of France?—I am.

What salary have you?—I have 112*l.*, and out of that I am to provide myself with my groceries, and every thing else, but merely the dinner and bread, butter and milk.

You live within the walls of the College?—I do.

Where were you educated?—I was educated for my collegiate study, till I came to Philosophy, in the College of Rhodéz; my native place was Milheu, but I was educated at Rhodéz, and after that, I went to Paris, where I read the course for the degrees of Theology and Philosophy, and went through all the other studies.

Were you Professor of Philosophy in the University of Paris?—Yes, before I came here.

How many years did you hold that situation?—A very short time, because I was very young at that time; it was in 1789 that my nomination took place, as far as I can recollect, and then we had an oath tendered to us which I refused to take, not being consistent with my conscience or my principles of loyalty.

You mean the oaths that were tendered at the time of the Revolution?—Yes, that made it impossible that I should hold any longer the Chair of Philosophy; however, we were obliged to continue our lectures till they were pleased to put somebody in our place.

You continued to lecture without having taken the oath?—I continued to lecture without having taken the oath.

How long did you continue there as a recusant?—They left us in that state for nearly four months; at that time I was besides in another College, which is the College of Louis le Grand; that was close to the other College, where I had my appointment of Professor; I had another situation as Prefect of Divinity in that House, and the President desired me not to leave it in those circumstances, and so I held the two places at the same time.

When did you leave France?—To the best of my recollection it was at the end of 1792.

You left it for some years before you were appointed to the Chair you now fill at Maynooth?—Yes.

Will you be so good as to state the circumstances by which you were enabled to obtain the Chair at Maynooth; was it an open election?—I was in London at that time, and happening to call upon Doctor Delahogue, he told me that he was charged by the trustees to look out for a person fit to occupy one of the Chairs of Philosophy, and that if I wished, he would propose me.

Was there any other person proposed at the same time?—Not that I know of; I was appointed Junior Lecturer; that lasted for about two or three months, and then they gave me the nomination of Professor.

Were you a Member of the Sorbonne?—I am a Fellow of the Sorbonne.

You are still so?—I am.

To what class do you lecture at Maynooth?—In the class of Moral Theology at present.

Of what number of students does it now consist?—I cannot state exactly the number, because it is very great, but I think it is about 170.

Do they continue under your instruction for more than a year?—Three years.

Will you be so good as to describe the course of instruction that you give them?—There are some years in which we can teach more; and there are some years in which we are not able to go through the whole course intended; our object has been, seeing the want of clergy, to chuse among the treatises of divinity those which are most essential to them for the discharge of their duty in the ministry, as they have no other occasion of improving themselves, except by reading books; and so the treatises I have taught are relating to human acts, conscience, sins, sacraments, penance in all its parts, marriage, restitution, contracts, laws, censures and irregularities.

Is the course of instruction given by you materially different from that given on similar subjects in the University of Paris?—I do not think it is; there may be some questions taught in the University of Paris on some particular subject which the Professor will treat upon more extensively than we do; but we teach nothing but what was taught in the University of Paris; though in the University of Paris they may have taught more than we do.

You are a member of the Sorbonne?—I am.

As a member of the Sorbonne, did you subscribe the four celebrated articles of the Gallican church?—I do not think we were obliged to subscribe any thing; but we were obliged to defend them in our theses, otherwise our theses would not have been easily admitted; we defended several theses during the course, and those theses were, before being printed and published, submitted to the examination of three Doctors of the Sorbonne; the one was the head of the Faculty, which we call the Syndic; there was another, who was called the Master of Studies; the other was the Doctor who presided at the theses; these examined it, and if there had been any thing against that doctrine, they would not probably have permitted the theses to be defended.

Will you have the goodness to attend to the part of the declaration that will now be read to you, being the preparatory statement in the first article; it is in the following words, as the Commissioners find the declaration of the French Clergy in 1682, given in a Report from a Select Committee of the House of Commons, on the regulation of Roman Catholic subjects in foreign States:—"Many persons endeavour to subvert the decrees of the Gallican church and its liberties, which our ancestors have so zealously supported, and to overthrow their foundations, which rest upon the sacred canons and the tradition of the Fathers; others, under pretence of defending them, have audaciously struck at the pre-eminence of Saint Peter, and of the Popes, his successors, instituted by Jesus Christ, prevented that obedience to be paid to them which is due to them by all; and diminished the majesty of the Apostolic See, which is respectable to all nations where the true faith of the church is taught, and where its unity is preserved. The heretics, on their part, leave nothing undone to make this power, which maintains the peace of the church, appear insupportable to kings and nations; and they employ this artifice to separate artless souls from the communion of the church. Wishing, therefore, to obviate these inconveniences, we, the Archbishops and Bishops, assembled at Paris, by order of the King, together with the other deputies of the clergy, representing the Gallican church, have, after a mature deliberation, thought it advisable to make the following regulations and declaration: First, that St. Peter and his successors, Vicars of Jesus Christ and the whole church itself, have received no power from God, but over things spiritual and concerning salvation, and not over temporal and civil affairs; Jesus Christ himself teaching us, 'that his kingdom is not of this world;' and in another place, that we ought to 'render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and to God the things which are God's;' and that consequently this precept of the Apostle St. Paul, can nowise be altered or shaken, 'Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers; for there is no power but of God, the powers that be are ordained of God, whosoever therefore resisteth the power resisteth the ordinance of God.' We accordingly declare, that Kings and Sovereigns are not subject to any ecclesiastical power by the commands of God in temporal concerns; that they cannot be directly or indirectly deposed by the authority of the keys of the church; that their subjects cannot be freed from the submission and obedience which they owe to them, or absolved from their oath of allegiance; and that this doctrine, necessary for public tranquillity, and not less beneficial to the church than to the state, ought to be inviolably followed, as being conformable to the will of God, to the tradition of the holy Fathers, and to the example of the Saints." Were the principles set forth in the article which has now been read to you maintained by you in the University of Paris, and at the Sorbonne?—They were by me, as far as it concerned me. I always defended them in my theses, in the full manner in which they are stated there.

Do you subscribe fully in heart and spirit to that first article?—I do.

You have been at Maynooth since 1802?—Yes.

During that time you must have had frequent communication with the Professors of Maynooth?—Of course, I lived always with them.

Will you have the goodness to state to the Commissioners, whether that first article, which has been read to you, relating to the question, whether the Pope has civil or temporal power, appears to you to be now maintained sincerely, not only in public but in private, by the Professors at Maynooth?—I think, as far as my knowledge goes, that I never heard one word said against that doctrine in private, and in public, it is always maintained; and even in private, all those I have heard unite in those principles.

Have you found that the principle of that article was held by the Professors at Maynooth, and the body at large, so far as you were acquainted with them, as sincerely and firmly as in Paris?—I think so; I have no reason to doubt it; at least as far as I can judge from the actions of men and their language.

With respect to the other articles of the Gallican church, the second article is as follows:—"That the plenitude of power which the holy Apostolical See, and the successors of Saint Peter, Vicar of Jesus Christ, have over spiritual concerns, is such, that the decrees of the holy general Council of Constance, contained in the 4th and 5th sessions, approved by

by the holy Apostolical See, confirmed by the practice of the whole church, and of the Popes, and at all times religiously observed by the Gallican church, do nevertheless continue in force and retain their virtue; and that the Gallican church does not approve of the opinion of those who impair these decrees, or weaken them by saying that their authority is not well established, that they are not approved, or that they regard only the time of the schism."—What are the decrees of the Council of Constance in the 4th and 5th session referred to in that second article?—As far as I can recollect, it was, that the Council was superior to the Pope; and that every person belonging to the Catholic church was obliged to submit to the decrees of the Council, as well the head of the church as the members; that that Council was assembled to reform the church likewise, both in its members and in its head.

Will you have the goodness to state, whether, according to your experience, you think the principle of that second article is generally held at Maynooth?—I do not think that question was ever discussed; it is of no moment, because all parties admit that in the time of schism the Council has authority, and as the Council of Constance was assembled for the purpose of putting an end to the schism that took place in the Latin church, and it was solicited by all the temporal powers there to put an end to it, of course the Council, in that case, had the authority; and even the Ultra-montanes allow, that for the time of the schism, the power resides in the Council, and that it can even act against the head, or the pretended head of the church. In France, we maintain that doctrine always, that the Council is superior to the Pope; but however, the clergy of France did not by that wish to say that that doctrine was an article of faith, and was to be held by all nations, but that it was the doctrine of France; they thought that the church had a power above the Pope.

You cannot state what is the prevailing opinion at Maynooth, as to whether the Council be or not above the Pope?—I never heard any thing about that article; the essential article was the first, as to the other it is a controverted question; it was agitated in the class of Theology, as one of the articles of the Gallican Church, pro and contra.

The third article is as follows, "That the exercise of the apostolical power must therefore be regulated according to the canons given by the spirit of God, and consecrated by the universal reverence of all the world; that the regulations, usages and statutes admitted in the kingdom of France, and in the Gallican Church, ought to be maintained in full force, and the customs of our fathers to be continued unshaken; that it even is consonant with the greatness of the Holy Apostolical See, that laws and customs which were established with the consent of that respectable See and of the Church, should subsist without any variation." Do you consider that article as of general application, or only as applicable to the Gallican Church?—There is a part of it which is applicable to all churches, that the use of the spiritual power of the Pope is not to be exercised in an arbitrary manner, but regulated by the laws of the church, which laws were enacted in the general councils; the other part is confined to the Gallican Church, that the Popes could not do any thing against our usages and customs in the Gallican Church.

The first part of the article is, "That the exercise of the apostolical power must therefore be regulated according to the canons given by the spirit of God, and consecrated by the universal reverence of all the world." Will you have the goodness to state, whether you think that that general principle is maintained at Maynooth?—I suppose it is; I have never heard any thing to the contrary; I think it seems to be the opinion of all persons who hold that the Pope has not an arbitrary power, but that he ought to exercise that power according to the laws of the church.

The fourth article is as follows, "That although the Pope has the principal share in questions of faith, and although his decrees regard all churches and every church in particular, his judgment is yet not above being reformed or revised, unless it has the assent of the church; this article is generally understood to deny the infallibility of the Pope, speaking of himself, and independently of a general council, is it not?—It is understood in this sense, that the Pope, as the head of the church, on a definition of a doctrinal point, has the power by his supremacy to send a bull, speaking ex cathedrâ, in which he defines and decides such a thing. In order that that bull should have the authority of infallibility, it is required by the French theologians, that it should be directed to every bishop of the Catholic Church, and if the bishops after that, publish that doctrine, it becomes then an article of faith, on account of that general assent of the church which sanctioned that doctrinal bull of the Pope; on the other side, the ultra-montanes are of opinion, that as soon as the bull has been emitted by the Pope, speaking ex cathedrâ, what he has defined is infallible, and that his judgment is irrefragable, which we do not admit.

In your opinion is the principle of the fourth article held at Maynooth in general?—I think that is the general opinion; but one may be for one side, and another for the other; for it is not an article of faith either one way or the other; we disclaim it entirely as an article of faith, as is contained in our oath of allegiance.

Do you not hold as an article of the Catholic Faith, that the Pope has a primacy both in point of honour and jurisdiction?—He has.

Do you hold, that his jurisdiction is purely spiritual, and in no degree civil or temporal?—I do hold, that the Pope has only spiritual jurisdiction, but not as an article of faith, because to make an article of faith it requires many conditions, which do not obtain with regard to that point that is controverted by the ultra-montanes; however, there is no article of faith upon the subject, and I could not maintain that as an article of faith.

Do you not reject the doctrine, that the Pope has any civil or temporal power?—I do reject that doctrine.

Appendix, N^o 23.Examination of
Rev.F. Anglade, D. D.
31 October 1826.

Do you hold, that you could reject absolutely any thing that was a doctrine of the Catholic faith, or what by possibility could become a doctrine of the Catholic faith?—If it was become a doctrine of the Catholic faith I could not reject it.

Do you hold it possible, that any thing can become an article of the Catholic faith which you now swear to be erroneous?—I do not think it is possible.

You now swear, that the Pope has no civil or temporal power?—I do.

Do you hold it to be possible, that it ever can be stated by the church to be an article of faith, that the Pope has civil or temporal power?—No.

The Commissioners understand you to declare, that it is no article of faith that the Pope is infallible, nor are Catholics bound to believe that he is so; but if the Pope and a council properly constituted, were to declare to-morrow that the Pope was infallible, would it not then become an article of faith, binding upon all good Catholics?—It would.

Is not the distinction between stating, that a doctrine is not a doctrine of the Catholic faith and rejecting a doctrine altogether this, that in saying a doctrine is not a doctrine of the Catholic faith, you do not state that that doctrine is erroneous, and consequently you do not hold that the Catholic Church may not hereafter declare it to be right; but if you reject a doctrine as erroneous, then you hold that the Catholic Church never can declare it to be right?—There is this difference between the two cases, viz. that an opinion which is left to the free discussion of theologians may not be erroneous in itself, and consequently become the subject of a definition of the Church, whereas an opinion, which by the greater part of the bishops and theologians is rejected as erroneous, it must be absolutely so, and of course, can never be proposed as an article of faith by the Church.

With respect to the deposing power, you hold that doctrine at present to be erroneous. If the Church should declare, that in holding that doctrine to be erroneous, you and others who are of the same opinion have been mistaken, and that you ought to think otherwise, should you, as a good Catholic, feel bound to lay aside that opinion, and to adopt a different opinion?—I think that the Church can never decide that; therefore with respect to the supposition, what would I do, if the Church define it, that supposition never can be realized.

You hold that the Church, in defining articles of faith, is infallible?—I do.

You would reject, as an article of the Catholic faith, that it was lawful to murder your neighbour if you liked it; would you not therefore hold it impossible that the Church could ever propound as an article of faith, that you could murder your neighbour?—Certainly; because it is against the natural right, and the Church could never define any thing against the natural right.

The Roman Catholic Church throughout Europe, now and for centuries, has positively rejected the doctrine that the Pope has civil or temporal power?—In general, they do.

Do not all the Catholic States of Europe, outside of the papal States, maintain that?—They do in the Universities; I cannot state as a positive thing, that they all do; but I think it is the general doctrine of the Catholic church.

Do you not hold it to be against the law of God, that subjects should rebel against their king, because the Pope should think proper to undertake to depose him?—I reject that doctrine absolutely; because I think that the bond of allegiance of the subject towards the sovereign is founded on the law of God, and on the law of nature, and that neither the Church nor any authority has any power to pronounce any thing contrary to the law of God or the law of nature.

Do you hold then, that it would be contrary to the law of God, and the law of nature, to pronounce any thing which should go to dissolve the bond of connexion between the sovereign and his subjects?—I do, by the spiritual power.

You, holding that your Church is infallible, and holding that being infallible, it cannot pronounce any thing against the law of God and of morals, must you not hold it impossible, that it can pronounce any thing to the prejudice of the bond you have mentioned?—I do; when it is against the law of nature and the law of God, the Church cannot pronounce it.

Have not some Popes assumed the power of deposing sovereigns?—There are some who have; but they have in that, acted in general, in my opinion, on the presumption of some temporal rights that they had on those kingdoms. I do not know of any of them that have assumed it as a spiritual power, though they have made use of those words, that it was ex potestate clavium, because they assume, that being Pope they have the keys of St. Peter, and in every kind of transaction they use those words, though it may not be on their spiritual power that they act.

What is your opinion as to those bulls of deposition?—My opinion about those bulls in general is, that those bulls contain nothing doctrinal, which is to teach what is to be maintained in the Catholic church, but only that those Popes acted from a right that they supposed they had acquired, through circumstances and times, on different kingdoms and different places. In the time that that power was assumed, I think Europe was very much in ignorance, and the princes made use very often of the Pope as a tool to serve their ambition; and of course, there is no doubt, that the Pope availed himself of an authority which was so flattering to him; and he might, acting on those presumptions, after that have pretended to a real right to depose kings; those depositions were chiefly concerning those kingdoms which were feudal of the empire, and he thought that the emperor was likewise under a feudal law, with regard to him, Charlemagne having been in some manner appointed emperor by him; after that, he pretended always to have a kind of authority in all those kingdoms, and if the emperor did not behave well, that he could act in consequence. There were some of the Popes certainly who expressed themselves in a very extraordinary extraordinary manner, but we are not at all to form our religious opinion on those transactions of the Popes.

The Commissioners beg to assure you, that in the questions they are about to ask you, they are incapable of intending the slightest disrespect to you personally, or to any Roman Catholic living, but the questions will merely be as to the meaning of some positions that are contained in the class-book of Moral Theology, of which the Commissioners are well aware that you are not the author, but which it is a duty assigned to you to teach, and they hope that you will understand every question that is about to be put as subject to that explanation. The Commissioners observe, that it is laid down in page 119, and the following pages of the class-book of Moral Theology used at Maynooth, that there are seven causes excusing the obligation of an oath, and five causes taking away the obligation altogether, "causæ excusantes," and "causæ tollentes;" the Commissioners will be much obliged to you to define, in the first instance, the nature of the distinction between the two classes?—Those causes, as far as I understand, which are called "impedientes obligationem juramenti," are those which prevent a man from contracting the obligation of an oath:—for example, "prima est defectus libertatis;" if a man has no liberty, as an oath ought to proceed from an act of our free-will, under those circumstances, the want of liberty will prevent him from contracting that obligation. Suppose that a thief on the highway stopped me, and told me, holding his pistol, "If you do not swear, that in an hour or two, or some time, you will put in such a place such a sum of money, which I require, I will shoot you;" that oath cannot be binding.

You have now stated very clearly the first of the seven causes, that are "impedientes," or "excusantes;" the Commissioners observe a second cause is stated to be the resistance of law; that is, that the oath is unlawful; how do you define the third?—The third is "impeditio majoris boni oppositi rei per juramentum promissæ."

Will you give the Commissioners an example of the third cause you have stated?—I will suppose, that I bind myself to do an act, say a religious act, and suppose, that if I comply with the performance of that religious act, it will prevent me from doing another act from which greater glory will result to God; in that case, though the oath I have taken has for its object a good thing, yet as it is an obstacle to a better one, I should not mind the first, but attend to the second.

In the case you have now put, who is to be the judge, whether it is conducive to the greater good, that the person swearing should break the oath, or should keep it?—If it is on a religious matter, the ecclesiastical superior is to judge of that; because if it was left to the individual, he might commit a great mistake; he might not judge fairly in his own case; therefore we require that he shall submit the matter to a superior authority, who being unconcerned in the business, can pronounce a better judgment than an individual could pronounce himself on the same matter; but there is an exception which is in the book, that in a case like that, if the oath is a promissory oath, that is, if it is in favour of a third person, in that case he cannot change that obligation, even for a greater good.

Could you give the Commissioners any particular example that may occur to your own mind, for the sake of illustration, in which you conceive that it would be lawful to break an oath for the attainment of a greater good?—As to an example, it may not come to my mind immediately, to find an example that would be so à propos to the case as to make a fair application of the principle; but suppose a person will promise something to another; suppose he has bound himself on oath to give him a sum of money, say 100*l.*, after that it comes into his mind, that he could do a greater good, if he was to build a chapel, which will cost perhaps 1,000*l.*, I say, that though he was to build a chapel, he could not be free from the original oath he has taken, because he could not fulfil the second without committing an injustice to the person, who having accepted of his promise, has acquired jus ad rem, and he has a right to possess the 100*l.* that had been promised to him.

You have now given a clear example of a case, in which it is not permitted to change the obligation of an oath; the Commissioners will be obliged to you now to give an example of a case in which it would be permitted to break an oath for the attainment of a greater good?—I may take the example in the book: Suppose that a person was to bind himself by oath, that he never will observe the evangelical counsels, by observing which the christian life is made more perfect, than by observing merely the commandments of God; in that case, that oath being an obstacle to a greater good, I think, would be a cause "impedens obligationem," and I think, that that man should not be prevented from following, after the evangelical counsels, if he had a desire to do it, on account of the oath he has taken, never to observe those evangelical counsels.

There is one obvious distinction applying to the cases you have put, which is, that the interest of no third person is concerned?—Yes; there is only the interest of the person himself, which might take off the obligation of a preceding oath for a greater spiritual good.

The fourth cause is stated to be the impossibility of the thing promised; upon that head the Commissioners have no question to ask. The fifth cause is the inutility of the thing proposed; who is to be the judge in this case, whether the thing is useless or not?—Sometimes the confessor, the director of the conscience of the man may decide, that upon an exposition of the matter of that obligation, if it is a matter of no consequence; or if it is a matter of such a nature, that God Almighty cannot receive any honour from the observation of it, and that the neighbour cannot receive any benefit from it; in that case, we say, that it is "res inutilis," and, therefore, to make such an oath, is to take the name of God in vain; and a person would commit sin, if he was to do it through a kind of imprudence, and without considering what he does; suppose a person swears that he will never pare the nails of his fingers, we consider that as a foolish thing.

Where the "causa excusans" is the alleged uselessness of the thing proposed, "ad hominis utilitatem," that is, to the interest of a third person, who is to be the judge, whether the thing promised is useless or not to that third person?—If it is a thing evidently useless in itself, any man of common sense can judge that it is a useless thing, and a trifling thing, but in general we defer it to the direction of any prudent ecclesiastic or confessor, or to the superior, if it is a matter of difficulty.

In the case last put, if the person to whom the oath was taken, should think it useful to him, and the person who had taken the oath were to think it useless to him, who is to decide between them?—There should be an arbitration of the superior, if it is a matter of ecclesiastical concern, or of a counsellor or lawyer, if it is a pecuniary matter, or any thing of that sort.

Do you mean, that if any person takes an oath binding himself to any other person to do a certain act, that he is at liberty afterwards to say, that that would be an useless act, though the other person should say it was an useful act?—No; I could not say that, because I must take into my judgment the utility, not only in my own mind, but in the mind of the person who is concerned, because I cannot judge myself entirely of the relative utility of it.

Do not you, in that case, want some third person to arbitrate or to judge upon the point?—I think so; but I do believe, that in that case I must adhere to the opinion of the person who has a right to require the oath, and who thinks that that oath is useful, because in that case I may be mistaken, and besides, when I take an oath, I take it in the sense and meaning of the person who proposes it, and it is not in my power to say that the thing, which in myself I may judge to be useless, is useless in the mind of the person proposing the oath.

Will you state the sixth cause, excusing the obligation of an oath?—The sixth cause is error or fraud, used about the substance of the thing which has been promised under oath.

Who is to determine, whether there has been error or fraud in the case or not?—We do not leave it to the judgment of the person, but we refer him to his bishop; he is to expose to him the circumstances in which he was, when he has taken that oath, and to state what was his error; and after that, the superior, considering the nature of the circumstances and the nature of the error, will say, I think that that error was "circa substantiam rei promissæ," and, therefore, that you did not think to swear what you did swear. Suppose that I have promised upon oath, to give to a person a vase in my possession, which I believe to be made of brass, but before delivery I discover it to be made of gold, there is an error circa substantiam rei, on which I would refer to the superior, to know if I am bound by that oath; but there may be cases in which it is not so clear as it is in that case; it may be doubtful, whether the error concerns the substance of the thing, or the accidental quality of the thing; I may make a mistake in my mind; I may think that my error is about the substance when it is only about the quality of the thing; in that case I cannot say that I am not bound by that oath till I consult somebody, and expose to him what was my error; if it is only about the quality, he will say that I am bound by that oath, and I must adhere to it; but if it is about the substance of the thing, or if fraud has been used to induce me to that error, in that case it would be unjust to bind me by such an oath as that.

In a dubious case, such as you have supposed, what is the authority to which the Roman Catholic ought to defer?—In general the Roman Catholic defers to the bishop; first to the priest, and the priest refers him to the bishop, if it is a difficult matter.

Suppose a Roman Catholic were induced to enter into a contract with another man, and to bind himself by an obligation under oath to perform it, and that he afterwards conceived that he was induced to enter into that contract by a false representation, would he consider that as to the question, in point of conscience, and in order to avoid offending God, he was to consult his bishop or priest, but that as to the civil obligation of the contract, he was to leave that to the law of the land?—As to the first part, concerning the oath that he has taken, binding himself to fulfil the conditions of that contract, I think that if the pretended error which he alleges, in order not to be bound by his oath to fulfil the conditions of the contract, only refers to some accidental things, and the substance of the thing is really right, in that case I do not see any reason why he could be discharged of the obligation of adhering to the conditions of the contract; he may after that, if it is a civil contract, refer the oath to the judgment of a lawyer, to see if in that case he has not been imposed upon by the other contracting party, and to get indemnities, as a reparation for the damage that he suffers in adhering to the conditions of that contract, and if the law declares that contract null under such circumstances, he is not bound in conscience to adhere to it. However, many divines will think, that if what he has promised in the contract is a res licita, that on account of the sanctity of the oath he has taken he should adhere to the contract, though he would not be strictly obliged, and that it will be a kind of perjury if he was not to do what he can do on account of that.

Will you state what is laid down in the class-book, as constituting the seventh cause excusing the obligation of an oath?—The seventh cause excusing from the obligation of an oath, is the limitation of the intention of the person who swears, either expressed or tacit, and understood from the disposition of the law, or by custom.

The word which you translate "understood" is "sub intellecta," you will observe, in the original?—"Vel etiam tacita et subintellecta"—"tacita" means the intention that is in the mind of the person that he does not express; and "sub intellecta" may be a thing which the law understands to be always attending such contract. There may be conditions in the contract which are not precisely expressed by the parties, but which the law always supposes supposes to be in such contracts; it is understood by the law that such a thing attaches to it.

If the limitation of the intention of the person swearing is expressed in the oath, of course there can be no difficulty, but the difficulty arises upon these words: "Vel etiam tacita et sub intellecta;" the Commissioners will be obliged to you for an explanation of what you conceive is meant by that?—I conceive, that wherever the law supposes that the intention, though not expressed, was in the mind of the person, and ought to be supposed to be in the mind of the person when he took the oath, in that case, that is what I understand by that "tacita et sub intellecta," because that "et" which is in the connection, supposes that the words "ex dispositione juris," refer to the "tacita" as well as to the "sub intellecta," because the sentence is this: "Vel etiam tacita et sub intellecta ex dispositione, juris vel ex consuetudine;" therefore it supposes that the condition which is tacit or understood, ought to be that kind of internal thing which the law supposes always to exist, or to be understood in the circumstances, though not expressed.

Suppose the case in which the person swearing has not expressed a limitation of his intention, but in which he thinks that that limitation was "tacita et sub intellecta;" but where the person to whom the oath was taken on the other hand differs with him in opinion, by denying that it was "sub intellecta" at all; who is to decide between them?—If it is a contract under the civil law, he must apply to a jurisconsult on the matter, to see whether the law understands such a tacit construction; and if the law does not understand it, if it is not expressed, then he must abide by the law; he cannot be free from his contract.

Suppose a case, in which the law would not interfere to help the person to whom the oath was taken; for instance, suppose the case to be one of what is well understood in the law by the title of "nudum pactum," where the person to whom the oath was taken was to derive a positive benefit, but for which he had given no consideration; in that case, do you think that the person who had sworn to perform the "nudum pactum" would be excused from his oath, as he confessedly is from all legal obligation? To make the question still clearer, suppose that A. has sworn that he will pay 20*l.* to B., B. having given him no value for the same, and therefore the law of the land will not enforce this contract. But yet B. may reasonably expect, by virtue of the oath taken by A., that he shall receive the 20*l.*; suppose that the person swearing in that case, was to say that it was "sub intellecta" between them, that he was not to pay the money; and suppose the person to whom the oath was taken to say that no such thing was understood between them; how is that particular case to be decided, according to the positions laid down in the class-book in your last answer?—I think that in the forum of conscience, the man will be bound to pay the 20*l.* in that case, because, if he has obliged himself by an oath, he knew that the obligation was certainly falling on the expression of what he promised; and if he can pay the 20*l.*, as it is "res licita," of course, "propter reverentiam juramenti," he ought to pay it.

Suppose that the person swearing was to contend, and to be himself conscientiously convinced that it was his "tacita et sub intellecta intentio," to limit his intention in what he had sworn, who is to decide whether he is right or wrong, in your opinion?—In my own mind, I think that the internal intention he had, not to oblige himself by such contract, would not free him from the obligation of adhering to it, because, first, he would have taken a false oath, and he has induced the other into error, if he persuaded him that he engaged himself to pay 20*l.* by the expression of his word, and that he has sworn to fulfil that engagement, while he had an internal intention not to pay it. But, however, I think he is bound to pay it on account of that, because that intention that he has is a fraud on his part; he persuades the other that he entitles him to such a sum of money, whereas, in his mind, he has no intention to bind himself.

Will you state, for the sake of illustration, a case in which the "limitatio intentionis tacita et sub intellecta," would operate as a cause excusing the obligation of an oath?—None occurs to me at present.

Does the condition suppose that it is "sub intellecta" by both the parties to the contract?—That is precisely the meaning of the case; it is a tacit understanding which the law supposes always to take place in similar circumstances; it is from the law and the custom that we are to judge, if such a construction is to be pre-supposed in such cases.

If it is "tacita et sub intellecta" by one party only, it would appear to savour of the nature of reservation; the Commissioners therefore wish to know, whether the words apply to such subject matter, as though not expressed in words, is meant to be matter understood, recognized and comprehended by both parties to whom the oath has reference?—I think it ought to be understood by both parties, so far as to say, that the law and the custom suppose such a thing.

Suppose the party to whom the oath is taken, denies that he understood any such thing; who is to decide between the parties?—I think I can find an example to illustrate it by. Suppose a man buys a horse, he supposes that that horse will be useful to him; it is understood by the law and by the custom, that that horse is sound and free from any essential defect, which would render it useless to him; though that condition is not expressed by either of them, it is understood "ex jure" or by custom, that such a condition is always to take place in a bargain for such an animal, because a man would not buy the horse, if he did not suppose that he would be of some service.

Supposing a person was to let a farm to a man who was to hold it from year to year, and it was generally understood throughout that country, that the farm was to be managed according to what is called the custom of the country, or the husbandry of the country; in that case, although it was not expressly recognized at the time of the letting or taking of the farm, that it was to be managed according to the custom of the country, might it not be held by both parties that it was a condition "tacita et sub intellecta," that the farm was to be so managed and cultivated?—It might; and if the thing was not so done by the tenant, the landlord could break the lease, though he had not expressed that condition; that is an excellent example.

Appendix, N° 23.

Examination of

You have supposed hitherto an oath of mutual contract only, where each party is to give a value; now suppose a case in which all the advantage is confessedly intended to be on one side, that is, on the side of the person to whom the oath is taken; and suppose that the person for whom the oath is taken, denies that there was any limitation of intention "tacita et sub intellecta" between them, but that the person who swore to give the advantage, maintains that there was such a limitation "tacita et sub intellecta," who is to decide between them?—In that case, if there is neither custom nor law which can decide the question, I think that the man who has promised is bound by his promise, and is obliged to make it good, because he has induced the other into error.

Can you suggest to the Commissioners any particular case of your own supposition, that would fully illustrate the nature and extent of this principle?—I think that the example which has been suggested is one of the best that could be hit upon to illustrate the principle; I mean the case where it is understood that it is the custom of the country that such a thing should be done; in that case, though the condition is not expressed, it is sufficiently determined by the custom of the country.

The Commissioners have now disposed of the seven causes "impedientes et excusantes obligationem juramenti;" they now proceed to pass to the five causes that are distinguished as "causæ tollentes obligationem;" that is, as the Commissioners understand it, which admit the obligation to have existed, but which are sufficient to destroy it and take it away?—Yes.

The first of those is defined to be "materiæ mutatio;" will you translate those two words?—Materiæ mutatio consists in this; if the thing which has been sworn changes so much according to the circumstances, that what was possible becomes impossible, or what was useful becomes pernicious; suppose for example, a person had promised to give 100*l.* for any purpose that is "materia licita," but it happens afterwards that a failure comes and he is ruined; it is no more in his power to give this 100*l.* which he has however taken an oath of giving; in that case there is "mutatio materiæ." Suppose again, that I promise to a person under an oath to give him a sword; but I perceive after that, that if I give him that sword, he is going to cut his throat with it, there is "mutatio materiæ;" therefore though I have taken an oath of giving him a sword, I could not in that case, for the present, at least, put it into his hands. Suppose that a man has promised to give 100*l.* in charity, and bound himself by oath to do it, but it happens afterwards that he perceives his affairs are so changed that he cannot give this 100*l.* to the poor, unless he defraud some of his creditors, in that case there is "mutatio materiæ;" because, although the giving this 100*l.* to the poor was a good thing, yet if he gives it now, it will be a fraud upon his creditors.

It is laid down in the book, as one of the species of "materiæ mutatio." "Si res jurata fiet impossibilis vel illicita ob superioris prohibitionem;" will you have the goodness to translate the words "illicita ob superioris prohibitionem?"—That class of cases consists in some persons who have not the full and absolute disposition of the thing they swear to dispose of, but they must obtain the assent of a superior in order for them to perform the engagement they have taken, and the superior refuses his consent, or prohibits the inferior, over whom he has authority, to do such a thing; in that case he cannot fulfil it without disobeying his superior, whom he is bound to obey. Suppose that one of the members of a religious house was to swear to do such a thing, and the superior, hearing of that, sees that the thing will be absolutely pernicious to the community, or will be an extraordinary thing, of course he prohibits it; then it becomes "illicita," not "in se," but "ex auctoritate superioris," and he cannot do it without infringing on the rules of the community, which he has bound himself to obey, and committing a sin.

Do you mean, that the superior of an order of regulars may prohibit an oath taken by one of the regulars, to be observed?—If that oath is contrary to his community, and he is the judge of that, because we suppose that a man who is in a regular order has no will of his own, that his will is identified in some manner with the will of the superior, and he can do nothing of himself.

Does it not follow from that statement, that the superior is the sole judge, whether there exist a sufficient cause for prohibiting an oath taken by a member of his community, to be observed?—With regard to oaths that concern his community, not with regard to oaths that concern other things; but for his community, the superior is to judge of what is pernicious and what is useful to his community.

He is the judge, is he not, whether the thing sworn will be noxious to his community or not?—Yes.

If he chuses to decide, that the performance of the thing sworn will be noxious to his community, are the Commissioners to understand that he may prohibit it?—The obligation is rendered void in that case on this principle, that no man who is in subjection to the will of another, can bind himself independently of his will to do such a thing, because his oath is not an absolute one, but a conditional one; it is "si superior non dissentiat."

But does it not follow, that every oath that is taken by one of the Society of Jesus, for example, necessarily refers itself tacitly to that consent of his superior?—No, it does not follow from that, because if the oath is taken to civil authorities, and on civil concerns, the superior can do nothing with respect to that oath, it is out of his power.

But if the oath be taken either by compulsion to a civil authority, or voluntarily to a third person, person, about something which the superior of the Jesuits considers will be noxious to his community, does it not follow from what you have stated, that the superior may take upon himself to decide that the oath is void?—If the matter sworn by that Jesuit is a matter which is under his own jurisdiction, he can; but if the matter which is the subject of that oath, is not a matter which is subject to the inspection of his superior, he cannot free him from that oath.

Suppose a Jesuit to come before this Board as a witness, and the usual oath is tendered to him to disclose the whole truth, and he is examined as to matters relating to his own community, which it may be very evident, both to him and to his superior, that it might be noxious to that community to disclose, do you conceive that that Jesuit would be bound to state the whole truth, or not?—I think he is bound to do it on those matters which fall under the temporal jurisdiction.

Might not his superior take upon himself in that case to declare, that such disclosure will be noxious to his community, and therefore prohibit him from making it?—That is not sufficient, because he cannot exercise his authority in what concerns the civil power, if the oath is connected with it absolutely.

Suppose further, that the Jesuit should happen to be bound to his superior by an oath not to reveal the secrets of his order, and that he is called upon, before this Board, to reveal them, what is he to do in that case?—In that case I think he is bound to answer to the constituted authorities, because the superior cannot free him from being a subject, and not being able to free him from being a subject, he cannot free him from the obligation of a subject; it seems to me to be so to the best of my judgment.

Do you think that the superior of that order would take the same view of that matter which you have so clearly expressed?—I cannot state whether he would; I suppose he would; but I think we must suppose that they are very rational men, and that they consider themselves as citizens as well as religious, and of course, as citizens, they are obliged to answer to the questions proposed to them, on civil or temporal matters, or on mixed ones, as far as they relate to temporalities, by the established authorities, according to their conscience, without any mental restriction or reservation.

Will you, for the sake of illustration, put a case, in which you conceive that the order of a superior would be sufficient to release a regular under his authority from the obligation of an oath which that person had actually taken?—Suppose that a member of any religious order had bound himself to make an extraordinary fast, different from what is prescribed by the rules of the community; and suppose that the superior judges, that if that person adheres to the obligation which he has taken by oath, of observing that fast, it will disable him from other functions to which he intends to apply him; suppose, for instance, teaching; and that the person will not be able to do justice to his office; the superior, in that case, takes off the obligation of that private engagement, because he, being the superior, ought to wish that every one in his community should perform his duty in the best possible manner; and if a person has, by a private engagement, bound himself to do a thing which will disable him from doing his duty in the best possible manner, in that case I think he could take that obligation from him; because every obligation of that sort, taken in a community, admits of this condition, “si superior non dissentiat,” and therefore admitting that condition, it is understood and admitted by the canon law every where, that in that case the obligation is nothing but a conditional obligation, that the person obliges himself to do it “si superior non dissentiat vel consentiat.”

Do you consider that a member of a religious order, such as that which has been mentioned, is entitled to consider what matters fall within the jurisdiction of his superior, and what do not; or is he bound to receive the declaration of his superior upon that subject without question?—I think every member of a regular community ought to understand what concerns the community, what concerns the obligations of the community, what concerns the matter of that community, and what comes under the cognizance of the superior in religious matters. A superior has no authority out of his own convent.

Is not the example you have put, for the purpose of illustration, rather what you distinguish as a votum than a juramentum?—It is no matter, a promise cum juramento would be the same, because there is no difference; if I take God Almighty for a witness that I will do such a thing, it is the same thing in reality.

By the common law of England, it is part of the King's prerogative, that he may forbid any of his subjects to leave the realm; suppose that any person were to take an oath that he would go to France, and do a certain act, and the King thinks proper to issue an order, which as a subject that person is bound to obey, prohibiting him from going abroad, would you understand in that case that your principle would apply; that the order of his superior binding him, released him from his conscientious obligation of going to France?—Yes; and in that case I think he could not perform his obligation, because the matter is changed, and from being licit before, it has become illicit by the prohibition of the King.

Supposing one person agreed with another to import for him a cargo of silk goods, and that an Act of Parliament passed, prohibiting the importation of silk goods before he could carry into effect the contract he had entered into, would that interference of a superior power be a case to which this cause alludes, in which the oath would not be binding upon the individual who had taken it?—He would not be bound by his oath, because the oath in that case, when it was taken, was about “licitam materiam,” but by that Act of Parliament it has become an illicit act, and no man can bind himself, even by an oath, to do a thing which is illicit.

Rev.F. Anglade, D. D.
31 October 1826.

The second and the third causes taking away the obligation of an oath do not give rise to any particular examination; the second is, "non acceptatio, seu condonatio aut remissio sive expressa, sive tacita, ex parte illius in cuius utilitatem facta est promissio per iuramentum confirmata;" the third is, "si alter non servet promissa;" but the fourth cause stated is one which appears to require considerable explanation; will you define it first in Latin, and then translate it into English?—"Quarta causa est irritatio facta ab eo cui persona iurans, vel materia iuramenti est subjecta," the definition is this; the fourth cause is the making void of the obligation of the oath by the person to whom, either the person who has taken the oath, or the matter concerning which the oath has been taken, is subject.

You will observe the first illustration that is given in the text-book, "thus a superior of an order of regulars may validly, even without cause, make void the oaths of those subject to him?"—I think I have already laid down some principle, in the course of my answers, which clears that matter; because, a person who is in a regular order, as I was saying, cannot take an absolute engagement, without pre-supposing a consent presumed, or granted by the superior; therefore, when he binds himself, after he has made his vows, (I do not now speak of what regards the government of society, but I speak only of the concerns between man and man,) when he makes a promise under oath to any person, in that case his promise includes always the condition, if the superior to whom the person is subject agree to it.

The illustrations you have hitherto given appear to assume, that both the person taking the oath, and the subject matter of the oath, are to be subject to the superior; but the Commissioners beg to point your attention to the all-important word "vel," in the sentence before them; it is not "et," in which case it would mean that both the person swearing and the subject-matter of the oath must be subject to the superior; but it would appear from this, that if either of them are subject to the superior, then he may "validly" and even "without cause" make void the oaths of his subjects?—If a person was to engage himself to do a thing relating to a matter which belongs to me, and which is in my disposition, without my consent, he would be disposing of what is not his own.

Is it not there clearly laid down, that in either of two cases a superior may make void the oaths of his subjects; the first case being, if the person taking the oath is subject to him, and the second case being, if the matter of the oath is subject to him, but the sentence does not suppose it necessary that those two circumstances should combine, in order to confer upon the superior the power of making void the oath?—So I think; but if the Commissioners will read the whole of the paragraph, I think they will see that the different examples which are given illustrate the definition; there are six examples given, "sic superior regularium potest validè, etiam sine causâ, irritare iuramenta subditorum, pater filiorum, maritus uxoris, dominus servi, circa ea quæ eorum potestati subjiciuntur, et iuribus illorum nocent;" suppose a son, who is under the power of his father, was to take an oath to do a thing which will be injurious to the property of his father; for instance, suppose he takes an oath to give charity; as he has no property of his own, of course he will give the charity out of the property of his father; here the matter of the oath is subject to the father, and of course, he can annihilate that oath himself, because as the son cannot take an oath concerning property which is not his own, though he had a very good intention in what he took the oath to do, that is, to relieve the poor, yet he cannot relieve the poor without the consent of his father, and therefore, in that case, the matter is subject to his father; so, likewise, suppose the case of a servant, whose duty it is to do such a work; that servant takes into his head, through devotion, to promise that he will fast three times a week; in that case, the master will suffer by it, because he will not be able to discharge his duty towards him as before; therefore, the master has the power of suspending the obligation of that oath, at least for the time that he is in his service, because the matter of the oath concerns him.

It appears that the reasons you assign are somewhat different from those stated in the text-book itself, and it is rather the meaning of the text-book than your own views that the present question is intended to elicit; the passage in the text-book is as follows, "nam iuramentum non obligat in damnum alterius, et fit sub illa tacita conditione sub intellecta ex ipso iure, nisi contradixerit persona quæ contradicendi jus habet;" will you be so good as to construe that passage into English?—"For the oath does not oblige to the detriment of another person, and it is always meant with that tacit or understood condition by the law, unless the person who has the right of interfering does not oppose himself to the obligation."

It is there laid down, is it not, that it is impossible for an oath to bind "in damnum alterius," as it is expressed, that is, to the detriment of a third person, who is to be the judge in those cases, whether the oath taken is to the detriment of that third person, or not?—That is a matter easily decided; I would not allow the person himself to decide it, because he may be inclined in his own favour, but I would refer him to a prudent person who is not interested in it, and if that person judges that it is "in damnum alterius," the oath in that case is not binding.

You will observe, that in the case put, the third person is supposed by the text-book to be the superior of an order of regulars, and it is laid down that he may make void the oath "validè et etiam sine causâ," that is, without any cause; surely that supposes that he is to be the judge of whether he will do it, or not; for, if he may do it without any reason, it is presumed that he may do it at his own will or pleasure?—The reason that is given in the book is, "nam iuramentum non obligat in damnum alterius;" that would seem to imply, that it must be a consideration always with the superior, that it is detrimental to the community, either as relating to the matter of the oath, or as relating to the subject who has made that oath.

The question is, whether it is not the superior himself who is supposed to pronounce upon that important proposition of whether the thing which has been sworn is to the injury of another or not?—He is; but the superior may commit a great sin, if he invalidates the oath without cause, though the subject is not to decide whether the superior has done it with cause or not.

But still, in the case put, if the superior chooses to take upon himself that responsibility, and to free the person swearing, from his oath, it is here laid down that he may do so, and do so validly?—As the case relates only to religious, it must be observed, that at their profession they bind themselves to follow, in all things lawful, the will of their superior; therefore they cannot enter into any private contracts or engagements, except on the condition that their superior will consent; hence, their contracts and oaths attached to them are not absolute, but depending on the aforesaid condition, which, if it does not take place even without any cause, they become void, and that may be called, irritatio sine causâ.

Now observe these words “et fit sub illa tacita conditione subintellecta ex ipso jure, nisi contradixerit persona quæ contradicendi jus habet;” this passage the Commissioners would translate thus: “that the oath is always taken under this tacit and understood condition, from the nature of law itself, that it is dependent upon the act of the person who has the right of contradicting it;” is that a fair exposition of the meaning of the passage?—I think it is; but that concerns persons who are under the subjection of others, or the matter of whose oath is under the subjection of others, either the one or the other; it cannot concern every one in general, or every oath in general; it is only a particular case.

Of course it is not supposed that the proposition can apply to the world at large, but the Commissioners collect from you, that it is meant to apply to either of two cases; first, if the person swearing is subject to the authority of a superior of an order of Regulars, and secondly, if the subject matter of the oath is subject to him?—Yes.

And that either of those two circumstances will confer upon the superior the power of making void the oath; and that it is not necessary that both those circumstances should combine, in order to produce that result?—Yes, I think so; I think that is the meaning of it.

Are the Commissioners to understand the proposition, about which you are now examined, as meaning simply this; that if a person implicitly bound to obey another, takes an oath, which that other prohibits him from fulfilling, this discharges him from the obligation of the oath, although the person prohibiting him may commit a sin in so prohibiting him?—I think so.

For instance, you have been particularly questioned as to the case of a superior of Regulars; the Commissioners will put a case, not with regard to a superior of Regulars, but with regard to a soldier in the army:—suppose a soldier to swear positively that he will obey his commanding officer in all things, and he enters into an engagement which he thinks his commanding officer will not prevent him from fulfilling; as for instance, he enters into an engagement to do a certain thing at a certain place, on a certain day, and his commanding officer orders him, upon pain of the obedience which he owes to him, to go to another place, are the Commissioners to understand that this order of the commanding officer, although that commanding officer assigns no reason but his pleasure for it being binding upon him, discharges him from his oath?—Yes; because in that case he cannot fulfil his engagement without an act of disobedience; therefore the act which was licit before, on the presumption that the officer would not oppose it, becomes illicit when he opposes it, therefore his oath was conditional.

In the same way a Regular, who swears implicitly to obey his superior, if he enters into an engagement to do a particular act and his superior commands him to do another act, which will prevent him from doing that which he has engaged to do, is discharged by the order of the superior from doing it?—Of course; but in that case I think that he should expose that he has taken that engagement.

Do you understand, if a man is so situated as that he may be prohibited from doing an act which he is going to swear to do, that he is bound to make the party to whom he is giving the oath acquainted with his situation?—I think so.

If he does not do so, but swears to do an act, positively knowing at the same time that he may be prevented from doing it, does he not sin in taking the oath?—He does; he commits a mortal sin in taking in an absolute manner an engagement which he cannot take but in a conditional manner.

Has it ever occurred to you to observe, whether the expression that the Commissioners are now about to read to you is contained in more than one of the bulls of the Popes, bearing directly upon the principle now under consideration: “In omni enim juramento semper debet intelligi jus superioris exceptum?”—That is, that in every oath we ought always to understand that the right of the superior is to be excepted; I think the meaning of that comes exactly to the same doctrine as I have set forth; that in an oath, no person can bind himself to do any thing which will in any way go against the right of his superior, and therefore, if any person were to swear absolutely that he would do such a thing, knowing, however, that what he swore could be excepted to by the superior, or was against the right of the superior, that man will commit a perjury; because he cannot bind himself to do in an absolute manner what does not depend entirely for the execution on his own will, but depends on the consent of another.

Examination of

When any person properly subjected to the Pope, takes an oath which the Pope himself may consider as contrary to his own rights, who is to be judge of whether that oath is to bind his subject or not?—I think that a Catholic cannot take any other judgment but that of the Pope, in the ordinary course of things, because there is no lawful authority visible but that of the Pope in that case. I think he could not be bound by that oath, because the oath always includes “salvo jure superioris,” if the superior thinks, therefore, that his right is infringed upon by the oath, in that case it is evident that the obligation of the oath cannot be binding.

You will observe that in the case put, the saving of the right of a superior is not expressed; the expression is “semper debet intelligi,” the question refers to a case in which nothing is expressed in the oath, saving the right of the superior; are the Commissioners to understand, that even in those cases, the right of the superior is tacitly saved?—I think that is expressed sufficiently in the first case that was discussed; because I have said that when the ground of excuse is a tacit exception, or an understood exception, that tacit exception, or that understood exception, is not to be determined by the person who has taken the oath, but “ex dispositione juris vel ex consuetudine,” and therefore when it is said that “in omni enim juramento semper debet intelligi jus superioris exceptum,” it is understood by every one.

The Commissioners beg that you will understand the question that is now about to be put, as being purely of an hypothetical nature, and for the mere sake of trying the principle, and not as implying that such a supposition as it assumes, is at all likely to be realized; but if a Pope hereafter should consider any thing in the Roman Catholic's oath of allegiance to the King, to be at variance with his own rights and prerogatives, who is to be the judge between the Pope and the Catholic taking the oath, of whether the Pope's view of that matter is a sound one, or the reverse?—This is a case in which certainly the Pope is not to be the only judge, because it is a thing of general concern; it is not a matter of one individual who takes an oath to another, but it is the concern of the several nations who take the oaths of allegiance. I think that we should in that case defer to the opinion of the Bishops, who are less concerned than the Pope in the question, and that the Universities and the Church at large should be consulted upon it; their decision will terminate the difference in that case, as was done when they questioned the Universities about the oath of allegiance which was taken to His Majesty in this kingdom; before that oath was taken, the different Universities were consulted. Sometimes the exceptions which the Pope makes, are not so much on his right, but on some expressions which are perhaps too strong, perhaps making it as if it was a decision of what is uncontroverted.

The extract from the Pope's Bull, to which your attention has been called, is in these words: “In omni enim juramento semper debet intelligi jus superioris exceptum,” are the Commissioners to understand by this, that if a person owes lawful obedience to any particular person when he takes an oath, it must always be understood that the oath which he takes, is to be received as compatible with that duty of obedience?—That depends on the person to whom he takes that oath, because the superiority of that person may entirely supersede the authority of the other.

You were asked in a former part of your examination, whether if a British subject, who being bound to obey his King in remaining at home, if the King commands him to remain at home, takes an oath, by which he binds himself to do a particular act, that oath is to be understood with the exception of the obedience which he owes to the King; so that if the King calls upon him to perform a duty, which the obedience he owes to the King imposes, he must perform it; do you understand that to be the principle laid down in that extract?—That is included, the same as the other.

In the extract which is read to you, it is declared, that every oath is to be understood as containing a saving of the right of the superior; do you understand that as meaning this, that if any person promises to do an act, with which act the duty he owes to his superior may interfere, it is to be understood in the taking of that oath, that he excepts his duty to his superior?—Yes.

That is the principle you understand as there laid down?—Yes.

For instance, the Catholics owe, as you conceive, spiritual obedience to the Pope in spiritual matters, and the Catholics swear allegiance to the King, and in swearing allegiance to the King, distinctly declare, that they are Roman Catholics, so that it is understood that they recognize the spiritual power of the Pope; therefore in swearing full and true allegiance to the King, do you conceive that this is to be understood as not clashing with the obedience which they owe to the Pope in spirituals?—I do.

But they are to be understood as making an exception, not of obedience to any order which the Pope may think proper to pronounce, but of obedience to any order in its own nature lawful and just, being an exercise of lawful spiritual means for the purpose of effecting a spiritual end?—Yes.

The case has been supposed of two conflicting obligations towards two different superiors; in such a case as that, whom do you consider to be the judge of the superiority of the person to whom the obligation is due, or in other words, of the pre-eminence of the two several obligations?—That will vary according to whether it is on spiritual or on temporal matters, or according to whether the superiors are one of them spiritual and the other temporal, or whether they are both spiritual or both temporal. If there is a conflict between the temporal and the spiritual power, we must in that case refer to the subject to which the oath relates; if the matter of the oath is of a spiritual nature, certainly in that case I must obey the spiritual power; if it is of a temporal nature, I must obey the temporal power; because because I know that the two powers are distinct in their institution, in their object, and in their end; and of course, if it is evident that the matter which is the subject of the oath, is the concern of the one rather than of the other, I must refer to the authority which is invested with power in that matter, and the other has nothing to do with it.

Rev.
F. Anglade, D. D.

ARE we to understand from your former answers, that you consider that the principle laid down in the extract from the Pope's bull, which was read to you, namely, that in every oath an exception of the right of the superior is always to be understood, is the same principle which is laid down in the class-book of Maynooth?—I suppose it is; that is the principle maintained, that in every oath we take, we must always suppose that the right of the superior is not to be injured by it: that principle is as good for the civil order as it is for the ecclesiastical order. If I take a civil obligation by an oath, I cannot take a second oath after that, "nisi salvo jure superioris."

When it is intended that there should be any saving or reservation in any oath, do you not think it would be much more convenient that it should be expressed, than that it should be tacitly understood?—As I observed yesterday, that tacit understanding is only permitted in the case when that tacit understanding is admitted by the law, and I mentioned some examples yesterday to that purpose.

Who is to determine in such cases, first, as to the fact of there being a superior whose right is to be tacitly saved, secondly, as to his having any right, and thirdly, as to the extent of his right?—First, as to the determining who is the superior, I think that is nothing but a matter of fact; but, however, as there may be a superior in temporalities, and a superior in spiritualities, I would examine what is the nature of the subject, to see to which superior it belongs, and from the nature of the matter, I could determine whether it is of the competence of the civil superior, or of the competence of the ecclesiastical superior.

But who is to decide as to the extent of the superior's right; is it the superior himself, or the person taking the oath, or the person to whom the oath is taken?—From the matter of the oath, I think it is determinate sufficiently; if it is in spiritual matters, we know what is the order of the superior in spiritual matters; we know likewise in temporal matters what is the order of our superiors.

Do you consider it as a matter of easy ascertainment, and quite obvious, whether any certain subject matter falls under the denomination of things temporal or things spiritual?—I think so; except sometimes on mixed matters, which may belong to two different authorities, but then the civil authority has a right on that matter as far as it refers to temporalities, and the spiritual authority has a right over the same matter as far as it relates to spiritualities; such as in marriage, which is a contract both civil and religious with us; that contract, as far as it is civil, belongs to the legislature to pronounce on it, and as far as it is spiritual, it belongs to the church to pronounce on it, which is the same; but, except in mixed matters, other matters are sufficiently determinate by themselves.

We beg to direct your attention to the following passage in the oath of a Roman Catholic bishop to the Pope, "the counsel which they," that is the Pope's, "shall entrust me withal by themselves, their messengers or letters, I will not knowingly reveal to their prejudice;" now, if the improbable case should arise, that a Pope should entrust a bishop with counsel, which his oath to the Pope should bind him to conceal, but which his oath to the King should bind him to reveal, what is he to do?—In matters of that sort, I will examine whether the matter is of the competence of the Sovereign, or of the competence of the church; if it is of the competence of the Sovereign, then his oath to the Pope could not bind him, because an oath cannot bind against the common good.

Suppose the improbable case of some future Pope, wishing to excite in this Country a political movement against the Established Church, and communicating with a Roman Catholic bishop upon that subject, do you conceive that that would be a counsel which the Roman Catholic bishop would be bound by his oath to the Pope to conceal, or by his oath to the King to reveal; observe, that his oath to the King is this, "I will do my utmost endeavour to disclose and make known to His Majesty all treasons and traitorous conspiracies which may be formed against him or them?"—In that case, if what has been communicated to the bishop, were of such a nature as to subvert, or do any harm to the social order, and not merely confined to those things which nobody can bind themselves not to do, by means of exhorting, and by means of preaching, and announcing which will cause no disturbance in the social order; I think, if he was to cause by that means any confusion in the social order, or if he could presume that it would be caused by it, in that case, the bishop would be bound to reveal it, and not to conceal it.

When you say, by preaching and exhortation, you mean that preaching and exhortation should be confined to the explanation of such truths as would influence the mind in favour of the doctrine taught, you do not go the extent of meaning, that the preaching and exhortation might go to induce persons to resist the civil power, or to take up arms?—Not in that manner, by any means; that would be contrary precisely to my answer.

Does not a Roman Catholic contract a duty of allegiance to his King before he, by becoming an ecclesiastic, and taking the oath of a bishop, contracts any duty with the Pope by virtue of that oath?—That is exactly true, because he is a citizen before he is a priest, and being a citizen, he is bound by the laws of the state, before he is bound by the laws of that order and state of life that he embraces, and therefore the obligations of the state of life that he embraces cannot interfere with his obligations as a citizen, so as to paralyze the promises or the engagements that he has taken as a citizen.

—Then, according to the principle which is stated in the bull of the Pope, to which your attention has been called, the oath of obedience which he takes to the Pope, in his character of a bishop, must be understood as being taken without prejudice to the duty which he owes to the king as his lawful temporal superior?—It comes to the principle, “salvo jure superioris.”

Is it not a rule, that no engagement which you can enter into, which is to the prejudice of the moral law, or the law of nature, as given by God, can be binding?—It cannot be binding against the law of God, nor against the law of nature.

—Therefore, any oath of obedience that you take, to whomsoever that oath may be taken, is always to be understood without prejudice to the law of God?—To be sure.

We beg to direct your attention to another passage in the bishop's oath to the Pope, “I will not be in any counsel, action or treaty in which shall be plotted against our said Lord (meaning the Pope) and the said Roman church, any thing to the hurt or prejudice of their persons, right, honour, state or power; and if I shall know any such thing to be treated or agitated by any whatsoever, I will hinder it to my power, and as soon as I can, will signify it to our said Lord, or to some other by whom it may come to his knowledge;” does it not follow from that clause in the oath, that if any secret of a Sovereign should come to the knowledge of a Roman Catholic bishop, which it might be necessary for the Pope's safety or power to know, that he should communicate it to the Pope?—In a case like that, I could not precisely pronounce without reflection, because I think that the oath to the Pope cannot bind him, except in what are considered spiritual subjects; that it cannot bind him at all as to temporal concerns, because he has no power or authority on temporal concerns, and, I think, that in that case, I would understand that which is required from him as an oath, as relating only to spiritual things, and not to temporal concerns; because, I think, from the principle, that the two powers are perfectly distinct, both in their institution and in their object; I cannot bind myself to an authority who has only power on spiritual matters for temporalities; the same as I could not bind myself to a temporal power concerning spiritual things; that is not against my oath of allegiance, I hope, because I am very faithful and loyal, but I say, that if there was any thing in my oath which would include that, I will promise to do something against my religious tenet; I do not take it in that sense, because I do not acknowledge the supremacy of the Sovereign in spiritual matters.

Are you clearly of opinion that it does not follow from that oath, that the bishop must conceal from his Sovereign any thing that it would be injurious to the Pope that his Sovereign should know?—I think so, if it is in temporal things.

Suppose a bishop or priest should learn that the Pope was encouraging a conspiracy in this country against His Majesty's Crown, the Pope for instance being in league with any foreign Sovereign against this country, would it not be the bounden duty of a bishop who came to the knowledge of that conspiracy, to disclose the circumstance to the King, always excepting what he knows in the sacred confession?—I think in that case he will be obliged to do it.

The Commissioners would beg to refer you to these words of the bishop's oath; “I will help them to defend and keep the Roman Papacy, and the Royalties of Saint Peter, saving my order, against all men,” what do you understand by “the Royalties of Saint Peter?”—I suppose it is the Supremacy of the Pope and the privileges attached to his See, because the Pope being a sovereign in temporal matters in his own dominion, I think I would in so far be bound to him for temporal as well as for spiritual things, because the two powers are united in him in regard to that kingdom; but out of that kingdom it will be different, and I think the oath will not go further than that; I will preserve the spiritual privileges of the Pope by spiritual means, and by exertions, but nothing in contradiction to the obedience and to the duty of a citizen; I think it never goes further than that.

The “Royalties of Saint Peter” in your opinion mean, first, the patrimony of Saint Peter, and secondly, the spiritual privileges of the Pope?—I think so, nothing more.

Was there not an addition made to the oath taken by bishops to the Pope by the late Pope Pius the 6th to the following effect: “All and every of these things I will observe the more inviolably, as being certain that nothing is contained in them which can interfere with the fidelity I owe to the most serene King of Great Britain and Ireland, and his successors to the throne?”—That clears the matter entirely.

Does not that addition leave it still undefined what is the extent of the fidelity which is there admitted to be due?—The fidelity is that which is contained in the oath of allegiance; for every thing which is civil and temporal they owe obedience to their King and Sovereign, and therefore that exception being made, the Pope cannot require any thing in the oath but what is consistent with the fidelity they owe to their Sovereign.

We were supposing yesterday, the case of a monk or regular clergyman having taken an oath, which was afterwards made void by the order of his superior, given as is expressed in the Class Book of Maynooth, page 121 “etiam sine causa;” were the Commissioners to collect from your answers upon that subject, that you conceived that the inferior violating his oath, would be absolved from the guilt of it; but that the guilt of it would be transferred to the superior who caused him to break it?—As to the first part of the question, whether whether the superior could, in that case, make void the oath which has been taken by his inferior, it will require a little observation; because, if that oath was made by that inferior, previous to his entering into the community, and that oath concerns the civil authority, I do not think it is in the power of the superior to free him in that case, because he was a citizen before he was a monk, and becoming a monk, he does not cease to be a citizen; and of course if he had taken the oath of allegiance or any oath connected with it, it is out of the power of the superior in any case to absolve him from that oath; when it is said that a superior can absolve an inferior from any oath, it is supposed that that oath was taken after having entered into religion and made a profession, because if he is a novice and has not yet made a profession, the superior has no power of annihilating his obligation in any way; but when he has become a member of the community, then he is under the jurisdiction of the superior, and being under his jurisdiction, the canon law supposes that the will of an inferior in a religious community is so blended with the will of the superior, that he cannot take an absolute oath for things concerning the community; the oath he takes is always conditional, and therefore when the superior frees him from it, in that case there is no sin imputable to himself; but if the superior does it without reason, or without a cause, the sin is imputable to the superior, but the inferior is not to judge his superior in that.

The question now put does not relate to the oath of allegiance, but it is meant to confine it to the oath taken by a monk to his neighbour about some civil matter; suppose the monk to have made a profession before he takes the oath to his neighbour, is it not laid down in the Class Book that even in such case the superior may absolve his inferior from the obligation of the oath?—I do not think it can be applied to that case; if the matter of the oath is one which the inferior could dispose of without the consent of the superior; in that case, I think that the superior could not free him, because what we call the making void an oath, can never be made cum detrimento tertiæ personæ; that is, where the interest of a third person is concerned, the oath cannot be made void, unless it is proved, either that there was a want of liberty in the making of it, or that there was fraud or error quoad substantiam, as I expressed yesterday; but if it is a matter which is not at all connected with the interest of a third person, or if he has taken an oath to a third person about things that were not absolutely of his disposal, though with the consent of the superior, he could do it; the consent of the superior being refused, that will annihilate it.

Suppose a regular professed in Dublin, were to take an oath to his neighbour that he would go to Cork, and execute some confidential business for him, could the superior absolve him from that oath?—I think so, for this reason; because the inferior has not the command of his actions, he has by a vow of obedience engaged himself to do nothing but by the will of his superior, and if he has made an engagement of that sort without consulting his superior, he has pledged himself in a res illicita.

Would there not in the case put be a sin committed somewhere?—There would be a sin committed by the very inferior who would have taken absolutely upon himself that obligation upon oath, knowing that his will is subject to the will of his superior.

Would there be any sin imputable to the superior in that case if, sine causa, he ordered him to violate that oath?—If, without any cause, he were to do it, I think there would be a sin on him so far as related to the interest of that third person in favour of whom that journey to Cork was to be taken.

The Commissioners will be obliged to you to trace out the limits of the obedience by which a regular is bound to his superior, that is, in what things the superior can command him, and to what extent the power of the superior goes?—The power of the superior is always within the limits of justice and civil obedience; he cannot command his subjects to do any thing which can be against the law of God, or any thing which will be against the social order, because the vow of obedience is always to submit to the will of his superior; “salvis juribus aliorum et salvo lege Dei et salvo lege naturali,” but he may command him in his own department in every thing which relates to the religious order; as if his employment is teaching or instructing, he can regulate what is to be done by him; he can even impose penances—if he wishes him to go from one religious house to another of the same order, the inferior ought to obey, in that he has no will of his own—wherever the thing which is commanded is licit by the law of God, and not against the civil laws of the land, nor against the laws of the order to which he belongs, in that case he is obliged to obey.

Could he, for instance, send him from hence to China?—He can, in some orders; it depends on the extent of their vow, because their obedience is only according to the rules; if it is the rule of the community that the regular is to go to China, if ordered, he must go.

Could the superior of a Franciscan or Dominican convent in this country command one of his inferior regulars to go from hence to China; supposing that regular was extremely averse to the journey, would he be at liberty to refuse undertaking it?—No, he could not, he must go; he can remonstrate, but if his representation is not attended to, he must go, if it is according to the rules of those orders.

Suppose that he desired him to set out upon the journey barefoot, and to endeavour to perform it over-land?—He would be obliged to do it, if it was possible to do it; he is bound to pay strict obedience in what is possible, and consisting with the rule; in that consists the sacrifice they make.

Suppose he desired him to undertake that journey barefoot, and without any money, or any other provision for his journey, must he undertake it?—He must do it, I believe, if he is a Franciscan especially, because they live by alms, and the Dominicans do also; and he must trust to Providence.

Appendix, N^o 24.Examination of
Rev.F. Anglade, D. D.
1 November 1826.

If he desired him to carry a message from him to Rome, it is presumed he must do it likewise?—I think so, because he cannot know what is the content of the message; but if it was a message which was manifested to contain any thing which is contrary to the Government, he could not do it, because it would be unlawful; in general it is true that he must go; but, if after that, it happened that the Sovereign interfered and prohibited him to go, although his message had nothing against law, he must stay, because he would be acting against authority if he went.

Suppose the superior were to assign to him any corporal penance which he were to desire his inferior to inflict upon himself every morning?—He must do it, if such be the rules of his order.

Supposing the penance were to go to such extent as to endanger life or limb?—He is not obliged to do it, because he has not the disposal of his life, and that would be an irrational order, it would be against the law of nature and the law of God; if he had committed a great crime, which in fact would deserve a civil punishment, it may be that he will command a little more severe punishment than is ordinary, but in general I do not think they ever go to that extent.

Supposing he were to desire him to read through some extremely voluminous work, omitting all other business, except such as might be absolutely indispensable, till it were accomplished?—I think, in that case, he must do it; but I must observe, that by the rules, there are offices to be performed which are prescribed by the rules of the community, and he cannot dispense with those rules.

Suppose he were to desire him to apply every moment that could be spared from those offices, and other necessary avocations, to reading through a very voluminous work, not relating to religion, would he be obliged to obey; the question is put merely for the sake of illustrating the principle?—I think he should obey, provided there was nothing in the work against good morals, or against social order.

If he should be prohibited by his superior from reading a particular book without assigning any cause for it, must he obey?—Yes, he must.

Might he prohibit him from reading any work at all?—He might, except what is prescribed by the rules; but those are cases which in general are never realized, because we must suppose that the superior is a reasonable man; they generally choose a person that has some recommendation for good sense, which makes him better qualified for the office than any other.

We beg to put another question for the illustration of the principle; if the superior were to desire the inferior to apply himself to any particular trade, and to make himself master of it, would he be bound to obey?—If it is consistent with the rules; in fact there are communities in which they are obliged to apply to some mechanical work. The Carthusians, for example, which I am acquainted with pretty well, because I have visited them pretty often; the Carthusians, I believe, are to devote every day a couple of hours to menial work, they are supplied with every tool they desire, and choose what employment they please, either to be turners or carpenters, or any thing else; and they have likewise a little garden which they are bound to cultivate for a certain period every day; but I must observe, that if the superior was entirely to abuse his authority, the inferiors can represent to the general of the order; they have what is called a commissio generalis to which representations are made, and of course, I think any abuse would be redressed; but, however, the person in the mean while, is obliged to obey, as far as the mandatum can be executed by him; if he asked him to do a thing that was impossible, of course it could not be obeyed.

There are some religious houses in this country in which there are superiors resident, are there not?—They have always a general superior abroad; but they have superiors here in every community I think.

An obedience, such as you have described, is due from an inferior regular in this country, to his superior in this country?—Yes, I suppose, because I am not acquainted with their particular rules.

Is there the same sort of obedience due by the superiors in this country to the general of the order abroad?—I think there is; they are obliged to make statements of their community, how their community is going on, and what are the numbers, and all those things.

According to the rule of the Roman Catholic church, has the general abroad the same power of command over the superiors of religious houses in this country that the superior of a religious house in this country has over his inferiors in this country?—I think he has, and he could remove them if he pleased.

Could the general of an order at Rome order any particular superior in this country to quit this country and to go to Rome?—I think he could, but always salvo jure.

By salvo jure you mean if the King does not prohibit it?—Yes.

Where does the general of the Franciscans live?—I think in Rome.

Where does the general of the Dominicans live?—At Rome, I believe.

Where does the general of the Augustinians live?—I think at Rome.

Where does the general of the Jesuits live?—I think at Rome.

Are there not all those four orders existing in this country?—I think so, as far as I can know; but I cannot say precisely with respect to the Jesuits; but I think the others exist in this country.

Will you explain the nature of your doubt with respect to the existence of the Jesuits in this country?—Because I have no legal proof that they are Jesuits.

Have you any doubt, that there are existing in this country, and in the neighbourhood of Maynooth, persons who have been professed Jesuits?—It is matter of opinion, it is presumed that they are; but I have no legal proof that they are.

Is not the oath of obedience to the 'general' more strict and comprehensive in the order of the Jesuits, than in any of the other orders that have been mentioned?—I am not acquainted sufficiently with their constitution to be able to give any answer to that question. In France I know there has been a good deal of calumny spread about them; but I cannot tell what is the truth about them, because I am not certain that I was born when they were suppressed.

Can you inform the Commissioners whether the regulars of the Franciscan, the Dominican, and Augustinian orders, take an oath of obedience to the Pope, as well as an oath of obedience to their own superiors?—I could not state that.

In page 125, of the Class Book, we find these words: "Requiritur ad votum ut sit de meliori bono;" they will beg of you to translate those words?—"It is required for a vow (to be a regular vow) that it should have for its object something which it is better to do than to omit."

That is as here expressed, "actio quam, spectatis omnibus, melius est fieri quam non fieri?"—Yes, "spectatis omnibus."

According to the distinctions laid down in this book, is celibacy a "melius bonum," as compared with marriage?—So we consider it, as it is more difficult and perfect to observe chastity than to marry.

Is the monastic state considered a melius bonum, as compared with the ordinary civil state?—It is considered as a more perfect state of life, because in the monastic profession they are obliged not only to observe the commands of God, but the counsels of the Gospel.

Is it considered as an act positively meritorious, or conducing in any way to salvation, to embrace a monastic life?—I think it is a more perfect state of life, because, from what I said just now of the perfect obedience which they are obliged, by their vow to pay, in the different circumstances that I was discussing, it is evident that a man must have great courage to take a vow of such an obedience as that; it is a blind obedience almost; and there is, besides, the vow of poverty. They have no property of their own; even if they were to make a little thing, they cannot dispose of it without the consent of the superior; and even the furniture of their cell the superior can take away; and, perhaps, when they have taken some pains in making their cell a little more tolerable, he can take them out of that cell, and put them into another. Their great submission to the will of another is a very great merit; and living destitute not only of riches, but of any affection to any property, is a great perfection.

Do you conceive there is a positive merit in submitting one's own will to the will of another human creature?—I think it is a great merit, if it is for the love of God.

Will you explain first what you mean by merit?—That is to say, that a man must take a great deal upon himself to take such an engagement as that, and that when he does it for the glory of God, as an act of humanity, or to do penance for his sins, I consider there is a great merit in doing it.

By merit, do you understand that he thereby entitles himself in any way to salvation?—I do not mean that by this alone he is entitled to salvation, but that through the merits of Christ and his grace, it will contribute much to salvation. However, a man may forfeit salvation in religion as well as out of it, because, if he has more opportunities of serving God, and does not profit by those opportunities, he becomes more guilty in the eyes of God; and therefore what might not be a sin in a man living in the world, may be a sin for him.

Does it not follow, then, that the more unlimited is his vow of obedience, the greater is his merit?—I think so; the sacrifice is more generous, and of course it requires the greater grace of God, and more fortitude to submit one's self to it.

In page 140 of the Class Book, De Præceptis Decalogi, the Commissioners find this proposition generally laid down in these words: "Propositio existit in ecclesia potestas dispensandi in votis et juramentis;" will you construe that proposition?—"There is in the church a power of dispensing in vows and oaths."

Immediately following the proposition are these words: "this is proved first from the Scripture, 18 Matthew; 'Whatever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven;'" and it is added, "these words, inasmuch as they are general, do not only signify the power of loosing the obligations of sins, but also of vows and of oaths;" is not that a correct translation?—Quite so.

Is it meant distinctly by that position, that the word "solveritis" there intimates a power conveyed by Christ to absolve from oaths?—I think so in the position.

Is that your own opinion?—There are two opinions amongst the divines; we acknowledge in the church the power of dispensing in oaths and vows. Some divines are of the opinion that is stated here; some others say that the dispensing power of the church does not amount to more than a mere interpretation of the oath or vow; that it is a declaratoria potestas, or the power of declaring, in certain cases—that, considering the circumstances of the subject, who has made the vow, and the circumstances in which he has made it, and the object of that vow; in that case, in the opinion of the church, the person is not bound by such a vow. Those divines say that the church has not the power of annihilating that vow or that oath, but only of explaining that in such circumstances neither the vow nor the oath induces an obligation.

Does not it come exactly to the same thing, that the person who has taken the oath is not obliged to observe it?—As to him it is the same, but as to the church it is very different; because in one case it takes off the obligation by its own power, in the other it supposes

Appendix, N° 24.

Examination of
Rev.F. Anglade, D.D.

the obligation of the vow, but supposes that in that circumstance that obligation does not bind.

Is it not also exactly the same thing in the result to the person for whose benefit the oath was taken, whether the person taking the oath gets rid of it in the shape of a declaration, or in the shape of annihilating the obligation?—It comes to the same.

How do those divines, who, you say, consider it only as a declaratory power, interpret the words “Quæcumque solveritis”?—They do not make use of that proof.

They do not hold, then, that that passage meant to extend to oaths?—No; they suppose that the ecclesiastical superior of the church has the power to explain how far the natural law obliges his children in this and in that circumstance, and then the case is laid before him; and the superior pronounces, in that case, whether the oath is binding by the natural law or not.

The author of this Class Book clearly does not agree with that class of divines?—In another place he says that many divines say that the power of the church is merely potestas declaratoria.

But it is the same in result?—It is the same in the result; he professed that opinion, perhaps, as being more general; but one may hold either of the two opinions.

Of the two opinions, that the power of the church is either a declaratory power, or an absolving power?—Yes, it is balanced between the two classes of divines; those who say that it is a declaratory power, say that the obligation of an oath and of a vow, is an obligation jure naturali, and that no power on earth can take off that obligation which is founded on the natural law; but at the same time that it is reasonable to suppose that even the natural law in its consequences may admit of interpretation, to examine if any particular case is a case in which the obligation is binding or not.

Which of the two opinions does the Class Book used at Maynooth embrace?—My opinion is, that it is declaratoria potestas, and it is what I teach; but I am obliged to expose the two opinions. A professor is always obliged in his class, if there are different opinions of theologians, to expose the opinions on both sides.

Is not the opinion of the Class Book different from yours?—It is so far.

Does not it lay down, that it is a power of absolving, and not a declaratory power?—It does.

Do not the opinions come exactly to the same result, whether it is arrived at by declaration or by absolution, namely, that the person having taken the oath, may be released from the obligation of it by the church?—I think so.

There is another proof given of this proposition in the Class Book, in addition to the first; the second is “ex perpetuo ecclesiæ usû,” is it your opinion that that perpetual usage has prevailed?—I think the custom is to consider that it is an absolving power, but a custom of the church may take place though it is founded only on a probable opinion; it is not necessary that the opinion should be absolutely given as certain, in order that a practice should take place in the church.

By whom in the church is that power to be exercised, whether it be a declaring power or an absolving power?—There are different cases; in some cases it belongs to the bishops, in some others it belongs to the Pope; for example, there is the vow of perpetual chastity, that nobody can relieve from but the Pope; there is likewise the vow of pilgrimage to Jerusalem which only the Pope can dispense from, and there are likewise vows of three or four other pilgrimages; to St. James the Apostle, and to Rome, and to the tombs of the Apostles, which are reserved to the Pope; but in all dubious cases, for example, in the case of an imperfect vow of chastity, though perpetual, it belongs to the bishop.

Does it appear to you, that the positions in the Class Book, which have been just stated, are reconcileable with the declaration in the oath of allegiance, to this effect: the person taking the oath testifies and declares, without thinking that he is or can be acquitted before God and man, or absolved from this declaration, although the Pope, or any other person or persons should dispense with or annul the same. You will observe, that the question assumes that the Roman Catholic is quite right and sincere in making that declaration, but how is it possible, assuming that, to come to the conclusion that the Class Book is not egregiously wrong?—The Class Book is not at all wrong, though that position is admitted, because the Class Book makes the exception that whenever the common good is concerned, no power can dispense with the oath.

Will you point out that exception in the Class Book?—In page 121, “Dixi juramenta soli deo facta; quia juramentum promissorium sicut votum factum in utilitatem tertii et ab eo acceptatum, generatim non potest sine ejus consensu relaxari, nec commutari etiam in melius a superiore: quia alter per acceptationem ad rem promissam jus acquisivit.”

Does not the paragraph which you consider as the exception, qualifying the general rule, occur twenty pages before the rule itself in the Class Book?—It does.

Do you find in the passage of the Class Book, where the proposition itself is laid down in the general manner that has been above stated, any qualification whatever of the universality of its application?—It could be applied in so far if it is a question of a vow in which another person is concerned, and much more if the community is concerned, if the civil existence is concerned, in that case, there is no power upon earth that can dispense from the oath, because it is founded in a natural right.

We beg of you to observe, that even in the paragraph which you consider as forming the exception to the general proposition, that the church may absolve, it is stated that there are again four cases of exception to that exception, and in which a promise even accepted by another may be relaxed or commuted; and the authority of Saint Thomas is quoted for the four cases—the first exception is where it is doubtful, whether the oath is valid or not valid,

valid, or whether the thing promised is lawful or not lawful; secondly, where there is a question about the common good, which ought to be preferred to the private. The third exception, is the punishment of some crime committed by him who has accepted the oath, if the question is about a matter that is subjected to a superior; and the fourth exception, is by reason of some injury offered to the swearer, as if an oath had been extorted from him by fear or fraud, in those cases an oath may be dispensed with, even without the consent of the third person. We now beg to ask your view of those cases, where it is doubtful whether the oath is valid or not valid, in such cases, Saint Thomas lays it down that the superior may dispense with the oath?—Because in that case the reason which Saint Thomas had is this, that, as it is a question of a thing which has been promised for the utility of another, it will be of course a hard case that a man should be bound by such a promise towards another, if there is a doubt whether he has made the promise, or whether he has taken the oath or not.

Who is to be the judge whether the oath is valid or not valid?—I think it is always the superior that determines on the matter of an oath; if it is a temporal matter it ought to be decided whether such an oath is a valid one by persons who are acquainted with the law, and who understand what the law will think of such an oath in such a case.

Does it not follow from those premises, that the Pope in any case where he thinks an oath not valid may dispense with it?—The Pope or other superior could dispense with an oath of that sort, if it is dubious, without the consent of the person to whom the promise has been made, because if there is a reason to doubt whether a person has made a valid oath or not, a person cannot be obliged, propter juramentum, unless it is certain that he has taken juramentum, or when it is as probable that he may not have taken it, as that he may have taken it.

In the case put, it is the Pope himself who is to decide whether there is that doubt or not?—Yes.

If the oath relate to spiritual matters?—Yes; if it does not relate to spiritual matters, it must be compromised by jurists.

Can you show one word in the Class Book that confines the proposition to spiritual matters?—The nature of the power of the church is about spiritual concerns and not about temporal concerns; if the oath was about temporal concerns, a jurist would be competent to pronounce whether the oath was valid or not.

Being certain that such is the interpretation which you put upon the subject matter of these questions, the Commissioners would wish to ask you whether there is one word in the Class Book of Maynooth that takes the distinction you are now stating?—There is only the general principle which the author states that the power of the church is merely spiritual; he maintains the same principle as Dr. Delahogue, it is not in my province to teach that part; it is only the moral questions that I teach; but I conclude from his principles, which I think I know sufficiently, that it is an inference to be made from those principles.

Do you any where, in the course of your lectures, say anything about the oath of allegiance?—Only under the general denomination.

In the whole of the treatise that relates to the dispensing power of oaths, is there any allusion whatever to any exception to that power, or is there any limitation of it to subjects of a spiritual nature?—I do not think I have met with one myself; I cannot say for certain whether there is or not, but I never met with any special exception.

First of all in page 121, of the Class Book, you shew in what cases the obligation of an oath may be taken away, and in shewing those cases, you mention a dispensation from a superior as one, do you not?—Yes.

Then immediately after stating that the obligation of an oath may be taken away by a dispensation, you distinctly confine the power of dispensation to dispensations which shall not affect a promise made to, or a contract entered into with another?—Yes.

In the part of the work to which you have been lately examined, in page 140, you state that a power of dispensation exists in the church in votis et juramentis?—Yes.

You state first, that an oath may be dispensed with, provided it does not violate certain rules, and then afterwards you state that the power of dispensation is in the church, do you not?—Yes.

Then from the whole, is not the principle to be extracted this, that as to such matters as you have previously stated, you may be dispensed from by a superior; where the Pope is your superior, as he is in spirituals, he may dispense with an obligation?—Yes.

The Commissioners have not the least doubt that that is your own doctrine, but the question is, whether it is the doctrine of the Class Book?—I think there is a place where it says, that both the juramentum and the votum are on the same level with regard to that, and that what is said of the one, must be said of the other.

Are not the circumstances under which a dispensation may be granted or not, stated in pages 144, 145 and 146, as follows:

“ Quæres 4^o. An Romanus Pontifex a solemnî religionis vel castitatis perpetuæ voto dispensare possit?—R. cum S. Antonino et aliis contra Thomistas, S. Pontificem id posse. 1^o. Sequentes recensentur, videlicet honor Dei; utilitas ecclesiæ; commune bonum reipublicæ vel societatis, ut cum per matrimonium sedandæ sunt lites quæ familias dividunt, vel conservanda est familia illustris et regno profutura; spiritualis utilitas voventis; periculum morale sæpe violandi votum ex fragilitate; levitas mentis, perturbatio animi, metus, ex quo factum est votum; notabilis difficultas voti executioni superveniens; dubium de obligatione aut valore voti, et alia id genus, quæ generatim revocari possunt ad pietatem, utilitatem spiritualem, et necessitatem. “ 2°. Quamvis generatim laude digni sint, qui votorum dispensationem non sollicitant, non tamen ii sunt probandi qui vovent nunquam dispensationem petere: aliquando enim expedit, imò necessarium est eam posulare, propter evidens voti violandi periculum. Ita S. Antoninus in Summa, p. 2, tit. 2. c. 2.?—They are.

The Class Book there lays down that you cannot dispense with vows, “nisi secundum ejus voluntatem rationabiliter præsumptam, quæ est ut non concedatur dispensatio sine causa; cum honori Dei et bono animarum officiat,” will you be so good as to translate that passage?—“Therefore they cannot dispense, (that is, the ecclesiastical superior cannot dispense) from vows, but according to the will of God which is reasonably presumed; which is, that no dispensations should be granted without cause, because such a dispensation is against the honour of God and the good of souls,” and therefore there must be a reason on account of that; it is supposed that a vow is always about rem meliorem, and that it is intended for the good of the person that makes the vow—therefore if a dispensation takes place, that dispensation, if it is not with good reason, prevents the honour of God, which was to be obtained by that action which was the subject of the vow.

If the Roman Catholic who enters into an engagement is satisfied in his own mind that his engagement is of such a nature, that it would be unlawful for any person to dispense him from it, would it not be a sin for him to seek for a dispensation?—Yes.

Does not his own conscience in that case tell him that to obtain such a dispensation would be wrong?—Unquestionably.

Does it not therefore follow, that in a clear case his own conscience is the judge?—In a clear case undoubtedly; however as he might take for a clear case what is not really so, he would be obliged to recur to the superior.

A Roman Catholic in that part of the oath of allegiance to which your attention has been called, swears, that he takes that oath without thinking that he is or can be acquitted before God or man, or absolved of that declaration, or any part thereof, although the Pope or any other person or persons, or authority whatsoever, should dispense with or annul the same, or declare that it was null and void from the beginning. If a Catholic who had taken that oath were to seek a dispensation from that oath, would he not, according to the principle laid down in the Class Book, in the passage last read, be guilty of a sin?—He would be guilty of a great sin, and the dispensation would avail nothing to him.

Who is to pronounce whether the dispensation sought for in any given case is with or without a sufficient cause, is it the person seeking the dispensation, or the person granting it, or any other person?—In general when a dispensation is called for, a petition is sent to the superior, in which the causes and reasons are stated for asking the dispensation; and therefore it is the superior who is to examine the validity of the causes; and it goes so far, that if there was a suppression of any circumstantial truth, or the addition of any falsehood, the dispensation is null ipso facto; and even after being granted, the person could not make use of it.

Before a man seeks for a dispensation, must he not, in order to avoid sin, be satisfied in his own conscience, that it is a case in which a dispensation would be lawful?—Unquestionably.

Consequently, if a man solemnly swears, that he does not believe that it would be lawful to obtain a dispensation in a particular case, it would be a sin in him to ask the opinion of any person or any authority as to whether he might obtain that dispensation?—Undoubtedly he would be guilty of a perjury, if he was to seek for a dispensation in such a case.

The

The principle of conscience which God has placed within man, governs him in that case?—Of course, in the first instance.

When therefore you say, that the superior authority is to be the judge, do you not mean that that is so in any case in which the party himself feels free in conscience to obtain a dispensation?—Yes; when he thinks he has good reasons to call for a dispensation, he states his reasons to the superior, and the superior taking into consideration the reasons alleged to him, grants or refuses the dispensation, as he thinks proper; the superior always in the dispensation puts in this clause, "posita veritate causarum," that is, assuming the truth of the causes which are stated in the petition.

Then, are the Commissioners to understand the whole as coming to this, that if a man enters into an engagement, or takes an oath, which he feels conscientiously satisfied that he may, in the sight of God, be relieved from, cases may arise in which it would be necessary for him, not only to feel that internal satisfaction, but, if he had entered into a contract with the church or a superior power, to be dispensed from that obligation by that power?—I think he can do that, in that case.

Being first satisfied, that in the sight of God, he can obtain that dispensation, then and then only he can obtain it?—Yes, he must be satisfied before he calls for the dispensation, that he could absolutely be dispensed of the obligation of that engagement.

Is it not possible, however unlikely, that a superior might grant a dispensation, without any previous application to him?—No, he cannot.

The question admits that it is extremely unlikely, but is it not possible that there might be a general dispensation with respect to an oath which it was notorious had been taken by many individuals?—That depends on the nature of the oath; it might happen from the change of circumstances, if the oath taken was confined to some action to be performed by an individual, or by a community, the superior might think that the execution of that oath, in such change of circumstances, would not be useful to the members of the community, and in that case he could on that cause that he thinks it is pernicious to them, dispense with the obligation of the oath, but that is not a case in which a dispensation of that kind will go to release them from the obligations which they have contracted with other persons.

Is it not a matter of history that the Pope has taken upon himself, at different periods, in a manner of which the Commissioners have no doubt that you as entirely disapprove as they can, to absolve the subjects of England from their oath of allegiance?—I cannot deny the fact which has taken place, but I certainly disapprove of it.

If it would be, as you have stated that it would be, unlawful to ask for a dispensation from a lawful oath, would it not be equally sinful to act upon such a dispensation, though granted to a person without his application?—I think so.

Was not the principle suggested in the last question, that is to say, that it would be a sin to act on such dispensation, firmly maintained and asserted in acts as well as words by the English Roman Catholics, who maintained their allegiance to Queen Elizabeth, although the Pope undertook to dispense with that allegiance?—History testifies that.

Have you been rightly understood to say, that the order of an ecclesiastical superior, even supposing that superior to be the Pope, with the consent of the church, would not be binding, so as to supersede the obligation which is due to another superior by natural law or by the sacred Scripture?—I think, as far as I recollect, I said that there are two authorities appointed by God, the one temporal and the other spiritual, but that the spiritual power cannot release me from the obligation of an oath which I have taken towards the civil authority, no more than the civil authority can release me from an oath that I have taken to the spiritual authority in spiritual matters.

You have said, that no ecclesiastical superior could dispense with the obligation which is due by natural law, or by the law of God, as revealed in Scripture?—Yes.

Do you hold, that a member of the Roman Catholic church is at liberty to consider whether a particular order or decree of his ecclesiastical superior is contrary to Scripture or not?—If it was a decree on a doctrinal point, concerning faith or morals, of that superior, acknowledged by all Catholics to be infallible, no body is allowed to examine if it is contrary to Scripture, but he must receive and believe it as having nothing contrary to them, otherwise he would substitute his own private judgment to that authority which he admits as infallible, which would be anti-catholic.

Is he entitled to consider whether it is evidently contrary to Scripture?—I think he is not, in the aforesaid supposition.

Do you not hold it to be impossible, that a Pope and Council could propose a doctrine in direct opposition to Scripture?—I do.

Would not the fact, that a particular doctrine is propounded by the Pope and the bishops of the church be conclusive evidence to any bishop of the Roman Catholic church that such doctrine was not contrary to Scripture?—Unquestionably.

He would not think it competent for him to inquire further?—No; however, we are not prohibited to read the different passages of the Scripture on which a decision may be founded, but we always do it without any dubitation about the truth of the proposition which is proposed to us to be believed, just in the same manner as, though I am quite persuaded that God exists, I examine the proofs of the existence of God.

You have said already, that neither the Pope, nor any other ecclesiastical superior can render void the obligation of an oath taken in reference to a matter that is purely temporal?—I said that no power on earth can dispense with the obligation of an oath, which is taken towards another person, in which utility is concerned, if the oath is valid in itself; unless it could not be executed without an injury to the common good, nobody can dispense with it.

Is it competent for a member of the Roman Catholic Church to determine whether the subject of a particular oath is of that temporal nature, or is not?—I think so; and if he has any doubt, he must have recourse to persons acquainted with the law and with other matters, in order to form his judgment.

Are the Commissioners to understand you to have answered that a Roman Catholic can determine for himself in all cases whether a dispensation would be lawful, or whether it would be unlawful, as being contrary either to natural law or to the law of God?—That depends on the degree of understanding of the person, and of his acquaintance with those matters, because a person may be not sufficiently informed to judge of it, and of course one could not say, as a general rule, that every one is to be his own judge, without consulting with others who are better informed.

A Roman Catholic is bound by the decisions of his church as to those articles of faith which are finally settled by the decisions of the church?—Yes.

But upon matters which are not so settled by decisions of the church, if the ecclesiastical authority, be that authority what it may, directs him to do an act of any nature, has he not a right to exercise a conscientious judgment upon the question; and if he be satisfied, either from the law of God, as nature teaches it to him, or as he finds it laid down in the Scriptures, or in those writings which convey to him what is called the tradition of the church, that the command given to him is improper and immoral, has he not a right to reject that command as such?—I think that an individual can do it, if he is a man of good information and good conscience; we are not obliged to believe what is not proposed to us as an article of faith.

Have you not sworn positively that the Pope has no power to dispense with your oath of allegiance to the King?—I have, and I still repeat the same answer, that he has no power.

Are the Commissioners to understand, that you do not hesitate to take that oath, because you are perfectly satisfied that whatever the Pope may say to you upon the subject, he has no right to dispense with your oath?—Unquestionably.

F. Anglade, D. D.

IT is stated in page 108 of the Class Book, in the Decalogue, being the second volume of the course of Moral Theology, that oaths are of ten kinds. It is stated in page 119, that there are seven causes excusing or impeding their obligation. It is stated in page 121, that there are five causes taking away the obligation altogether, and each of those divisions is in several instances still further subdivided; we would wish to ask upon what authority all these distinctions rest?—There may be different authorities for the different species.

To narrow the question. It is stated in page 119, that there are seven causes "excusantes," or "impedientes obligationem juramenti," upon what authority is that subdivision made?—That subdivision is made on the authority of reason. I do not think that there is any kind of authority for that; but it is obvious from reason that it should be so.

Has M. Bailly, the author of this book, propounded that division upon his own mere authority, or has he taken it from any other and what sources?—I think some of it may be taken from the canon law, some other part of it may be taken from some other work. With reference to what is taken from the canon law, he gives the title of the chapter in the canon law from which he has taken it.

Do you conceive that the distinctions which occur so frequently in M. Bailly's work are taken from preceding treatises of moral theology, or merely from his own view of the subject?—Some may be taken from others, and some from his own view, in order to make it more methodical.

Are you aware of any particular treatises on moral theology from which M. Bailly constructed his book?—He consulted several ones on different matters, because sometimes one moral author treats better on one question than on another; and of course when a man has to edit a work, it is incumbent on him to go to that work in which the question is best treated according to his own conception. I think he made use of one great work, which is called "La Conference d'Anger," in twenty-seven volumes duodecimo.

Had you ever occasion to compare M. Bailly's work with the Moral Theology of Antoine, so as to know whether he has taken it in substance from that work?—He has taken a good deal from that work.

Do you understand, that the View of Moral Theology, that is propounded by M. Bailly, forms what is called a portion of the Lyonese Divinity?—No; the Lyonese Divinity was not sanctioned by any authority in France but by the Archbishop of Lyons; it was on the contrary rejected in all the dioceses as being dangerous in some principles which concerned our faith.

The question is, whether the course of moral theology at Maynooth appertains rather to that system of divinity that is taught at Lyons, or to the system which is opposed to it?—I think it is not on the principles of the divinity of Lyons, though at the same time there are a great many matters in which the principles are the same; because to reject a work as not being admissible as a class work, it is not necessary that every thing in that work should be exceptionable, but it is enough that there is something very exceptionable, and which might prove dangerous for the pupils that use that work.

You conceive that M. Bailly belongs to the opposite school to that of Lyons?—Indeed he does.

Do you think there is any material difference between the views propounded by Bailly and those propounded by Antoine?—In some matters he may differ in the selection of a case; but in general, I think, in many places he takes the opinion of Antoine.

Are you aware of any circumstance of importance in which he differs from Antoine?—I could not recollect any at present.

It has never occurred to you in your reading to become acquainted with any circumstance of importance in which Bailly deserts the doctrines laid down by Antoine?—I think there are some particular cases, because divines may differ, though they have the same subject to consider in the solution of a difficulty, and of course then the matter is to follow what one considers to be the most probable, and the most rational conclusion, where one cannot have absolute certainty.

Do you conceive that there is any peculiar character that belongs to the views that were taken of moral theology by the Jesuits?—I think not, if there is any thing which is called lax principles of morality I am sure Bailly is free from them.

Among the numerous writers of the Society of Jesus that have treated of moral theology, is there, in your apprehension, any general peculiar distinctive character that belongs to their writings which distinguishes them from the views taken by other writers or other theologians?—In general I think their doctrines have been good, except some few works that were published by some of their moralists which were considered as being too lax in their principles, and as not being severe enough; but in general, I think that cannot be reproached to their doctrines. I think their doctrine is as pure as the doctrine of any persons.

Antoine, who has been referred to, belonged to that society, did he not?—Yes.

Was Bailly a Jesuit?—No, he was a secular priest; he made his studies in the Sorbonne. I know that he is as good a Gallican as Doctor Delahogue himself.

In the first volume of Bailly's Treatise of Moral Theology, at the 231st page, we find a short passage, which we beg of you to translate; "Notandum est primo aliquando rationem habendam esse conditionis personarum nimirum postulat, aliquando bonum publicum ut ecclesia plus indulgeat principibus et aliis dignitate sua eminentibus qui inde in eam propensiores erunt, et libentius ei patrocinium concedent."—"We must first remark, that sometimes the person who gives the dispensation may take into consideration the condition of the persons; that is to say, the public good requires that the church should be more indulgent in regard to princes and other persons in high rank, because on that account they will be more inclined to give their support to religion, and will more willingly afford their patronage to religion." I can state what is the object in this, this is applicable to those dispensations which concern chiefly marriages; there are what are called impedimenta matrimonio which have been made by the church, and which depend entirely on the authority of the church, and in which a dispensation can be given by the church. There are impedimenta matrimonio which are founded on the law of nature, and others which are founded on the law of God, and in these there is no dispensation to be given, but in the others the church can dispense. I consider that that might be one of the motives with regard to princes and persons in high dignity, when they apply for a dispensation, in those cases in which the church can dispense; that the church will not make so much difficulty in granting that dispensation to them, because by that they will be made more favourable to the Catholic religion, that is the meaning of it; it does not refer to any other things, but it refers chiefly to dispensations of marriage.

Can you point out in any part of the work in question, within ten or twenty pages of the sentence that has been cited, any mention made of marriage?—No, it is not mentioned particularly, because there is a treatise of marriage; of course I know what is meant myself, because I know the nature of what he says in other places where he speaks of the impediments of marriage; he states what are the causes for which dispensations may be granted, and I think, if I am not mistaken in my recollection, he mentions that the utility of the church is one of the reasons for granting dispensations, and that utility of the church bears chiefly on princes and other persons of distinction, who can by their credit and by their protection do good to religion.

Is it not a fact that that maxim was introduced into the Roman Catholic theology by the writers of the society that has been alluded to?—I could not say so much as that.

Has it not been one of the articles of charge against them, that they were inclined to act too freely upon the maxim that is there laid down?—There were many things in which it was thought they were making the way to salvation too easy in those lax works by particular individuals. We consider that in these works they make the way to heaven so easy that they may be mistaken, because our Saviour tells us, that the way to heaven is difficult; but I would be very sorry to impute to the body what is the fault of an individual, there would be no justice in such a conclusion as that.

We beg you will understand that the object of this question, and of any similar ones that may be put, is merely to suggest to your mind that M. Bailly has not rejected all the doctrines that it would be desirable that he had done in the construction of his work, and certainly not for the purpose of imputing to any living Roman Catholic any thing objectionable that it contains?—As I was observing just now, although a work may contain many things which I should condemn, yet if it has any particular question better treated of than I can find it any where else, I should not reject it altogether, because the work in itself contains exceptionable passages, but I should make use of what is good in it and reject what is exceptionable.

There is another passage in M. Bailly's work which gives rise to the considerations stated in the last question. Will you have the goodness to read the passages contained in pages 260 and 261 of the second volume of Moral Theology respecting equivocations and mental restrictions?—"Primo, æquivocationes et restrictiones mentales strictè dictas, seu quarum sensus incognitus est, nec ullatenus aut saltem nuci difficillime ab auditoribus deprehenditur, esse vera mendacia, ac proinde illicita. Nam. 1^o. Eccl. 37. qui sophisticè loquitur, odibilis est. 2^o. Juxta S. Augustinum, ille mentitur qui aliud habet in animo, et aliud verbis enuntiat. Sed qui ejusmodi æquivocationibus et restrictionibus utitur, aliud habet in mente, aliud verbis enuntiat. 3^o. Mendacium non impedit ea pars orationis quæ in mente reticetur, quia non corrigit sermonem externum, nec auditorem avertit ab errore. 4^o. Doctrina eorum qui olim contendebant licitum esse ejusmodi amphibologiis et restrictionibus uti ab Innoc. XI. et a Clero Gallicano variis censuris profligata est, ut notavimus, ubi de juramento.

Secundo. Æquivocationes et restrictiones late dictas, seu quarum sensus verus, et a loquente intellectus, ab auditoribus facile potest ex circumstantiis et indiciis quibusdam exterioribus cognosci, juxta theologos etiam strictiores, posse esse licitas; qui enim illis utitur, nihil habet in mente quod ex circumstantiis cognosci non possit, nec in eo casu sensus internus a sermone externo recedit; nullum proinde mendacium. Hinc si quis decipitur, errorem suæ inscitæ, vel ignorantæ, non alterius fraudi imputare debet. Hinc a mendacio excusatur servus qui interrogatus an Dominus sit domi, respondit eum domi non esse; quia satis intelligitur ex circumstantiis et consuetudine hæc verba nihil aliud significare, nisi non licere Dominum invisere. Quisque tamen cavere debet 1^o ne in praxi nimium ejusmodi restrictiones extendat; 2^o, ne restrictiones strictè dictas pro late dictis sibi permittat; 3^o, ne restrictionibus etiam late dictis utatur, dum judici interroganti respondet; cum enim jus habeat interrogandi, tenetur ad ejus mentem respondere."

In that passage M. Bailly divides equivocations and mental restrictions into two classes, which he denominates the "strictè-dictæ" and "latè-dictæ," we will beg of you to explain your understanding of what the distinction is that he makes between those two classes?—"The definition he gives first of the mental restriction is this, it is a proposition, which, according to the obvious and natural sense of the words, is false, but which will be true, if it is connected with the part of the speech which remains latent in the mind of the person who has announced that proposition; the example he gives is clear enough—suppose a person uses such words as these "I have not seen to day such a man" he adds in his own mind "at his house" but he does not express it, then it is evident that the proposition in that case will be, that he has not seen such a person any where, but, however, in his own mind, he adds, I have not seen him at his house, therefore that changes entirely the meaning of the proposition.

At present the Commissioners are only seeking for the meaning of the terms "latè-dictæ et strictè-dictæ?"—"That comes afterwards; the example he gives is this, suppose a person is asked if he has seen such a man, who lives in Dublin, he says, "I have not seen him," then the person to whom he speaks, will understand that he has not seen him in Dublin, but he intends to say that he has not seen him in Rome; but he conceals that word in his own mind, and therefore he is inducing the other man into error, because naturally, from the obvious sense of the words, and from the circumstances in which they are uttered, the person must understand that he has not seen that man in Dublin, whereas himself he thinks of Rome, without communicating that, therefore that is a mental restriction, "strictèdicta."

What are the propositions which are "æquivocationes latè-dictæ?"—"It is a proposition which is true in itself, and in the sense in which it is understood by the person who speaks, and which from circumstances, and from different external marks, may be likewise understood by others; for example, a person says a thing, he says it in the obvious sense; however a person who hears him, mistakes the sense, whereas if he was to attend to the circumstances in which that is said, and to the different other marks, he will understand it in the very sense in which the other has said it; but not attending to those marks, or to those circumstances, he mistakes the sense of the proposition, and in that case, that is a "mentalis restrictio latè dicta;" it could have been put more clearly by the person that announced it, but perhaps he had a reason for not putting it more clearly, and any man of good sense, and a prudent man, will, from the circumstances and the other signs, easily understand what is really the meaning of what he says; but, however, from want of reflection and attention to those things, the person hearing him takes a wrong sense and a wrong view of what is said.

Who is to determine in cases of doubt, whether the circumstances or the external marks are such as may enable the auditor to avoid error, and to know that the meaning really intended is different from that which the words obviously convey?—"I could not answer that question; if that person applies to nobody, it is himself who must judge; if he applies to somebody, that person will ask him in what circumstances was it said, and he will examine the circumstances, and tell him, "but you are mistaken, it was your own fault; if you had paid attention to those circumstances, you would not have been mistaken."

You will observe that M. Bailly, while he very properly prohibits equivocations "strictè dictæ," being resorted to upon any occasion, nevertheless gives his opinion that equivocations of the second class, namely those which he calls "latè-dictæ" may be resorted to; the the question then is, whether there is not obvious danger that unlettered persons, or even persons of some degree of education, may fall into mistakes upon the subject, and may be totally unable to distinguish one class from the other?—We speak of circumstances and marks which are sufficiently obvious, so that a man who has sense and reason could have made out that it was the meaning of what was announced; the man who spoke in that way, might be induced to do so by prudence; suppose you want to communicate something to a person, and there is another person present, you tell the thing as it is; but owing to some circumstance, he takes it in a wrong meaning; you had no intention of deceiving him by any means; in order to tell a lie, one must have an intention of deceiving others; that person may have no intention of deceiving the other, but he may have some reason for not being so explicit as he would be in other circumstances, and a man of prudence will judge from the circumstances what is the real meaning of it, though he has not been more explicit. In the “restrictio strictè-dicta,” there is an intention of deceiving, but in the “latè-dicta” there is none.

Is there not a danger, that although there may be circumstances attendant upon the person speaking, which may assign the second character “restrictio latè-dicta” to what he says, yet that the hearer may not be aware of these, and may be equally deceived as if it were a “restrictio strictè-dicta?”—If he wishes that his proposition should not be understood, and has a knowledge that he speaks in such a manner that he would not be understood, then the mental restriction will fall under the first class of mental restriction, because he will speak with the intention of not being understood; because, if he knows that such are the circumstances of the man whom he addresses, that he will understand it in a wrong sense, and he does not make himself more explicit, I say, in that case, he has an intention of deceiving, and then the mental restriction will fall under the first class of mental restrictions “strictè-dictas.”

Is it not undesirable, that the science of moral theology, as taught in the class books of Maynooth, should be attended with so many distinctions as those which are referred to in the matter of the preceding questions?—That is unavoidable I think in all moral things, because the circumstances vary so much in the different acts of men that it is impossible to make a rule that will be applicable to all; there must be subdivisions necessarily.

With reference to the answer you have given to the questions which have been lately put to you, will you have the goodness to attend to a passage from Paley’s Moral Philosophy, which will now be read to you: “There are falsehoods which are not lies, that is, which are not criminal; as first, where no one is deceived, which is the case in parables, fables, novels, jests, tales to create mirth, ludicrous embellishments of a story, where the declared design of the speaker is not to inform but to divert; compliments in the subscription of a letter, a servant denying his master, a prisoner pleading not guilty, an advocate asserting the justice, or his belief of the justice of his client’s cause; in such instances, no confidence is destroyed, because none was reposed; no promise to speak the truth is violated, because none was given, or understood to be given.” Does that correspond with the explanation you have given upon the particular point in question?—Those may be some of the cases, because it is understood by every one, that in such cases the literal truth is not to be precisely expected.

Have you ever seen a work entitled, “De Juramenti Promissorii Obligatione, Prælectiones, Septem, Habitæ in Schola Theologica, Oxon, Termino Michaelis. An. Dom. MDCXLVI. a Roberto Sandersono, S. Theologiæ in Academia Oxoniensi Professore Regio. Præmissa Oratione ab-eodem habita cum publicam professionem auspicaretur, 26 Octobr. 1646?”—I have seen it to day, and I read some of it, and I find it differs almost in nothing from our principles, and our divisions and sub-divisions; there is only just that; it does not admit the dispensing power of the Pope, that we admit as being Catholics; as to the dispensing power, we consider that as belonging to the Pope, and to all the bishops, on this account, that an oath is a religious act, and, of course, as we admit, in the ecclesiastical authority, the dispensation of things which are spiritual, that is the reason that it is referred to their arbitration, because when a person takes an oath, he takes God Almighty as a witness of what is asserted or promised.

Do not you conceive, however, that to be a very material distinction between the course now delivered at Maynooth and the course which may have been delivered at Oxford in 1646?—As to that, we differ, because our principles are quite different in point of the supremacy of the Pope.

Do you mean, that an engagement entered into with the church of a spiritual nature, whether it be upon oath, or by a vow, the Pope may dispense with it?—It depends on the nature of it; if the vow relates to the church, the church can dispense with it of course.

Will you have the goodness to read to the Commissioners a passage in page 200 of Bishop Sanderson’s work?—“*Iniquum enim, ut quis cogatur rem sibi debitam commutare invitus. Neutro ergo istorum modorum solvi potest juramenti vinculum, aut obligatio tolli. Sect. VI. Sed posse videtur reliquis qui supersunt tribus modis: Irritatione Sc. se obligandi in iis rebus in quibus subest, nisi ex voluntate superioris cui subest; et proinde non debet aliquo actu suo inducere sibi obligationem sine illius consensu, vel expresso, vel rationabiliter præsumpto. Jura enim Prælatorum in subditos, ex lege Dei immota et æternâ; perpetua sunt. Officia insuper subditorum erga prælatos, obsequiique jus et subjectionis, ex eâdem perpetuâ lege, perpetua sunt et indispensabiliter obligatoria; quæ obligatio antecedens (ex tertia nostra hypothesi) impedit effectum juramenti subsequentis, ne possit obligare: semper enim obligatio prior præjudicat posteriori; et irritum facit omnem actum inductivum novæ obligationis sibi contrariæ. Dicendum ergo in hoc casu primò, non debere subditum in iis rebus in quibus alteri subest jurare se facturum quidnam, absque præsumpto saltem superioris sui consensu. Secundo, si juraverit et res sit licita, obligari ad faciendum quamdiu non videtur id esse contra voluntatem, dignitatem, aut utilitatem superioris. Tertiò, superiorem, si expresso consensu suo, sive antecedente, sive subsequente, promissionem subditi semel confirmaverit, non posse eandem postea irritam facere, aut obligationem ejus tollere. Quartò, si superior quam primùm rem rescierit, statim, dissensum suum palàm et peremptoriè subdito significaverit, prohibueritque id in quod juratum est fieri: Cessare continuò obligationem illam juramenti transitoriam; et subditum vi obligationis officii, quæ permanens est et perpetua, teneri contra quam juraverat facere. Unde si quis alienæ potestati subditus, puta domini aut patris aut principis vel sponte suâ, vel vi et metu adductus, aliquod fortè juramentum præstaret, in quo dominum patrem aut principem si adesset non fuisse consensurum crederet: jurando peccavit contra officium debitum, et omnino tenetur illud juramentum ut officio suo contrarium, non servare. Stet ergo solvi vinculum juramenti ex irritatione legitimi superioris."

Does it appear to you, that the principles laid down in the passage you have now read, are the same as those laid down in page 121 of the work upon which you have been examined, and which are as follows; "Causa est irritatio facta ab eo cui persona jurans, vel materia juramenti est subjecta: sic superior regularium potest validè, etiam sine causa, irritare juramenta subditorum, pater filiorum, maritus uxoris, Dominus servi, circa ea quæ eorum potestati subjiciuntur, et juribus illorum nocent. Nam juramentum non obligat in damnum alterius, et fit sub illa tacita conditione subintellecta ex ipso jure, nisi contradixerit persona quæ contradicendi jus habet?"—As far as I can recollect, I think they are the same exactly.

Are you aware that Dr. Paley, in his Moral Philosophy, in treating of promises, undertakes to shew that promises are not binding, where the performance is impossible; that promises are not binding where the performance is unlawful; that promises are not binding where they contradict a former promise; that promises are not binding which are released by the promisee; and that erroneous promises are not binding in certain cases?—I have not read that work, but all those principles are the same as ours exactly.

We beg of you to take the trouble to state the relative length of time occupied in studying the Scriptures, and in studying the course of Moral Theology by the divinity students at Maynooth?—The students of Maynooth have regularly three Professors of divinity to attend. They have the lectures on speculative divinity; the lectures on moral divinity; and the lectures on Scripture; and they divide the time themselves in such a manner as to be able to account for the subject of the lecture to every Professor, when his turn comes to give the lecture. Suppose the Professor of speculative theology is to give his lecture in the morning before twelve; they will spend the morning in study to prepare for that Professor, and after that, their attention will be turned to prepare for that Professor, who is to lecture at two. The lessons of Scripture are given, I think, twice a week; they are given on two vacant days, which are Wednesday and Saturday; of course, when a lecture is to be given, the students will naturally devote a great deal of their time in the morning to prepare for that lecture. I do not suppose that a student could answer well, unless he was spending four or five, or perhaps six hours in the study of the Scriptures, in preparation; at least if I was to be in that class, I think I would take such a time.

We understand that there are two hours in the week occupied in lecturing upon the Scriptures to the divinity class?—There are.

How many hours are there employed in the week in lecturing in the dogmatical and moral theology classes, put together?—Nine hours, taking the two together; because each Professor has only an hour at each class, and there are four classes for one, and five for the other in each week.

How many hours should you think are employed in making preparation for those nine hours of lecture?—I cannot tell that; they are allowed to go to the library between the lectures, and I do not know how they dispose of their time when they are in the library, whether they employ it in preparing for one or in preparing for the other; or perhaps some of them do not employ it in preparing at all.

During how many hours in the week is the divinity class collected in the halls for the purpose of preparing for the lectures in dogmatic and moral theology?—There is not a precise time which the rule of the house requires to be appropriated to that, because if they have more time than they want for the lecture of morality, they will spend it on some other preparation for another class.

When we were discussing with you the question of the infallibility of the Pope, we referred to the Class Book, which says, "utramque sententiam esse probabilem," that is, as we should construe it, that it was probable that he was infallible, and that it was probable that he was not infallible?—It means merely that arguments pro and contra are brought forward by both parties; therefore we swear, that it is not an article of our faith that the Pope

Pope is infallible, neither is it an article of our faith that he is fallible; it is a question debated among divines, exercitationis causa.

When it is stated, as it is, in page 394 of the Class Book De Ecclesiâ, that each opinion is probable, is the word "probable" used in its ordinary colloquial sense, or in any theological and scholastic sense?—It is in a scholastic sense; we call an opinion probable that has some arguments in its favour; but still there is one opinion that is more probable than the other, which has the better arguments, or is better substantiated.

In the ordinary colloquial sense of the word "probable," do you conceive that it is possible that two propositions can be each of them probably true, if one of them is necessarily false?—Till it is demonstrated that one is absolutely false, it will preserve always that degree of probability which arises from the proofs given in its favour, which will produce more or less conviction in the mind of the person that reads them.

We observe a sentence in the Class Book of Ethics read at Maynooth, which says that the word "probability" relates particularly to theology rather than to ethics; we would be obliged to you for the precise definition of that word as it is used in theology?—I will state what is the occasion of that observation, as I made the treatise on ethics; the reason is this: that there was a lax doctrine which prevailed in the schools for some time, to a certain extent, that an opinion became probable, provided it was supported by a few scholastics. They went so far as to say, that if it was supported by one single divine, that opinion became probable; and from that they inferred that the doctrine of such an opinion could be maintained in practice, and that a man who was a confessor, or a director of conscience, could be excusable if he judged the conscience of a penitent, on an opinion of that sort, which had acquired that degree of probability. On the contrary, the sound part of the divines inveighed very much against such doctrine as that, and maintained, that in order that an opinion should be probable, to be followed in practice it should be more probable than the contrary opinion; that is, that it should have more degrees of probability, arising from arguments, than the other could have; because it was not on the opinion of this or that man, that the question was to be decided, but on the reasons which this or the other man assigned in favour of the opinion; and they concluded, that if the two opinions, pro and contra, were equally probable, that in that case there is the "casus dubia," and their conclusion was this: that in dubious cases of that sort, where there were arguments pro and contra, the opinion that was to be followed in practice, was "tutior opinio," and by the safer opinion, they understood the opinion which was in favour of the law, and not that which was in favour of the liberty of man, to use the language of divines, or which would favour the passions of men rather than the law.

You say that they maintained or introduced a lax doctrine about probability, whom do you mean by they?—Some theologians; I could not tell their names, because I never read their works. I never will cast my eyes on a theologian who maintains such doctrine.

Have you any reasonable doubt that the persons who introduced the doctrine, to which you refer, were the Jesuit writers?—I cannot pronounce on that.

We beg to refer you to a remarkable passage in a work of a very celebrated French writer, M. Pascal, in which he says, "que la doctrine des opinions probables est le fondement et l'A. B. C. de toute la morale des Jesuites?"—Pascal was a man of party, and of course I could not entirely rely on what he says.

Do you conceive that in point of fact, most Roman Catholics have adopted one of those two probable opinions, as being more probable than the other, as to the fallibility or infallibility of the Pope?—In France I think it is the most general opinion that he is not infallible; as to what takes place in other countries, it would be difficult to form a judgment on that. Bossuet was the person, who was the most active in the formation of the four articles of the clergy of France, in which he shews that it is proved, both by negative and positive arguments, that the Pope is not infallible; at the same time, it is not an article defined by the church that he is not infallible; we are not obliged to believe that he is not infallible, nor can we condemn, as dissenting from the faith, those who maintain a contrary opinion, though at the same time in France, they consider it as the most probable opinion that he is not infallible.

Can you form any judgment as to which opinion is considered the more probable at Maynooth?—I could not tell that; I can judge for myself, but I cannot tell what is in the mind of others.

May we ask, which do you yourself consider the most probable opinion?—I could not precisely decide positively; but as far as I can judge the arguments which are brought against the infallibility of the Pope, seem to me to be very strong and very difficult to answer.

Can you say whether either of the two opinions is taught at Maynooth, as being "probabilior," that is, more probable than the opposite opinion?—I do not think any thing like that is taught at Maynooth; they confine themselves to the proposition, such as it is announced in the treatise.

Is it a matter of notoriety at Maynooth that any particular individuals of high character there, hold the one or the other opinion?—No; I do not know any body who has pronounced in any way his decisive opinion on it.

Do you conceive that the several Professors of Maynooth have come to any conclusion in their own minds, or to no conclusion upon the subject?—I think they leave that question, such as it is, among those which are agitated among divines.

Do you think that they have come to a conclusion, and have not expressed it, or that they have come to no conclusion about it?—I think they have come to no conclusion; but it is impossible for me to judge as to that.

Rev.F. Anglade, D. D.
2 November 1826.

Have you ever known of any teachers, except the regular teachers of Maynooth, coming there for the purpose of delivering lectures or sermons, or instruction of any kind?—Sometimes I have seen some persons giving sermons. I have not seen any other instruction given but sermons, and some subjects of meditation, which are taken from a view of the ecclesiastical duties. That is customary in our house, and I think it is not peculiar to our house, but it is in all seminaries I have ever known, the custom for the candidates for the priesthood, during the time they are in the seminary, besides the vocal prayer, to have what is called a mental prayer; that mental prayer consists of reflecting and meditating on some particular truth, concerning chiefly their state of life, or concerning the general principles of salvation, which is read the evening before, and again in the morning.

Have you known strangers to suggest the subject of those reflections?—I have.

Will you mention the names of those strangers?—I know Mr. Kenney gave us something of that sort; he gave us a Retreat; I was present at it, and I never heard any thing but what was very edifying to me, and from which I hope I derived some benefit.

Could you mention any other person who has come to the College for that purpose?—I have seen Mr. Blake, the parish priest; he came once, and gave us a little instruction; and I have heard likewise Father Welsh, who gave us some little instruction; and I heard once Mr. D'Arcy, who gave us some little instruction; but I never found any thing in their instruction, but what was good and sound doctrine.

Have you known Mr. Kenney to come there more than once for that purpose?—I recollect only one Retreat that he gave.

He continued on that occasion, it is presumed, for four or five days?—Five or six days.

Did he continue in the College during the whole of that time?—Of course; he could not come from a distance to preach twice a day, or three times a day.

Did he preach twice or three times a day during that time?—He did; he performed the whole exercises of the Retreat.

On the occasion of a Retreat, how of ten does the person, who conducts it, lecture in the day?—As far as I can recollect, I know it is at least twice a day; it may perhaps be three times or four times; I cannot recollect exactly.

Upon that occasion, can you recollect, whether he acted as confessor to the inmates of the institution?—I could not answer positively for that; I suppose, that if a person had applied to him, he would have heard his confession, but I cannot say with certainty whether any body applied to him.

Are we to understand from a former answer given by you, that the person conducting the Retreat assigned the subjects of mental reflection to the individuals of the community?—He did; and they were, in my own estimation, very good.

Have you ever heard or read of any Pope having renounced any of the claims put forward by any of his predecessors to temporal power, or to power of any description?—Since the four articles were decreed by the clergy of France, I have not heard of any Pope having renewed the claims of his predecessors, except for some homage from the King of Naples, which was founded on some temporal covenant. Adrian the Second, before he was made Pope, did not admit the infallibility of the Pope, and he left the same doctrine in the edition of his works, published after he was a Pope; I did not find any thing which manifested his opinions respecting the papal pretensions on temporalities.

Can you recollect whether the concession went further than to the Emperor of Germany, and was he not at war with the Pope at the time?—I do not recollect anything on that subject.

Could you, at your leisure, refer the Commissioners to the decree or the bull of the Pope in question?—It was not a bull; it was a passage quoted from him; if I can find it, I will communicate it to the Commissioners.

Did not the Cardinal Prefect of the Propaganda, by the direction of Pope Pius the Sixth, in the year 1791, address a letter to Doctor Troy, which is set forth in a Report from the Select Committee of the House of Commons, on the regulation of Roman Catholic subjects in foreign states, which contains the following passage, "The See of Rome never taught that faith is not to be kept with the heterodox; that an oath to Kings separated from Catholic communion can be violated; that it is lawful for the Bishop of Rome to invade their temporal rights and dominions. We too, consider an attempt or design against the life of Kings or Princes, even under the pretext of religion, as a horrid and detestable crime"?—I could not say as to the fact, because I never read it.

Is there any regulation of the College which prescribes the particular text-book that is to be used by each of the Professors, or is that a matter upon which the Professor may determine for himself?—By the constitutions of the College, the Commissioners will find that the President and the Professors are to agree upon the books to be taught and adopted in the College; there were, at one time, books which were objected to by the College and by the Professors, and they were not allowed to be admitted as class-books, on account of their ultra-montane principles.

It is in the power of the Professor, without the consent of the President, to change the class-book?—The President of course is the head of the house; it would be an unbecoming thing that any matter of any moment should be transacted in the house, without the co-operation of the President.

If the President and the Professor concur in it, they may change any book which has been adopted as a class-book?—A book which has been adopted is not easily changed, unless there is some reason pointed out for it; if it were wished to adopt another teaching, it could not be done without the consent of the Professors; if they were to wish to introduce ultra-montane doctrines, the Professors could oppose it, and refuse to teach it.

[It is necessary to observe, that the corrections and additions proposed by Dr. Slevin for insertion in his Evidence were more than usually numerous. The Commissioners have admitted the corrections as extensively as possible into the text, although it is to be apprehended, that the insertion may sometimes tend to confuse the course of Examination. If the substance of these corrections had been offered at the time, the Questions which follow, would, in some instances, have assumed a different shape, or not have been asked, and in others, new Questions might have been suggested. In some cases the Commissioners have felt it necessary to insert the corrections and additional matter, not in the text but in notes.]

Examination of the Reverend Nicholas Slevin, D. D., 20th October 1826.

WHAT office do you hold in the College at Maynooth?—That of Prefect of the Dunboyne Establishment.

Are you not also librarian?—I also hold the office of librarian.

What salary do you receive for the duty you perform?—£. 112 per annum.

How long have you been connected with the establishment?—Three years.

Did you receive the two appointments together?—Yes.

In what situation were you before you were connected with the establishment?—Until a very short time before my appointment I was in Spain. I was Professor in the Irish College at Salamanca.

Had you been long in Spain?—The last time, before my appointment to the Dunboyne establishment, I was only two years in Spain, but I had been there several years before. I made my academical studies in Salamanca.

Are you in holy orders?—Yes, in priest's orders.

Where were you ordained?—In Salamanca.

Had you any connection whatever with the Institution before your appointment as librarian?—None whatever.

What are your duties as librarian;—To superintend the library; I have two assistants who take care of the library, and I merely superintend its concerns.

Who are your assistants?—Two gentlemen belonging to the Dunboyne establishment.

Do they receive any salary?—They receive a small allowance of £. 20 a year between them.

What is the nature of the superintendence you exercise over the library?—Merely to take care that they do their duty, and that the affairs of the library be carefully administered.

Who has the immediate care of the books; the charge of the catalogue, and of seeing that the books are in their places?—I have the responsibility of the library, but those duties are discharged by the under librarians under my inspection.

Are not books purchased for the library?—Yes.

Who directs the purchase of them?—The President sometimes, and I also occasionally purchase, as opportunities offer.

You decide upon the books which you think it is desirable to add to the collection as it exists already?—Yes, to the amount of £. 20 yearly.

Is that the whole sum that is applied annually to the purchase of books?—It is the whole sum allowed at present by the board of trustees for the purchase of books for the library.

Are you in the habit of receiving presents or bequests of books?—Formerly, I understand, the College received several donations of books, but since my appointment we have received none.

By whom is the library made use of?—The library is for the use of the students and superiors of the College, who are admitted to read there at stated hours.

At what hours?—The statutes of the College direct that the library should be open four hours every study day. It is not opened on vacant days; Wednesday and Sunday are vacant days in the College; Saturday in the afternoon is also vacant, and the library is not open for the admission of students after one o'clock on Saturdays.

Under what regulations are the students permitted to read in the library?—Their admission is regulated by statute.

Will you state what is the regulation of the statute?—The statute directs that no student should be admitted to read in the library who has not been four years in the College, and even then he must be recommended by a Professor, and must have permission from the President. Students of shorter standing, who wish to be admitted, must obtain the responsibility of a Professor, and the express permission of the President.

Is the permission given from time to time, or is it general?—It has been general as to the students of four years standing, since my appointment.

Out of the total number of students at present in the College at Maynooth, what number have permission to study in the library?—I cannot specify the exact number.

Is there any list of those who have that permission?—There is no list at present of the students admissible to the library.

How do you know whether any particular student, in point of fact, has permission?—My assistants in the library are acquainted personally with all the students, and they can distinguish those who are entitled to read in the library.

Appendix, N° 26.

Examination of
Rev.

N. Slevin, D. D.
20 October 1826.

Will you be so good as to procure a list of the names of the students who are now permitted to have access to the library, and to transmit the same to this Board?—I will.

Is the permission to read in the library given to all who are of four years standing?—Such is the present practice.

Are we to understand that there has been a general order that all the students of four years standing may be admitted without any further particular order?—I have stated, that the statute requires for admission, besides four years residence in the house, the permission of the President; however, that permission is given generally to all students of four years standing.

Is that permission enjoyed by all the students of four years standing?—It is at present.

Then there is no student of four years standing who has not a right to go into the library?—Just so.

There is also a further power to admit students of less than four years standing by a certain form mentioned in the statute; have any young men availed themselves of that permission?—I know of none at present, nor since my appointment, who have availed themselves of that privilege.

Are there not many students in their first year of the divinity class, who are of four years standing?—There are.

Would you admit them into the library?—Certainly.

Without any particular permission being given to the individual?—Without particular permission; but I must add that there may be some first year divines who have not been four years in the house, and yet are tolerated to go to the library, because the statute is not enforced rigidly with regard to divines.

Do you find that the young men who are of four years standing pretty generally avail themselves of the privilege?—I think they do, because there is generally a desire manifested to go to the library.

Are they permitted to exercise their own discretion as to the books they read in the library?—They are generally, but the assistant librarians have directions to prevent them from reading books that are known to have a bad tendency.

Have you books in the library that you consider as having a bad tendency?—We have books of almost every description in the library.

Will you name any books that you consider of a bad tendency?—By books of a bad tendency, I mean those that are decidedly deistical or irreligious; I also mean books in certain branches of science that it might not be proper for young men to read. I allude to books in surgery and anatomy.

Is Gibbon's History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire in the library?—It is; and that is one of the books the students are not allowed to read.

Is Baylie's Dictionary?—That is also prohibited.

The French Encyclopædia?—The Encyclopædia is also forbidden.

Where is that specified?—It is mentioned to the assistant librarians, and the students learn it traditionally; the prohibition came originally from the President, I suppose, before my time. I have no power to alter the regulations of the library; I left things as I found them.

Is there a list of prohibited books?—There is not, however strange it may appear.

But the prohibited books were, I presume, originally pointed out by the President or librarian?—Such has been the regulation of the library before my appointment, and I have been forced to allow things to go on in the same way. I proposed certain regulations for the government of the library to the President, and even to the Board of Trustees, but they refused to sanction them, for wise reasons, no doubt.

Are they permitted to take books out of the library?—They are not at present, without the express permission of the President and the librarian.

Is it a part of the regulations, that a student wishing to take down any particular book, should apply to the assistant librarian, to apprise him of the fact, in order to afford him an opportunity of exercising his judgment as to whether the book is proper or not?—The permission of the assistant librarian, as to books, is not always asked by the students reading in the library; according to the existing regulation they have free access to all the books.

Nor any permission?—Nor any permission whatever.

Then how is it known whether the students are reading proper or improper books?—The assistant librarian keeps a watchful eye on the conduct of the students in the library, and if he happens to see them reading improper books, he interferes and prevents them.

Your assistants in the library are frequently changing?—They are frequently changed.

In what manner are the rules transmitted from one librarian to another, as to the books that are not allowed to be read?—There are very few prohibited books specified, the prohibition is rather of a general nature; but the students of long standing in the house are commonly well acquainted with the library, and the regulations of it.

Is there a catalogue of the library specifying the books that are prohibited?—There is a catalogue of the library, but it does not specify all the dangerous books; some few works have been pointed out verbally, those chiefly which I mentioned.

Have the works of Jansenius, the Bishop of Ypres, for instance, been so pointed out?—No; I have not learnt that they were pointed out as dangerous. The doctrine is known to be dangerous.

Would you allow a student to read those?—The students are allowed access to those as well as to several other Jansenistical works that are in the library. We consider them sufficiently sufficiently guarded against that doctrine; but I must add, that I leave the government of the library as I found it,

Are there any books of controversies between Protestants and Roman Catholics?—There are, on both sides.

Would the students be permitted to read those?—They have free access to them.

To those on the Protestant side as well as the Catholic?—Yes.

And they are never prohibited from reading any of them?—Never; we have a very large collection of Protestant authors on all religious subjects, and some on controversy in particular. The students have never been prohibited from reading them; on the contrary, the reading of them, with the refutations, is encouraged. The only books that are considered as prohibited are, as I already mentioned, deistical works, and works of an immoral tendency; also works that might have an immoral tendency, such as works on surgery, anatomy, &c.

And the Encyclopædia?—The Encyclopædia is of that nature, because there are many articles in it that are deistical. There are also articles in it on surgery and anatomy. A great part of the French Encyclopædia was written by the French Deists.

Is the library open throughout the whole of the year?—It is open on study days throughout the academical year; and even in vacation, except the last fortnight.

Is there any memorandum taken of the names of the young men who go to the library to read?—There is not.

What do you conceive may be about the numbers that resort to the library one day with another?—I consider, that one day with another, there may be upwards of an hundred who go to the library; for all the divines, as I mentioned before, are admitted, even those who have not been four years in the house, and the divines are at present, I think, about 170.

You reckon that there are 170 that may be fairly considered as in the habit of attending the library at present?—Certainly, though not all perhaps at the same time.

Do you suppose there are not ten of these, for instance, that have not been there in the course of the last month or two?—I am pretty certain there are not.

Is there any tacit understanding that those divines are to confine their reading to works of divinity?—No; the choice of the books they read is left to their own selection, under the restraint which I have stated.

How long has the present practice been in force of allowing all the students in divinity to resort habitually to the library?—Since I came to the house at least.

When was that?—Three years ago.

Did you ever hear that the regulations had been different heretofore in that respect?—They were on the same footing before I came to the College, for I have made no alteration in that respect. I left things as I found them.

You found as many as 170 in the habit of continual resort to the library?—I found that the students in divinity were generally admitted to the library, whether they had been four years in the house or not.

Do you think there are any students in divinity now in the house, who would be excluded from the library, if they were to wish to go to it?—No, there are not. All the students of divinity have free access to the library at the hours regulated by statute.

What are your duties as Prefect of the senior students on the Dunboyne establishment?—To direct their studies, and superintend their morals, without, however, interfering with the authorities of the house.

Have the young men, upon the Dunboyne establishment, any other instructor than yourself?—They have also the Professor of Hebrew, in that language alone.

Will you be so good as to describe the manner in which you assist their studies?—I direct their studies in the quality of Professor, in the same manner as any other Professor in the house assists his particular class.

Do they assemble together in class?—They do, three times a week.

On what days do they assemble in class?—At present, on Monday, Thursday and Friday.

At what hours?—At the same hours with the other classes; from half-past ten till half-past eleven or twelve; for we generally spend an hour and a half at our class.

What do they study?—Divinity, canon law, and ecclesiastical history, are the branches pointed out for them by the Board of Trustees.

What books do they use for that purpose?—For divinity, the general class books of the house; for canon law, Cabassutius's, Theoria et Praxis Juris Canonici; on ecclesiastical history they have no particular class book.

What book are they now reading upon ecclesiastical history?—There is no particular book specified for their use.

What book of ecclesiastical history did they read last with you?—No particular book. I point out a certain subject for each succeeding conference, and they prepare from any of the ecclesiastical histories in the library.

Then is it rather a general examination that you give them upon the subject, than a lecture founded upon any particular book?—Just so.

In what way do they prosecute any studies in Greek or Latin authors, or subjects of general literature, is it left to their own discretion?—Quite to their own discretion.

Are any pains taken to keep up their acquirements in Greek and Latin?—That is left entirely to themselves.

Do you entertain any apprehension that they sometimes lose their knowledge of it, by not constantly reading Greek and Latin?—No apprehension. In the Latin they have constant practice, as their class books of theology and canon law, are in that tongue. I am inclined to think, they employ a portion of their leisure time in reading Greek authors.

Are they exercised at all in matters of composition?—They are.

Will you state in what manner?—A theme is given them once a year, for an essay, which they furnish at the close of each academical year.

Only once a year?—Only once a year; but the theme given them is comprehensive, and of a nature to require reading and research.

Are they exercised in elocution at all?—According to the general system of the house; they are required to preach occasionally.

Is it the custom to distribute prizes amongst the class of the Dunboyne establishment?—Four prizes are allotted annually to the Dunboyne class; one for theology, one for ecclesiastical history, one for canon law, and one for the essay, I have just mentioned.

What examinations take place in order to award those prizes?—We hold an examination in theology, canon law, and ecclesiastical history, twice each year; one at Christmas, and another at the close of the academical year. The members also defend a public thesis, in the presence of the Trustees, at the end of each academical year. A thesis is printed some time before the meeting of the Trustees, in the month of June. This thesis is distributed, and the senior scholars, each in rotation, sustain it publicly, in the presence of the Board and of the community. This exercise is conducted by way of disputation, and the Professors examine and propose objections. The senior students also object to each other in turn; the exercise is conducted in Latin.

Is it from a written paper?—The thesis is a printed paper.

Is the exercise extempore, or is it read from a written composition?—The thesis is printed; but the student defends the doctrine of it, and answers extempore to the questions that are proposed.

In consequence of previous preparation?—In consequence of previous preparation. I mentioned the thesis is printed some time before.

In what language is it carried on?—Our public disputations are carried on in Latin. We have besides the thesis, a monthly exercise or disputation, in the presence of the Professors and students of divinity, which is conducted in the same way.

Are the Dunboyne students ever exercised in polemical disputation upon the points in controversy between different classes of Christians?—Not particularly; the subjects of the public exercises are taken promiscuously from the treatises which they read in the course of the year, and frequently questions of controversy occur in those treatises.

Does it ever happen that in order to maintain an argument, one of them is desired to support the Protestant side of any controverted question?—As often as a polemical question occurs, it is so; the person who objects, supports the Protestant side, whether he be a student or a professor.

From what sources does he take his arguments on those occasions?—From any author he pleases; he may consult Protestant authors or he may consult our theologians, who give the objections made by Protestants to our tenets.

Would there be any risk of his incurring disapprobation if he were to maintain that side of the question with too much energy?—No danger at all of disapprobation; he would be applauded for his acuteness.

Has such a circumstance ever arisen?—I do not recollect that an instance of the sort has happened.

Has it ever happened that a young man should maintain the Protestant side of the dispute, with more energy than might be deemed advisable?—Never; and even if he should put down his antagonist, he would not be reprimanded, but applauded. In the failure of the respondent, it becomes the duty of the Professor to explain the difficulty.

Have any of the Maynooth students become members of the Established Church, so far as you have heard?—I have heard that some have embraced the Protestant religion. I do not know them.

Do you believe it?—I do.

Do you believe it of any particular individuals that you could name?—None of the students that I have known in the house, have embraced the Protestant religion.

Did it ever happen that any of the Professors of Maynooth conformed to the Established Church?—I heard of one; a Mr. Crowley.

What was he professor of?—I heard that he was teaching Scripture at the time; but I think he was not actually Professor; that is, his appointment had not been sanctioned by the Board. I believe he was teaching Scripture only provisionally.

Did he conform to the Established Church?—I understand he is at present a minister of the Established Church.

Was he in Maynooth when he conformed?—This fact happened many years ago. I merely answer from report. I heard that he left the house at the time he conformed. I understand he conformed immediately after leaving the house.

How long have you been in the Institution?—Three years.

Has there been any instance of any person educated at Maynooth within that time, conforming to the Established Church?—I have heard of none.

Have you heard of a person of the name of Brennan?—I have; but he has not been in college these three years past.

Has there been any instance of conformity, so far as you know, within the last three years?—Yes; I have heard of Mr. Brennan's.

Did

Did you hear of any one else?—I have heard many reports of priests having conformed, but I have heard of no other in particular that I can name, except a Mr. Kenny.

How long is it since Mr. Crowley conformed?—I cannot say.

Are there any other public disputations in Maynooth, except the maintaining of particular theses of which you have spoken?—I mentioned the monthly disputations held by the members of the Dunboyne Establishment; each of the professors of theology also holds, in his respective class, a public disputation once a month.

Are there any others that you have heard of?—No others.

We find in the statutes the following order relating to the Dunboyne scholars; “Bis saltem in hebdomadâ colloquiis ecclesiasticis intersint,” what is the meaning of that?—This statute ordains that they should meet twice a week and hold conferences.

Pray explain the nature of those conferences?—Before my appointment, the students of the Dunboyne Establishment had no professor; they were left to themselves, and the statute, which has been read, directs that they should hold conferences on subjects of theology twice a week among themselves. By the regulations which the Board made at the time of my appointment, the mode of proceeding was changed, and three conferences weekly were enjoined.

Do they continue to hold those conferences now?—They hold them with me; but instead of two, we now hold three weekly.

Then the conference has become a lecture?—It has; they have been placed under the direction of a Prefect.

Do the students assist in the conference themselves; do they state objections?—They do occasionally, as directed by the Professor. A subject is marked out for each succeeding conference which they account for; they hold disputations as often as the subject may require it.

Do those young men ever assist in the general instruction which the other students receive?—No.

We find in the statutes the following passage: “volumus proinde ut suas etiam in docendo partes habeant seniores alumni,” is that in any way acted upon?—This statute ordains that they should assist the Professors in giving instruction to the other students; however, that part of the statute has never been put in execution, unless in the absence of a Professor, when one of the Dunboyne students may occasionally act as his substitute.

What age do you believe the oldest of the students upon the Dunboyne Establishment to be of?—I cannot say; there are some of them at present in priest's orders. The statutes require that all be in holy orders at the time of their appointment.

What is the earliest age at which a priest can be ordained?—In this country, twenty-three years compleat.

You have stated that the theses which are prepared for the purpose of disputation are printed, what becomes of them afterwards, are they filed or kept?—We keep a few copies in the library; the rest are distributed.

Are there any of them that you do not keep?—Since my appointment, I placed each year a few copies in the library.

Can you furnish the Commissioners with a copy of each thesis, since your appointment?—I will with pleasure.

[The Witness was requested to furnish the same to the Commissioners.]

Have not the young men, upon the Dunboyne Establishment, a good deal of time to themselves in which they can prosecute studies at their own discretion?—Certainly.

Do you superintend their private studies?—No; I do not interfere in their private studies.

Are you in the habit of examining strictly what books they have in their rooms?—No; I never enter their rooms to inspect them.

Does the duty of the Dean, in this respect, apply to the Dunboyne students as well as to the other students?—It does; they are subject to the general rules of the College.

Have you any voice in the selection of the young men who are to be placed upon this establishment?—I have, as a member of the President's Council.

But not from the situation you hold as the head of the class?—No.

Is the degree of proficiency that you require of the young men, in order to their being placed upon that establishment, so high that only a few individuals attain to it?—According to the present practice none are appointed to the establishment that have not obtained an accessit in each of the classes of Theology, and in the class of Scripture.

Is there any one now in the College qualified according to that rule, or according to any other that exists upon the subject, to be put upon the class of the Dunboyne students?—I know of none; the selection is made at the end of each year from those who have finished their course. The reason why the number is not complete is, that the wants of our church are such, that the Bishops are obliged to call out students who would be found qualified for the establishment, and even those that are appointed to it are very seldom allowed to remain three years, as required by the regulations.

You say that you have at this time in the class several in priest's orders?—There are some in priest's orders.

How many?—Four.

Have they not yet completed their three years?—This is the third year for three of them.

Do you consider them as a class altogether very superior in acquirements and general character to the senior students of the divinity class; is there any marked distinction between

Appendix, N^o 26.Examination of
Rev.N. Slevin, D. D.
20 October 1826.

between them?—There generally is; because the members of the establishment distinguish themselves in the divinity class before their appointment, and have afterwards the advantage of pursuing their studies; a circumstance which must generally give them a superiority over the students of the theology class.

Do you find, generally, that they prosecute their studies with great diligence when in the Dunboyne class?—Since my appointment I have found them very diligent.

Is the obtaining an election in the Dunboyne class an object very much looked to throughout the whole of the studies in the subordinate classes?—It is, I understand, generally looked up to with no small degree of ambition by all students who possess talent and industry.

Are there any young men now in the College whom you particularly consider as endeavouring to be put upon that class?—I have very little intercourse with the students of the other classes, but I hear the third year divines are commonly anxious to obtain the distinctions that will qualify them for the Dunboyne establishment.

Do you think that the circumstance of their having been upon the Dunboyne establishment is likely to have a material effect upon their future destination in life?—I think it is; it is considered a great advantage, and elevates them very much in the eyes of their bishops and of the clergy.

And that they are likely to be held in higher consideration amongst the Roman Catholic priesthood?—I think so; it adds much to their respectability, and gives them a superiority over the rest of the clergy.

Does it produce any immediate effect upon their destination; are they immediately selected for higher situations, or for situations of greater trust?—I understand they are generally preferred in their respective dioceses to persons of equal service; they are commonly named by their bishops to places of trust, and promoted with greater rapidity. I do not mean to say that they are appointed to parishes on leaving the College; they get better curacies, and are promoted to parishes sooner than they otherwise could expect.

It is supposed that it is always known respecting a young man, after he has left the College, whether he has been on the Dunboyne establishment?—It is known, and considered a great honour; it is as well recorded, and gives as much elevation as a degree in other Colleges.

It is laid down in one of the statutes, "Quoniam discipulorum frequentia nimium excrevit classis theologica, hac in plures distributa, singulis Præses præficiet singulos alumnos seniores, quos ad id muneris maximè idoneos judicaverit;" in consequence of this statute, are any of those "Seniores Alumni" called upon to act, or to assist in the instruction given to the theological class, which is said to be too large for one man to superintend it?—That statute is not executed at present, and I believe never was acted upon.

Is the election to fill up the vacancies in the Dunboyne class held once a year, or oftener?—Only once a year for general nomination.

Do you recollect how many were elected to that class at the last election?—Seven.

When was that?—Last June.

Was the number of twenty complete after that election?—No; the number has not been complete since my appointment, nor, I understand, at any period before.

What has been the highest number since your appointment?—The highest number was, I think, fifteen, and that number continued but a very short time.

How many do you expect will be collected next year?—I cannot say; the appointment takes place towards the end of each academical year, after the general examinations.

Has any student who has been elected upon the Dunboyne establishment ever been dismissed for misconduct since you have been there?—No, they have uniformly distinguished themselves equally for good conduct and diligence since I have been connected with them.

Do any of those students learn French or Italian?—They all attended the French class in due course; there is no Italian class in the house, but several of them, I understand, apply themselves privately to the Italian and also to the Spanish.

Are the Commissioners to understand from one of your former answers, that you conceive that not more than twenty or thirty pounds is annually expended in the purchase of books for the library?—Only £. 20 are allowed annually by the Board, but we get permission at times to sell books that were considered superfluous in the library, and a part of the proceeds has been employed in purchasing others; the whole amount of sales has not been yet expended; there is a portion of it in the hands of the bursar.

It appears, in the accounts of late years, that considerable sums, amounting to hundreds of pounds, have been paid within a year to the bookseller; how did that arise?—These sums were paid for class-books, which are afterwards distributed among the students, who pay for them, and were not disbursed for the use of the library.

About what number of volumes does the library contain at present?—I do not know exactly the number of volumes it contains, but I conjecture it may contain about ten thousand.

What do you consider its saleable value might be?—I cannot say; we have a number of very valuable works.

Do you lecture to the Dunboyne students upon the general course of theology?—Yes.

727

Appendix, N^o 27.Further Examination of the Reverend Nicholas Slevin, D. D.; 27th October 1826.

IN lecturing the Dunboyne students upon the general course of theology, do you use Doctor Delahogue's Tract de Ecclesia?—Yes.

Doctor Delahogue maintains in that tract certain propositions respecting the power of the Pope, with reference to matters of a civil or temporal nature, and he maintains the principles of Bossuet as opposed to those of Bellarmine?—He does.

He maintains this proposition, "Christus Petro et ejus successoribus, aut Ecclesiæ nullam concessit potestatem directam vel indirectam in Regum temporalia; proindeque isti nunquam auctoritate clavium, etiam indirectè deponi possunt aut eorum subditi a fide et obedientia illis debita eximi ac dispensari;" do you maintain that proposition?—I do; the same doctrine is expressed in the oath of allegiance taken by Roman Catholics, and which I have sworn; I hold it from conviction. I have always taught it in the class of the senior students under my direction.

Doctor Delahogue answers objections which are made to that doctrine by those who may be supposed to hold the ultra-montane principle, "De Exemplis Pontificum," and again, "De Decretis Conciliorum, quæ adversus independentem Regum potestatem objiciuntur;" do you adopt the view which he takes of the objection made to this proposition, "De Exemplis Pontificum," and "De Decretis Conciliorum"?—I coincide with Doctor Delahogue in his answers to those objections.

You do not consider that either the example of Pontiffs or the decrees of Councils are incompatible with the principles which you maintain, as to the Pope having either civil or temporal power, or the right to interfere in matters of a civil or temporal nature, or to depose kings, or absolve subjects from their allegiance?—I hold that no general Council ever proposed such a doctrine to the church to be received as a doctrine of faith or morals, in which case alone we consider general Councils to be infallible; it is a question, whether some Popes may not have assumed this power, but I am satisfied that no Pope ever proposed this doctrine to the church to be believed as revealed, and held as an article of faith; whether any of them ever really assumed to themselves a temporal power de jure divino, even by an act of private judgment, is a question. Some have been of opinion, that some of the Popes did so, particularly Gregory the Seventh, and Boniface the Eighth; but others think that they did not assume it de jure divino, but only jure humano, in consequence of civil rights which they acquired, or supposed themselves to have acquired, to certain states in Europe; but all our divines and canonists agree, that neither of those Popes, nor any other Pope, ever proposed the doctrine of the deposing power to the church, to be believed as revealed.

What is your own opinion upon that point?—I confess that I have never formed a decisive opinion on that subject; that is, whether any Pope ever seriously asserted the deposing power, jure divino; there are arguments pro and contra, and the arguments that tend to prove that Gregory the Seventh did assume to himself such a power de jure divino, as well as Boniface the Eighth, are very cogent; but whatever their private opinions may have been on this subject, I feel convinced that neither ever declared ex cathedra the doctrine of the deposing power.

Have you not the Pope's own word for it in many of their bulls?—The words of Gregory the Seventh, and of Boniface the Eighth, would seem to suppose rather than to assert such a power, or to declare that they did possess it. I do not remember to have seen in any bull words declaratory of this power; it would seem, from the tenor of their bulls, that they proceeded on the assumed principle, and wished the world to think, that they did possess temporal power de jure divino; but Catholics make a wide distinction between the private opinions of a Pope, or the rights and prerogatives which he may by private judgment assume to himself, and a doctrine which the Pope, as head of the church, proposes to all the faithful as revealed, and to be believed by them as such.

Do you think, that any ordinary reader of those instruments could doubt that they assumed it?—I think any ordinary reader would infer, that they supposed themselves to be possessed of such a power jure divino, and had no objection that mankind should adopt the principle; but I have never read, in the bull of any Pope, any thing decretal on the subject, nor do I think that any Pope ever seriously considered himself invested by divine institution with temporal power. It is worthy of remark, that Boniface the Eighth, in that part of his celebrated bull "Unam Sanctam," which is decretal, merely asserts jure divino, a right over all princes, but abstains (it would seem industriously) from calling this right temporal; thus insinuating that he considered it to be only spiritual.

Do you think that any person alive at the time of the promulgation of those bulls, had any doubt that they assumed it?—There is no doubt that they assumed temporal power, but the question is, whether they assumed it jure divino, or not. I think it will appear, from an attentive perusal of the history of Gregory the Seventh, that he laid claim to different states in Europe, rather on temporal grounds than in his official capacity of Pope. It is remarkable, and I think history will bear me out in the assertion, that an instance cannot be adduced, in which a Pope has ever attempted to depose a sovereign, to whose states the Holy See had not pretended a temporal claim.

Take, for the mere sake of illustration, the famous bull of the Pope, deposing Queen Elizabeth, do you conceive that he considered himself as having any temporal claim on England?—Some of the preceding Popes did consider they had a temporal claim to England, and Pius V. may have considered that he succeeded to their claims.

Do you think that he did?—I do not know what his internal sentiments were, but the contrary does not appear.

Do you think that he considered himself as proceeding jure divino or jure humano, in promulgating that instrument?—I consider that in issuing an excommunication, the Pope always acts jure divino. As to the nature of his claim I cannot say; but I insist that it cannot be proved, that he did not consider himself proceeding jure humano as to the claim he was urging against Queen Elizabeth.

Will you set forth the nature of any temporal claim that you can by possibility suppose he thought himself to possess upon England at that period?—I know that some of his predecessors had such a claim; King John resigned his kingdom to Innocent III.; and it does not appear that Pius V. who excommunicated Queen Elizabeth, did not conceive himself possessed of this claim and proceeded on that ground. I believe he has not declared in the bull on what ground he proceeded. But my position is borne out, that Pius V. might have proceeded on the ground of a temporal claim, which many of his predecessors had urged, and which Paul IV. only eleven years before, had considered himself possessed of. Burnet states, that "Paul IV. was surprised at the boldness of Elizabeth in assuming the crown, a fief of the Holy See." Collier states the same fact.

Will you describe the nature of any temporal claim which the Pope could, even in his own imagination, suppose himself to possess over England at the time in question?—I consider that Popes are capable of acquiring temporal dominion; that they actually do possess temporal dominion; and that they have at different periods and in different degrees, possessed temporal dominion on the same ground as other temporal sovereigns or proprietors, that is, in virtue of social compacts and other human titles. I know that a King of England in the 13th century resigned his states to the Pope, and promised to pay homage for them to his Holiness and his successors. I know that Gregory the Seventh had, more than a century before, claimed a temporal right to England, which indeed was rejected by William the Conqueror, who refused him homage, but gave him Peter's pence. I know that Paul IV. expressed surprise, that Queen Elizabeth should have assumed the Crown of England, a fief of the Holy See, without his permission, a fact related by Burnet in his History of the Reformation, and by Collier in his Ecclesiastical History, both Protestant historians. Whether Pius, at the time he deposed Queen Elizabeth, proceeded on the principle alone that he had succeeded to this temporal right which his predecessors had possessed, or also acted in virtue of a power jure divino, which he assumed to himself, I do not know, because he does not declare in his bull in virtue of what right he attempted to depose her; but whatever may have been the private views that actuated the mind of Pius, it is certain that the Holy See had pretended, at different periods since the 10th century, a temporal claim on England. My position therefore that no Pope ever attempted to depose a prince to whose states the Holy See did not lay a temporal claim is borne out in this instance.

You think it possible that he may have considered himself as possessing temporal rights in England at the time in question?—I think it very possible, however unfounded the claim must have been. Bossuet states that the Pope's pretensions and depositions at that period were scouted with contempt even by the English Catholics.

Are you aware of any event in history that has taken place since the reign of Queen Elizabeth that would render such a claim on the part of the Pope, if advanced at present, more idle than it was in fact at that time; the question now refers to a temporal claim?—I think the doctrine of the Pope's power has been discussed so often during the last two centuries, and the limits of it have been so well ascertained, both by ecclesiastical and political writers, that it would be ridiculous in the Pope at present to pretend to a claim jure divino on any state in the universe. With regard to a temporal claim on England, the English people never acknowledged it, but despised the imbecility of their Kings who submitted to it. This national degradation is assigned by the Barons as one of the causes for deposing Richard II.; but after the Revolution such a claim would not only be ridiculous, but subversive of a fundamental principle of the constitution.

Do not you think it would have been rather ridiculous in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, for the Pope to have claimed a temporal right in England?—I think it was ridiculous in the Pope to pretend to such a right even in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, but ridiculous claims have been often urged even by Popes. However, the Pope had been allowed a right of interference in English politics during the preceding reign, a circumstance that gave some plausibility to the pretension of Paul IV. mentioned by Burnet.

Can you form no opinion at all in your own mind whether the Pope conceived that he was acting jure divino or jure humano, in his proceedings towards Queen Elizabeth?—I could not say positively, for the reasons already assigned, so far as they regard his claim, and act of deposition. In the act of excommunication, he clearly proceeded jure divino. I have shown the Holy See had pretended a temporal right to England, and that is sufficient to bear me out in my position, that no instance can be adduced of a Pope having attempted to depose a prince to whose states the Holy See did not claim a right on temporal grounds.

Are you aware of any bulls issued pretty much about the same time to the inhabitants of Ireland?—I am aware that some bulls were issued by Popes, addressed to the inhabitants of Ireland in the reign of Queen Elizabeth.

Do not you consider yourself, from the office you hold, as a Professor of Theology? you instruct the Dunboyne students in matters of theology?—I do.

If a Professor of Roman Catholic Theology cannot come to a conclusion upon that subject, subject, do you think it possible that Protestants should be able to satisfy themselves about it?—I think it is not necessary for me to come to a decision on this point; and I think it is absolutely impossible for either Protestants or Catholics to decide positively on the private and internal motives from which a Pope may have acted. I have shown, from facts that cannot be controverted, that the Holy See had claimed a temporal right to the English crown. Paul IV. in 1658, conceived he had this right; it is a reasonable conjecture that Pius V. in 1669, may have conceived the same. He does not mention it, therefore I cannot positively assert he acted on this ground alone, any more than a Protestant theologian could positively assert whether Queen Elizabeth conceived she was acting jure divino, when she gave spiritual jurisdiction to Matthew Parker and the other bishops.

From your historical knowledge of the events of that period, independently of any knowledge of the sentiments of the Pope, cannot you come to any conclusion as to whether the Pope was proceeding jure divino or jure humano with respect to Queen Elizabeth?—I have answered already that I cannot possibly say what the private sentiments of Pius may have been. I can judge only from facts, and these warrant a conjecture that he conceived the right he exercised was jure humano, so far as it regarded deposition; but whatever his private sentiments may have been, my position stands unrefuted. Paul IV. considered England a fief of the Holy See, therefore, when Pius V. eleven years after, deposed Queen Elizabeth, the Holy See laid temporal claim to England; he might therefore have conceived himself acting jure humano.

In Dr. Delahogue's Treatise, after stating the propositions, and stating the objections made to his proposition which are drawn "De exemplis Pontificum," and noticing some of the acts of the Popes, he says, "Prima hæc responsio ex eo confirmatur, quod nullus ex S. S. Pontificibus qui ista tentarunt adversus principes, aliquid de legitima sua potestate in regum temporalia definierit, et decreti formâ pronuntiaverit. Imò ubi ab illis depositi principes eisque adhærentes ecclesiæ reconciliabantur, nunquam jussi sunt potestatem deponendi Reges in Pontificibus, tanquam legitimam agnoscere, quamvis illam negavissent. Ipse Bonifacius VIII. in sua bulla unam sanctam, an. 1302, licet in illius expositione pluries dicat temporalem regum potestatem sibi ut Pontifici subjectam esse, sicque solito rerum cursû abripiendus videretur ad illud includendum in parte suæ bullæ quæ definitionem et decretum continet, id solum expressè pronuntiavit: 'Porro subesse Romano Pontifici, omnem humanam creaturam, declaramus, definimus, et pronunciamus omnino esse de necessitate salutis.' Quod quidem quisque Catholicus admittit in spiritualibus: sed ipse Pontifex ex divina providentia a memorandis temporalibus abstinuit?"—That is in substance what I have been saying.

If the Pope were now to assert that he had any right to interfere directly or indirectly in matters of a civil or temporal nature within this realm; if he were to publish an excommunication against His Majesty, to undertake to absolve his subjects from their allegiance, and to send an army into this country for the purpose of invading His Majesty's possessions; what would you conceive to be the duty of His Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects in that case?—I would consider it their bounden duty to reject such decrees, and to despise such excommunications, to continue in their faithful allegiance to their Sovereign, and to assist him to the utmost of their power in resisting such foreign aggression, and invasion of his dominions. And these sentiments I entertain in common with all intelligent Roman Catholics throughout the world, and with the approbation of the Holy See, where the oath of allegiance, which I have taken, is perfectly well known and approved.

Does it not appear from history, that the Roman Catholics of England steadily resisted the bull which was published against Queen Elizabeth, and that they fought in the time of the Spanish Armada in the support of Elizabeth's rights, notwithstanding the bull?—It appears they did. Hume himself relates that many English Catholics at that period "offered that they would make adventures of their own lives in defence of the Queen, whom they named their undoubted Sovereign Lady and Queen, against all foreign foes, though they were sent from the Pope, or at his commandment; yea, some did offer that they would present their bodies in the foremost ranks." This shows what respect the Catholics entertained even at that time for the bulls issued against the Queen in temporal concerns.

Do you conceive that they did more than their duty in so doing?—I think they did only their duty in so doing; and if they had acted otherwise that they would not have done their duty.

Do not all the Catholic states in Europe, independently of the Pope's own states, deny to him any right to interfere, directly or indirectly, in matters of a civil and temporal nature?—All the Catholic states of Europe, and of the world, deny the Pope any right, jure divino, of interfering in civil or temporal matters, and many of them have uniformly resisted all such usurpations when attempted by any Pope since the tenth century. However, the Pope may, by concordats, or conventions, be allowed by states a limited interference in temporal concerns; in such case the Pope will enjoy that degree of temporal power which the state has granted, and no more. On this principle the Pope enjoys more or less interference in the disposal of church property in Catholic countries. But in this country, where the state grants him no power whatsoever, he of course enjoys no temporal right of any description, and his power is confined to spiritual concerns alone.

Do you not conceive that the Roman Catholics, by thus asserting that the Pope has no such right against bulls of the Pope, prove their independence of the Pope, and their sincerity in maintaining that he has no right of a civil or temporal nature, much more decidedly than they would, if they were acting merely in concurrence with him. Do you not think, in other words, that Roman Catholics, who, when the Pope has attempted to exercise a civil or temporal power, have told him, you shall not exercise that power, have shewn that they do not believe that he has that power much more effectually than they would have done if he had consented and given them leave to disclaim it?—I think the opposition given to the exercise of the deposing power, is the strongest disavowal of the existence of the right; and thence I think history proves, that the Catholic world, at no period, admitted such a power in the Pope. As often as any Pope, from the time of Gregory the Seventh to the present time, attempted such an usurpation of power, he was generally resisted by Catholic Sovereigns. It is true, that in some instances they submitted, as in the case of John Sansterre, but their submission was either the effect of necessity, or an impulse of piety; some Princes having, through a mistaken zeal, voluntarily declared themselves vassals to the Holy See. The clergy commonly joined their Sovereign in repelling Papal usurpations: witness the French clergy in the contest of Boniface VIII. and Philip le Bel; the German in that of Gregory VII. and Henry IV.; the English in the case of Paul III. and Henry VII., and even of Pius V. and Elizabeth; the Spanish, when Paul IV. wished to interfere in settling the succession of Portugal. It is true, the deposing power had advocates in the 12th and 13th centuries, and some of a more recent date; some may even yet be found weak enough to support such a prerogative in the Pope; but at no period did scholastic writers hold this doctrine as a matter of faith; it was at all times a matter of mere opinion, and those who supported it seem to have been influenced chiefly by a false notion of the effects of excommunication, imagining that this censure severed the connection between subject and sovereign.

It is stated, in a work on the Roman Catholic claims, addressed by Doctor Doyle to Lord Liverpool, in speaking of the bull of Boniface against Henry the Fourth, that “When Boniface VIII. and Philip the Fair were employed in fighting or anathematising each other, the French church rejected and condemned the right claimed by the Pope to depose their Sovereign. When Julius II. proceeded in a similar manner against Louis XII. and endeavoured to enforce his proceedings by a formidable coalition of the English, Spaniards, Germans and Swiss, the Bishops of France, assembled at Tours, decreed that the papal sentence was null and void; and Duchesne, in his life of Julius II., observes, that they gave to the King an immense subsidy to support the war against his Holiness. At a later period, all the orders of the French church, cardinals, bishops, abbots, canons, and other clergy, met in general assembly, resolved, that consistently with the authority of the sacred Scriptures, the authority of the Councils, and of the Gallican church, they could not sanction the proceedings of Gregory XIV. against their Sovereign Henry IV. The University of Paris imitated their example.” In the declaration of the Catholic clergy in 1682, it is declared thus: “Kings, therefore, and Princes in temporals, are not subject by the ordinance of God to any ecclesiastical power, nor can they be deposed directly or indirectly by the authority of the keys of the church; or can their subjects be exempted or freed from their faith and obedience, and from their oath of allegiance; and this declaration (sententia) necessary for the public tranquillity, nor less useful to the church than to the state, is, by all means to be maintained as agreeable to the word of God, the tradition of the Fathers, and the examples of the Saints.” Do you concur in that principle?—I do perfectly concur in it.

According to your belief and understanding, is that a principle generally held and taught at Maynooth?—It is most certainly taught and held at Maynooth. Every student at entrance abjures the contrary doctrine in the oath of allegiance.

The same principle was maintained in the answer given by the different Catholic universities, who were consulted at the desire of Mr. Pitt, with respect to the Catholic tenets about the year 1788?—All the Catholic universities, consulted by Mr. Pitt, confirmed the same doctrine, and thus proved it to be the doctrine of the Catholic world. Perhaps I should add, to the observations I have made on the power claimed by Popes, that I do not at all consider it necessary to vindicate the conduct of Popes in all their proceedings, or to support that some of them did not really and sincerely claim temporal power, jure divino; for even admitting that they did claim it, nothing would follow injurious to the principles of Catholic doctrine. All Catholics acknowledge that the Pope may err in all points whatsoever, not appertaining to faith or morals; and whether he can err, even in matters of faith and morals, is a question upon which we are at perfect liberty to adopt either side. The opinion affirming that the Pope may err, even when he proposes matters of faith and morals to the universal church, is supported by a number of our best divines. From the admission, therefore, that a Pope had defined ex cathedra the temporal right, no inference injurious to Catholic tenets could be drawn.

When you say, in matters relating to faith, what are we to understand by that expression?—I mean, in propounding matters of faith or morals to the universal church, to be received, believed or practised as revealed doctrine. No divine has asserted that the Pope is infallible in matters of fact, or in the private exercise of his judgment; those who assert his infallibility attribute to him this gift only when, after mature examination, and after fervently invoking the light of the Holy Ghost, as head of the church, he proposes to the whole body of the faithful any doctrine to be believed as revealed, or any rule of morals to be practised as necessary.

He may therefore in a matter which indirectly relates to faith, err?—Most certainly; the warmest advocates of the Pope's authority have, at all times, admitted that he is fallible in all matters that have not been revealed; the only question discussed among divines is, whether, in propounding revealed matters to the faithful, to be believed in his character of head of the church, he can err, and propose as revealed what in reality has not been revealed; now, many things have not only an indirect but also a direct relation with revelation that has not been revealed, and therefore cannot be an object of faith.

Therefore supposing the Pope were to declare that it was advisable and expedient, in order to promote the faith, that Roman Catholic subjects should take up arms against their Sovereign, you hold that he could err in that, and would err?—All divines have, at all times, admitted that he could err in such a case; there never was a doubt entertained on that subject; with regard to morals, the advocates of the Pope's infallibility extend this privilege only to the case in which he dictates general and essential rules of morality, to be observed by all and at all times; they allow he may err in prudential measures.

You have spoken of the opinions of the universities given to Mr. Pitt; do you know, whether two of those universities at any other time gave opinions upon the same points precisely opposite to those which they expressed to Mr. Pitt?—I am not aware that they ever gave opposite opinions on matters relating to the general doctrines of the church, regarding faith or morals.

It has been already stated to us, that Count O'Sullivan Bear has founded some burses in the College of Maynooth?—I understand that a person of the name of O'Sullivan founded several burses in the College of Maynooth; I do not know what his name or titles were; I have merely heard that he was a physician, who had by his practice in the West Indies accumulated some wealth, which, at his decease, he bequeathed to be disposed of in that way for the education of the children of his relations in the county of Kerry.

The Commissioners have before them a book which was written by one of his ancestors, intituled, "Historia Catholicæ Hiberniæ Compendium," by Philip O'Sullivan Bear, which was printed in 1621; will you look at the 203d page of that book, and be so good as to translate the opinions of the Universities of Salamanca and Valladolid, which you will find stated there; we beg to give you the trouble of translating it, because there are many terms in it that are rather technical, and we should wish for your authority as to their meaning.

[The Book was handed to the Witness, containing the following passage.]

"CENSURA Doctorum Universitatum Salmanticæ et Vallisoleti, de presenti Ibernîæ bello, et eorundem declaratio literarum Sanctissimi Domini nostri Clementis Papæ VIII., super eodem bello.

"ILLUSTRISSIMUS Princeps, Hugo Onellus, bellum gerit cum Angliæ Regina, et Anglis ob Catholicam religionem tuendam, ut scilicet liceat illi, et Ibernîs liberè Catholicam religionem profiteri, quam libertatem, vi et armis, Angliæ Regina conatur eripere. Duo nunc circa hoc bellum in dubium revocantur: alterum est, an liceat Catholicis Ibernîs prædicto Principi Hugoni in eo bello favere armis, et quibuscumque aliis modis? alterum, an eisdem Catholicis liceat pugnare contra præfatum principem citra mortale peccatum, et Anglis in eo bello favere armis, et quavis alia ratione? præsertim, cum si Anglis hoc auxilii genus negent, manifesto vitæ periculo, aut amittendi bona temporalia sese exponant. Et præterea cum ipsis Catholicis Ibernîæ a summo Pontifice sit permissum, ut possint prædictæ Reginæ Angliæ obedire, ac, ut legitimam Reginam, tributa illi solvendo, recognoscere, videntur id præstare posse, quod subditorum est, pugnare scilicet adversus Reginæ rebelles, qui debitam ei obedientiam negant, et terram illius ditioni subjectam usurpare videntur. Ut utrique quæstioni satisfiat, tamquam certum est accipiendum, posse Romanum Pontificem fidei desertores, et eos, qui Catholicam religionem oppugnant, armis compellere, ac coercere, cum alia ratio non suppetat tanto malo occurrendi. Est præterea, ut firmum constituendum, Angliæ Reginam Catholicam religionem oppugnare, nec permittere Ibernîs Catholicam fidem publicè colere; eademque de causa prædictum principem, et ante eum alios, quos Apostolicæ literæ Clementis Octavi commemorant, bellum adversus illam suscepisse. His ita constitutis, facile prima quæstio expeditur.

"Citra quæstionem namque est, posse quoscumque Catholicos dicto principi in prædicto bello favere, idque magno cum merito, et spe maxima retributionis æternæ: cum enim prædictus princeps bellum gerat autoritate summi Pontificis ob tuendam religionem Catholicam, ad idque eum Pontifex per suas literas adhortetur, et omnes Christi fideles, ut ex ejus literis constat; atque principi in eo bello faventes multis gratiis prosequatur, ac si bellum contra Turcas gererent, nemo jure dubitaverit, et susceptum bellum justum esse, et magni esse meriti pro Catholica religione; quæ omnium maximum bonum est, tuenda pugnare.

"Est etiam de secunda quæstione omninò certum, eos omnes Catholicos peccare mortaliter, qui Anglorum castra contra prædictum principem sequuntur, nec posse illos æternam salutem consequi, nec ab ullo sacerdote à suis peccatis absolvi, nisi prius resipiscant, ac castra Anglorum deserant. Idemque de illis censendum est, qui armis, et com meatibus in eo bello Anglis favent, vel quid simile tribuunt præter ea tributa consueta, quæ ex summi Pontificis indulgentia, et permissione eis licet Reginæ Angliæ, aut ejus exactoribus solvere. Hæc assertio hac apertissima ratione confirmatur. Quoniam per literas summi Pontificis satis est compertum, Angliæ Reginam, et ejus duces bellum gerere injustum contra prædictum principem, et eos, qui illi favent. Cum enim Pontifex dicat Anglos adversus Catholicam religionem pugnare, eosque non minus, ac Turcas oppugnari debere, eisdemque gratiis eos oppugnantem prosequatur, quibus contra Turcas pugnantes prosequitur, quis dubitet, bellum ab Anglis adversus exercitum Catholicum omnino iniquum geri? At nemini licet iniquo bello favere aut illi adesse sub pœna æternæ damnationis. Peccant ergo gravissimè Catholici qui in castris hæreticorum contra prædictum principem pugnant in bello bello apertè iniquo, et injusto, et omnes, qui eidem bello favent armis, aut commeatibus, aut quâcumque alia ratione quæ per se belli progressum inuent, nec possent rationem inire indifferentis obsequii.

“Nec eos quicquam inuat Apostolicas literas surreptionis notare: surreptio enim intervenire non potest, ubi nulla narratur petitio eorum in quorum favorem expeditur. At summus Pontifex apertè in illis docet se, et antecessores suos sponte exhortatos fuisse ad illud bellum gerendum Iberos principes; ac fideles omnes: et ad eos magis provocandos magnis eos gratiis, ac indulgentiis donat. Qui ergo feri potest, ut surreptitiæ sint literæ, quæ solam exhortationem magnis gratiis erga essentientes cumulatam continent? Nec possunt Catholici Anglis faventes rationibus in secunda questione adductis se tueri: nullum enim peccatum mortale committendum est, etiam si vita, aut res familiaris amittenda sit. Ea verò, quæ bellum injustum per se promovent, ac inuant, exercere, apertè peccatum est mortale. Permissum est etiam Catholicis hæreticæ Reginæ id genus obsequii præstare, quod Catholicam religionem non oppugnat. Nec fuit, nec potest esse Pontificis mens ea obsequia circa Reginam eis permittere, quæ apertè cum fine, et scopo ipsius Pontificis de promovenda in Ibernica Catholica fide, ac religione pugnant. Hanc autem ejus esse mentem, et scopum literæ ipsæ apertissimè declarant. Ex quibus omnibus satis manifestum relinquitur, illustrissimum Principem Hugonem Onellum, et alios Catholicos Ibernici bellum gerentes adversus Reginam hereticam orthodoxam fidem oppugnantem nullo modo rebelles esse, neque debitam obedientiam negare, aut terras Reginæ injustè usurpare, quin potius illos justissimo bello se, terramque suam ab iniqua, et impia tyrannide vindicare, sacramque orthodoxam fidem (ut Christianos, ac Catholicos decet) pro viribus tueri, atque defendere. TRANSLATION.

“THE Opinion of the Doctors of Salamanca and Valladolid, respecting the present Irish War, and the declaration of the same regarding the letters of the Pope Clement VIII. concerning the said War.”

“THE Illustrious Prince Hugh O’Neill is waging war against the Queen of England, and the English people, for the protection of the Catholic religion, that is, that he and the inhabitants of Ireland may freely profess the Catholic religion; a liberty which the Queen of England is striving by force of arms to deprive them of. Two questions are proposed concerning this war,—the first, Whether it be lawful for the said inhabitants to assist the said Hugh O’Neill, with arms or other means?—The second, Whether it be lawful for the said inhabitants to fight against the said Hugh O’Neill, and support the Queen in the said war, without incurring the guilt of mortal sin? Chiefly as they cannot, without risking their lives, refuse the English the required aid. And moreover, as the Pope has permitted the Catholics of Ireland to obey Queen Elizabeth, and to acknowledge her for their lawful Sovereign, paying her tribute, it would appear that they may in all things discharge towards her the duties of subjects, and therefore fight against those who rebel against her Majesty, and usurp her territories.

“That a satisfactory answer may be given to both questions, we assume as certain, that the Pope can constrain and coerce, by force of arms, the deserters of the faith, and those who attack the Catholic religion, when there is no other means left of obviating the evil.

“We also assume as incontestable, that the Queen of England has attacked the Catholic religion, and denied to the Irish the free exercise of the Catholic faith; and that it is on this account only the said Hugh O’Neill, and those whom the aforesaid apostolical letters of Clement VIII. concern, have taken up arms against her. Taking for granted these positions; the first question is easily solved thus:

“It is beyond all doubt, that any Catholic may lawfully assist the said Prince in the aforesaid war, in the well founded hope of meriting thereby an eternal reward. For whereas the Pope has authorized, as it appears from his letters, the said Prince to wage war in defence of the Catholic religion, and exhorted him and all Catholics thereto; and as he has granted to the Prince and his followers the same favours that are usually granted to those who fight against the Turks, no one can entertain a rational doubt that the said said war is just, and that it is meritorious to fight for the Catholic religion, the greatest of all bounties.

"It is also certain as to the second question, that all Catholics sin mortally, who follow the English camp and bear arms against the said Prince; and that they cannot obtain eternal happiness, nor be absolved by any priest, until they have repented, and abandoned the English camp. We say the same of all those who supply arms and provisions to the English army, or lend any other assistance to them, beyond the usual tributes which by the indulgence and permission of the Pope, they are allowed to pay to the Queen of England or her collectors. This assertion is founded on this most evident reason, that it appears from the Pope's letters, that the Queen of England and her generals, are carrying on an unjust war against the said Prince, and those who support him. For as the Pope declares that the English are fighting against the Catholic religion, and ought to be resisted no less than the Turks; and as he has conferred on those who oppose them the same favours which he is wont to confer on those who fight against the Turks; who can doubt that the war which the English are waging against the Catholic army is an unjust one? But it is forbidden under pain of eternal damnation to co-operate or assist in an unjust war. Hence a grievous sin is committed by all Catholics who fight in the ranks of the heretical army in a war which is evidently unjust and wicked, and by all persons who contribute to the said war by the supply of arms, provisions, or in any other way that may tend directly to promote the success of the war, and cannot be considered as an indifferent matter in which obedience is lawful. Nor will it avail them to say, that the said letters are surreptitious, for where no petition has been presented, there can be no surreption. Moreover the Pope declares, that he and his predecessors had encouraged the Irish Princes to undertake that war; and as an incentive thereto grants them graces and indulgences. How then can a document be surreptitious, that merely contains an admonition, crowned with favours held forth to those who agree to it? Neither can the Catholics, who support the English, justify themselves by the arguments advanced in the second question; for a mortal sin cannot be committed, even for the preservation of life or property. But to do any thing, that has of its nature a direct tendency to aid and support an unjust war is clearly a mortal sin; and moreover the Catholics are permitted to pay due obedience to their heretical Queen, in all things that are not repugnant to the Catholic faith. Neither was it at any time, nor can it be supposed to be at present, the intention of the Pope to permit that sort of obedience to the Queen, which would militate against the end and object the Pope has in view of maintaining the Catholic faith and religion in Ireland. From all which it manifestly follows, that the most illustrious Prince, Hugh O'Neill, and the other Irish Catholics bearing arms against the heretical Queen, who is attacking their orthodox faith, are not rebels; neither do they refuse her due obedience, nor unjustly occupy her lands; but on the contrary, that they are defending themselves and their country from a wicked and cruel tyranny, and guarding and protecting their holy faith (as it becomes Christians and Catholics) to the utmost of their power. All which, we, the undersigned do approve and sanction as most certain and true.—Salamanca, 2d Feb. 1603.

I beg to observe that in the "Pacata Hibernia" this document is dated March 1602, and not in February 1603, as in the Hist. Cath. If this date be correct, it was issued before the death of Queen Elizabeth and before the intelligence of the surrender of Kinsale had reached Spain. On reference to Abbé Geoghegan's History of Ireland, I find the same document premised with the following observation: "Whilst the Spanish Court was making preparations to support the war in Ireland, the universities of that kingdom assembled to inquire into the justice of that war. I insert for the benefit of the reader the decision of the University of Salamanca on that subject, without intending to approve of the ultra-montane principles which it expresses. I say the same of the bulls and briefs of Popes quoted in this history." Such were the sentiments concerning this document of an Irish Catholic historian residing in France, unawed by fear and unbiassed by interest. Such are also my sentiments regarding it, and such I am satisfied are the sentiments of all Irish Catholics who abjure on oath those principles, which, however, prevailed very much throughout Europe in 1602, when this document appeared. It was only after 1682, when the French clergy issued their declaration, that the doctrine regarding the Pope's temporal power was universally discussed, and at length exploded. I must observe, however, that the most acute Logician cannot discover a contradiction between the principles asserted in this document, and those delivered in the answer of the same universities to Mr. Pitt's questions. Two propositions are here advanced. 1st. "That the Irish Catholics would sin by co-operating with Queen Elizabeth, in the unjust war she was waging against themselves and their religion." 2d. "That the said Irish Catholics could lawfully assist H. O'Neill, in the war he was sustaining in defence of their religion against the Queen of England, who wished by force of arms to destroy it." It requires an acute eye to discern a contradiction between these propositions and the following advanced by those universities in their answer to Mr. Pitt, viz. "That the Pope has no civil authority, power or jurisdiction within the realm of England, and that he cannot absolve his Majesty's subjects on any pretext whatever from their oath of allegiance." It is true the document alludes to a bull, in which the Pope encourages the Irish Catholics by indulgences to defend their religion. But he does not absolve them from their allegiance—on the contrary, he orders, and the universities approve the order, "that the Catholics do pay due obedience to their Queen in all things that are not repugnant to the Catholic faith." Is not this the Evangelical principle, "Give to Cæsar what belongs to Cæsar, and to God what belongs to God." I do not wish to vindicate the decision of the universities; but I confess I cannot see how it can, with consistency, be arraigned in a country where Paley's principles of resistance are adopted. I cannot help observing, that the Spaniards on this occasion acted the same part towards the Irish Catholics, that Queen Elizabeth had done some years before towards the French Hugonots in rebellion against Charles IX.; and if they had manifested the same scruples as the Irish about resisting their sovereign, I have no doubt but that powerful Queen could have procured from the English Universities, a document similar to that which the Spanish despot wrested from those of Spain. I beg to add that I think it unreasonable to make Catholics answerable for decisions, in which any member or members of their church may apply general principles to particular cases. No Catholic has ever held that the Pope himself may not err in such applications. We are accountable only for the general tenets of our religion universally received as such.

Do you know what effect the issuing of those opinions of the universities produced in Ireland?—I do not; I have never seen this document before. But it is stated by all our historians, that the briefs of Gregory XIII. and Clement the VIII. were disregarded by the Irish Catholics, and even by their clergy, many of whom remained faithful to the Queen.

We beg to refer you to the mention that is made of those opinions in Cox's Hibernia Anglicana. We regret that it is mentioned in the uncourteous terms that were too common in those times, the passage however is so remarkable that we request your attention to it. Will you have the goodness to read it?—The passage is as follows: "These great men having thus submitted, and the kingdom (but especially Ulster) being so wasted and destroyed, that the famine increased to the degree of eating one another as I have already mentioned in my former part. And the number of the Irish being exceedingly lessened by their many tedious and obstinate rebellions, and those that remained (except cities and towns) being so poor that the very estated men had not wherewithal to stock or cultivate their land, nor had any improvements left upon their estates, except perhaps a disinal castle, and a few pitiful cabins: one might expect that this miserable condition, (which requires a long interval of rest and peace to amend it) would oblige these people to live peaceably and loyally under this new King of their own lineage. And perhaps it might have done so, if the universities of Salamanca and Valladolid, had not about this time sent over their determination of that knotty point; that veraxa questio, whether an Irish Papist may obey or assist his Protestant King? which they resolved in the negative, by two assertions. 1st. That since the Earl of Tyrone undertook the war for religion and by the Pope's approbation, it was as meritorious to aid him against the heretics, as to fight against the Turks. And 2d. That it was mortal sin anyways to assist the English against him, and that those that did so can neither have absolution nor salvation without deserting the heretics and repenting for so great a crime. But this new declaration of two such famous Universities, and the impatience of their busy priests, set them a madding again; so that they wanted nothing but power to make a more general and formidable rebellion than ever had been in Ireland, to that time."*

Pray

[Subsequently added by the Witness.]

* I do not consider myself bound to vindicate the document, or trace its effects, any more than a Protestant of this day holds himself responsible for the penal enactments of Queen Elizabeth's reign. I cannot help observing, however, that the malice and want of candour displayed by the author of the quotation, in the false statement he gives of the question before the universities, and of their decision, would alone be sufficient to prove him unworthy of credit, though we did not know that in writing his history he was the servile instrument of a party, from which he courted promotion and obtained it. To the contemptible authority of that sycophant, I oppose that of our best writers on that woeful period of our history. They all agree in stating, that all the efforts of the Spaniards to draw the Irish into their interests proved fruitless; and that, notwithstanding a variety of documents, similar to that in question (many of which, and perhaps the present, were considered spurious), circulated to seduce them from their allegiance, and the many inducements held out to them to join the invading army, the great majority of them continued faithful to the Queen. Morrison states, that "the Spaniards were much disappointed, for no Irish of account repaired to them, except some dependents of Florence M'Carthy, who was then in prison, and had invited them over." The Spanish general, immediately after landing, published a manifesto, given in Pacata Hibernia, page 200; wherein he solemnly declared, "that his design in this expedition was to rescue them from oppression, and re-establish their religion in a free and flourishing state. Yet he found the generality of the people, and even of the clergy, unwilling to assist him." But in spite of Pray state whether you conceive that it was jure divino or jure humano, that the Pope exercised in the interference alluded to by the universities, in the passage that has been read?—I consider the interference on the part of the Pope to which the decree of the university alludes, was jure divino, so far as it was spiritual, and jure humano or sine ullo jure, so far as it was of a temporal nature. The Pope grants indulgences jure divino, but every Catholic confesses that Popes have often abused that power; as supreme pastor, he has also a right to be consulted on moral cases of difficulty; but all Catholics allow that his decisions on particular cases are not infallible. He may in such decisions, like other men, be biassed by passion or prejudice, and when he decides on the justice of a war in which he is a party, every Catholic will disregard his sentence as that of a prejudiced judge.

Then in that instance the Pope did assume to himself to act jure divino in matters between the subjects of this country and their sovereign?—The Pope's bull is not given in full, and therefore I cannot answer distinctly with regard to the nature and extent of its contents. I beg to repeat what I have already stated, that I do not consider myself called upon to vindicate the conduct of Popes in their interference in temporal matters; I have stated already that no inference injurious to the Catholic faith or doctrine can be drawn from the decisions of Popes on particular occasions. We allow that Popes may err, that Popes have erred; that Popes may be very wicked men, and have actually been very wicked men; yet no inference injurious to our doctrine or religion can be drawn from their conduct. Catholics are not required to imitate their conduct or abide by their decisions in such cases. The boundary is well ascertained, beyond which the Pope's authority ceases. From the allusions to Clem. VIII. bull, I collect that he directed the Irish Catholics to obey Queen Elizabeth in all indifferent matters, and to resist her efforts to extirpate their faith; the Pope therefore decided, that resistance was lawful in that case, but his decision in such case was not infallible; as supreme pastor he decides on moral cases jure divino, so does a bishop, a priest, a deacon; it is the duty, jure divino, of every minister of Christ to instruct and direct the faithful, and more especially in all difficult cases; they will, forsooth, sometimes misguide the flock, yet they are their directors jure divino, and in the same sense (though in a less degree) as the Pope; the magistrate, the judge, the chancellor, the senate of the nation, will, in some instances err, or perhaps wilfully abuse their power; yet we must as a general rule, abide by their decisions. Say the same of the Pope's decisions in particular cases. But with regard to papal decisions we have this general rule for our guidance, that as often as they affect temporals they are null, these being beyond the Pope's competency, unless in those countries where he possesses dominion on human titles.

We hope that you are convinced that we give you the fullest credit for those opinions, but the question at present discussed is, what view the Popes have taken of this matter at various periods of history?—In order to judge of the particular views of Popes on different occasions, it would be necessary for me to read over the documents supposed to contain dangerous principles, and to form my opinion on their nature; otherwise I cannot answer with regard to the motives that may have influenced them in their proceedings, or with regard to the particular views which they may have had in their interference on particular occasions. I must again repeat that no Catholic considers himself bound to vindicate the conduct, or defend the decrees of Popes, issued in particular cases. The boundaries of the Pope's power are now fixed, and if he should overstep them, the meanest Catholic would fling back his decree.

Assuming, merely for the sake of trying the principle, that the Spanish universities recited the Pope's proceedings correctly, we wish for your opinion whether such an interference was exercised jure divino or jure humano?—I have already mentioned, that the interference alluded to in the document I have read was (if correctly stated) jure divino, so far as it was of a spiritual nature, and jure humano or rather nullo jure, so far as it was temporal. The Pope, as universal pastor, has a right to decide on moral cases. Bishops and priests having the care of souls, have the same right in a subordinate degree; this principle is acknowledged and acted upon in every Christian society; but such decisions are not incontrovertible, and individuals or communities ought not to abide by them, when they are evidently dictated by passion or prejudice. The Pope also grants indulgences jure divino, yet he may abuse this power, as well as many others which he enjoys by the same right. Now the Pope takes of these pathetic exhortations, the provincials of Munster were as yet so reluctant to engage in any new rebellion, that on the arrival of the Lord Deputy at Cork, several of their chieftains presented themselves before him, with most vehement assurances of their loyalty; so that the Spaniards, who came with the vain hope of seeing a whole kingdom at their devotion, now found themselves confined within an inconsiderable town, unassisted by the natives, and besieged by the Queen's forces. Leland. Hist. Irel. p. 396; and again, in page 192, "Candour obliges us to acknowledge, that the Romish clergy at this time did not uniformly concur in exciting the Irish to insurrection." Sullivan (meaning the author of the Hist. Cathol.) himself confesses, (although it was his business to represent the religious zeal of his countrymen in the most advantageous point of view) "that a considerable party among the clergy recommended a dutiful submission to the government, and opposed the practices of their more intemperate brethren." The same author, who cannot be suspected of partiality to Catholics, states, in page 412, "that bulls were produced, and spread through Ireland, to countenance these principles (ultra-montane), which the moderate Romish clergy affirmed to be surreptitious. The decisions of the Spanish Universities were procured to discredit this opposition. Valladolid and Salamanca denounced all the vengeance of the Almighty against those who should not unite with Tyrone; but the decrees of their contemptible doctors arrived too late. Tyrone had already submitted." If the decision arrived too late, therefore it had not the desired effect, and consequently was not productive of the dismal state of things attributed to it by the malignant author of the Hibernia Anglicana.

takes upon him to judge whether the war then waging in Ireland was a just or an unjust war, and decides it to be unjust, because its object was to extirpate the true faith, declaring that the subjects of Queen Elizabeth could not co-operate with her in such a war; and on the other hand he seems to have declared, that the war waged by O'Neill against Queen Elizabeth was a just war, because it was carried on in the defence of the faith, and therefore that they should co-operate with him; that seems to me to have been the meaning of the Pope's brief, to which the document I read alludes, and it seems also to be the point decided by the universities of Salamanca and Valladolid in the said document, if it be genuine*.

When it was declared that the Catholics of Ireland were to act in a particular manner in a religious war, on pain of eternal damnation, and that they would heinously sin if they assisted the Queen, do you consider that to be propounded as a matter of faith, or as a matter of morals, or as a matter of discipline, or in what other character?—In none of those characters, neither as a matter of faith, nor as a matter of discipline.

In what character do you conceive it to be propounded?—It was given in the character of a decision on a particular question proposed to the Pope, and we never consider the answer given by the Pope, in a particular case, to constitute either an article of faith, a rule of morals, or a law of discipline†.

May not at least the principles upon which the Pope proceeds be collected from the instruments which he puts forth upon such occasions; and if he states general propositions applicable to other cases as well as to those particular ones, is it not fair to suppose that they are the general principles adopted by the court of Rome?—According to the Catholic doctrine we are not bound to adhere to the decisions given in such particular cases as general rules, unless they be universally adopted. Particular decisions are applications of general rules, not the general rules themselves. For instance, in the case before us, the moral principle was, that it is not lawful to co-operate in an unjust war. The Pope applied the principle to Ireland, and may have erred in doing so according to Catholic principles.

Though Roman Catholics are not bound to adhere to them, do you not think that they necessarily exercise so great an influence that many do in point of fact adhere to them, whether bound to do so or not?—In all doubtful cases of moral duty, we ought to prefer the decision of a learned and prudent spiritual director to our own judgment, unless we have reason to doubt of his capacity of forming an accurate and impartial judgment. When the Pope, therefore, pronounces on a moral case, his decision ought to be followed in practice, if there be not a clear reason for rejecting it; say the same of the decision of any spiritual superior. Therefore when the Pope gives a decision in a particular case, those whom it concerns will adhere to it, and will follow it in practice, unless they have clear reasons to reject it. But I say, that according to the principles of Catholics, no one is bound to adhere to it as an article of faith, or as a general rule of morals, and those whom the decision regards ought to reject it, if they have evident reasons for doing so. This evidence they have at present in all cases in which the Pope's interposition is of a temporal nature, unless where he enjoys such power as a temporal prince, or by the concession of the state.

You have been referred to a decree or declaration of certain universities in Spain in the time of James the First, which are represented as inconsistent with the answers of the same universities, to which you formerly referred; have you ever heard of the celebrated Decree of the University of Oxford in favour of passive obedience and non-resistance?—Yes; I am aware that the University of Oxford issued such a decree in the reign of Charles the Second.

Your attention is requested to the following passages in the Homilies of the Church of England. "Now concerning excessive decking of images and idols, with painting, gilding, adorning with precious vestures, pearl and stone; what is it else, but for the further provocation and enticement to spiritual fornication, to deck spiritual harlots most costly and wantonly, which the idolatrous church understandeth well enough. For she being indeed not only an harlot, (as the scripture calleth her) but also a foul, filthy, old withered harlot; (for she is indeed of ancient years,) and understanding her lack of natural and true beauty, and great loathsomeness, which of herself she hath, doth, after the custom of such harlots, paint herself, and deck and tire herself with gold, pearl, stone, and all kind of precious jewels,

[Subsequently added by the Witness.]

* Now as this decision of the Pope was merely a prudential decision, in giving which he was subject to all the frailties of other judges, it remained with the Irish Catholics to examine into the manner in which it was obtained, the motives by which the Pope was influenced, &c. and to reject it, if they considered it to be surreptitious or unjust. The Pope's interference was of a temporal nature, so far as he considered he could coerce heretics by temporal means, and encouraged the subjects to take up arms against their sovereign. We hold all such interference to be altogether unwarrantable in the Pope, whose arms are purely spiritual, and who should leave it to politicians to decide whether ever, and in what cases, subjects can lawfully resist their sovereigns.

† Such decisions bind the parties concerned alone, and them only, when the matter is within the Pope's competency, that is, of a spiritual nature, and the decision is not evidently unjust. If the parties be convinced that the matter of the decision is of a temporal nature, or that it conflicts with the principles of equity, of course they ought to reject it. But in all cases, in which there is not an evidence of the invalidity of the decision, it is the duty of an inferior to abide by the decision of his lawful superior, in preference to his own private judgment.

jewels, that she, shining with the outward beauty and glory of them, may please the foolish fantasy of fond lovers, and so entice them to spiritual fornication with her; who, if they saw her (I will not say naked) but in simple apparel, would abhor her, as the foulest and filthiest harlot that ever was seen."—Then again, "For ye have heard it evidently proved in these Homilies against idolatry, by God's word, the doctors of the church, ecclesiastical histories, reason and experience, that images have been and be worshipped, and so idolatry committed to them by infinite multitudes, to the great offence of God's majesty, and danger of infinite souls; and that idolatry cannot possibly be separated from images set up in churches and temples, gilded and decked gorgeously, and that therefore our images be indeed very idols, and so all the prohibitions, laws, curses, threatenings of horrible plagues, as well temporal as eternal, contained in the Holy Scripture, concerning idols and the makers, maintainers and worshippers of them, appertain also to our images set up in churches and temples, and to the makers, maintainers and worshippers of them."—If a Protestant were to disclaim upon oath, the principles which appear to be here inculcated, particularly in the last passage read to you, would you think yourself justified notwithstanding, in imputing those principles to a Protestant who so disclaimed them; that is, if a Protestant of the Church of England solemnly swore, that he did not think it lawful to treat Roman Catholics as idolators, justly subject "to horrible plagues as well temporal as eternal;" would you think yourself justified, notwithstanding, in imputing to him that he did think it lawful to treat them as such?—I would think it very unfair, and very wicked to impute to any man, or body of men, principles which they abjured on oath.

If Protestants now were to tell you upon oath, that they did not hold towards the Roman Catholics the principles expressed in those Homilies, would you think it your duty to believe those Protestants?—If Protestants declared on oath they did not hold such principles, I would most certainly consider it my duty to believe them.

Do you think it more fair to impute to Roman Catholics of this day principles held in ancient canons, than it would be to impute to Protestants of this day, the principles and language which are found in those ancient homilies?—I think it would be equally unfair and unjust to impute to Catholics principles which they abjure on oath. I think it unfair to impute to the professors of any creed, doctrines which they abjure on oath, and I think it fair to take the creed of every sect from their universally received formularies of faith, and not to impute to them in general the particular doctrines, or the particular practice of individual members of such sect.

In a question lately put to you, reference has been made to the bull "Unam Sanctam," is there not in that bull a passage to this effect; the Commissioners will beg of you to procure for them the bull, but, in the mean time, the question assumes, that this will be found to be a correct translation of it: "Certainly he who denies that the temporal sword is in the power of Peter, but ill attends to the word of our Lord, when he said, 'Put up thy sword into the sheath'; therefore both (to wit, the spiritual and the material sword) are in the power of the church, but the latter is to be used for the church; the former by the church; the former by the instrumentality of the priest, the latter by that of kings and soldiers; but according to the order and sufferance of the priest; but one sword should be subjected to another, and the temporal authority to the spiritual power." Do not you think that that passage expresses at least the opinion of the Pope who promulgated that bull, that he had both the temporal and spiritual power generally, and that the temporal power of kings and soldiers was to be exercised according to his order and sufferance?—My meaning in a former answer was, that no Pope, so far as my knowledge extended, had ever declared, ex cathedra, that St. Peter and his successors possessed temporal power, jure divino. I did not deny that Popes acted on the supposition, and on the apparent assumption, that they possessed such power, though I am inclined to think that no Pope ever thought, bonâ fide, that he enjoyed it jure divino. I positively asserted, and do now repeat that assertion, that no Pope ever proposed the doctrine of temporal power to the universal church to be received and to be believed.

Does not that bull propound the principle as plainly as language can do it?—That bull does not propound the general principle to the universal church; it is a bull regarding a particular case pending between Boniface and the King of France, and I have already mentioned, that no decrees of the Pope regarding particular cases, extend to the church in general, unless they be universally adopted. Boniface the Eighth, in issuing that bull, did not mean to propose a general doctrine to the church, though he employs general expressions in some places*.

Supposing that it did not bind the church, does it not yet express the principles of the Popes?—The bull expresses the principles, either real or feigned, of the particular Pope who

[Subsequently added by the Witness.]

* The bull "Unam Sanctam" was understood to apply to France alone, by Clement the Fifth, who, in his celebrated decree "Meruit," annuls all the effects of it, with regard to the king, the kingdom and the inhabitants of France, without speaking of other countries. If this Pope had considered Boniface's bull to have been general in its tendency, this act of repeal would have been couched in general terms. It has been already remarked, that in the part of that bull which alone bears the semblance of a definition or decree of doctrine, Boniface abstains from using the word temporal, and merely declares that all men are subjected to the Pope's power. "Porro subesse Romano pontifici omnem humanam creaturam declaramus, dicimus, definimus et pronuntiamus esse de necessitate salutis;" which words maybe understood to mean spiritual power only.

who issued it, and his sentiments on the subject of temporal power. (I have already stated my opinion, that no Pope ever really believed that St. Peter was invested by Christ with temporal power, though many of them wished the world should think so.) Clement the Fifth, the successor of Boniface the Eighth, as I have mentioned, undid all that he had done in this and other bulls issued by him against France on that occasion.

Do you mean all that he did in that bull, or all that he did in any other and what respects?—All that he had done against Philip le Bel and the French nation, on the occasion of his memorable contest with that monarch.

Did his recalling it proceed farther than this, that the principle should not be insisted on in France in that instance?—The bull applied only to France; there was question of a particular dispute between Boniface the Eighth and Philip le Bel, and that bull, with many others, was issued on that occasion, and related to that contest only; Clement V. restored matters to the state they had been in before the difference arose, and the succeeding Pontiffs considered the bulls of Boniface as if they never had been issued.

Some instances have been mentioned, in which individual Popes have expressly interfered in the temporal concerns of other states, or assumed, at least by implication, their right to do so; has any Pope, so far as you recollect or know, either by bull or rescript, or other form of decree, relinquished this supposed right, or disclaimed it, whether the right be conceived to be exercised jure divino or jure humano?—I believe no bull has been ever issued disclaiming such a right, or declaring that the Pope did not possess temporal power. The question regarding the Pope's temporal power, has been left to the free discussion of the schools; neither opinion has been ever branded with a censure. However, Innocent II. in approving Bossuet's Exposition of the Catholic Faith, has indirectly sanctioned the negative opinion.

Has any decree of any general council so declared?—No decree has ever been issued on the subject by a general Council. General Councils never interfere in scholastic questions, they only condemn dangerous heresies, subversive of the faith, or dangerous to morals. The opinion, attributing temporal power to the Pope, is not of that nature. The extensive powers enjoyed by Popes in the middle ages, were, in that state of society, found conducive to social order, though, in some particular cases, they abused them. I heard that the present Pope, in a letter addressed to the actual Mexican government, had declared, in general terms, that he considered he possessed no power of interfering in the civil government of countries.

To what document do you particularly refer; can you state the terms of it?—I have my information merely from the newspapers.

Do you recollect a rescript from Pius the Sixth to the Irish Bishops, which was afterwards published by Doctor Troy in a Pastoral Letter, and which is to this effect—referring to the questions about the Pope in this controversy, a clear distinction is to be made between the essential rights of the Pope and those which have been imputed to him: the Church does not teach that the Pope has any right to invade the temporal possessions of Sovereigns, that faith is not to be kept with the heterodox or those of another communion; as to any attempt against the life of the Sovereign, this is a fact, that it is a horrid and detestable crime; and that in that same rescript a direction was given that there should be an addition made to the Pontifical oath taken by Bishops, in order to express their allegiance to the King?—I have heard of that rescript, but have never seen it; the court of Rome has always tolerated the doctrine rejecting the temporal power, but no declaration has been issued by any general Council or by any Pope, declaring that the head of the Church did not possess such a power, and that for the reasons already expressed; but no Pope or Council, general or particular, has defined the opposite doctrine.

Has the doctrine, that the Pope does not possess such a power been entertained by any, and by what Roman Catholic writers of note?—The doctrine denying that the Pope possesses temporal power jure divino, either directly or indirectly, has been supported with greater warmth by the French divines than by those of any other country.

Will you mention the names of any of those divines?—Bossuet, Tournelly and Barkley, who was an Englishman, may be reckoned among the most eminent writers that have most forcibly combated the Pope's temporal power.

Has the contrary doctrine been maintained by any considerable number of Roman Catholic writers in different countries?—The doctrine asserting the Pope's indirect temporal power has been chiefly supported by Cardinal Bellarmine, and after him by some Italian divines and canonists; perhaps I should explain, that by indirect power, they mean that of deposing authority that was exercised in opposition to the law of God.

Are you aware, that it is maintained as a thesis in several Catholic universities, that the Pope has no civil or temporal power?—I am aware that it may be maintained in any Catholic university, but I have never personally assisted at any thesis on that subject.

Are not the graduates of the Sorbonne obliged to maintain that principle, in order to entitle them to a degree?—I understand they were, before the French Revolution; I do not know whether, according to the regulations of the New Sorbonne, the graduates are obliged to subscribe to the four Articles of the French clergy in 1682.

Have you ever seen any of the theses maintained at Coimbra?—I do not recollect to have ever seen a thesis sustained at that university.

In point of fact, according to your information, is that opinion publicly rejected by the Catholic church of France, Spain, Portugal and Germany?—In point of fact, out of Italy, the opinion favouring the Pope's power in temporals is generally rejected, so far as my knowledge extends; the latest Italian canonists either reject the opinion or are totally silent on

on the subject; Devoti, a very modern canonist, whose "Institutiones Juris Canonici" are used as a class-book in Rome, says not a word on the subject, so that we may consider Bellarmine's opinion as completely abandoned and exploded, even among the Italians.

Have the limitations with respect to the Papal authority, which are expressed in the propositions commonly called the Liberties of the Gallican Church, ever been formally recognised and adopted by the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland?—The four Articles, adopted by the French Clergy in 1682, have not, I believe, been formally adopted or received by the Bishops of any other country.

Have the principles of those Articles with respect to the questions before put to you, as to the right of the Pope to interfere in matters of a civil or temporal nature, been adopted by the Irish Roman Catholic church?—They have been adopted in substance by the Bishops of Ireland, who have frequently, as often as occasion required it, declared their sentiments on this head in the most decisive manner.

Do you recollect a declaration published by the Roman Catholic prelates at the commencement of this year, upon the subject?—I do; I have read it; and all our Prelates therein declare their sentiments on that subject in a very clear and positive manner, and reject all interference of the Pope with the temporal rights of Sovereigns.

In the oath of allegiance prescribed to Roman Catholics by the Statute of 33 Geo. 3, chapter 21, there are these words; "I also declare that it is not an article of Catholic faith, neither am I thereby required to believe or profess that the Pope is infallible;" is it not your conception, that that also uniformly has been the doctrine of the Roman Catholic church, that its members should not be bound to believe that the Pope is infallible?—It has always been the doctrine of the Catholic church; the Pope's infallibility has never been considered an article of Catholic faith.

You will observe that there is an obvious distinction between being bound to believe a thing and actually believing it; is it not a matter of fact that a very considerable proportion of Roman Catholics do believe that he is infallible, though not bound to believe so?—So far as my knowledge extends, I can declare as my firm opinion, that the greater part of Catholics do not consider that the Pope is infallible.

You will observe that the question has reference merely to an act of the Pope, when declaring ex cathedra a matter of faith. That being explained, is it your impression, that the majority of the Catholics do think that he may err in so declaring a matter of faith?—The only question is respecting the Pope speaking ex cathedra; so far as my knowledge extends, I think the majority of Catholics are inclined to embrace the opinion that he may err, even in matters of faith, when speaking ex cathedra.

When you say that they are inclined to embrace that opinion, the Commissioners would naturally conclude that you do not mean to say that they have actually embraced it, but that they consider it as a matter of great doubt?—I mean to say, that they consider it the more probable of the two opinions; on such a point it is impossible to decide with certainty; it is a point on which the most learned men in our church have disagreed; the most we can declare is which opinion appears to us the more probable, and I think the majority of Catholics consider the opinion, that the Pope can err, even in proposing ex cathedra matters of faith, as the more probable. I speak from my own experience.

Do you mean to say that it is a probable opinion, that he may be infallible?—I mean to say, that the majority of Catholics consider the other opinion, affirming that he is fallible, as the more probable; speaking however from my own experience.

Do you mean to say that they are both probable, by the expression "more probable"?—I do mean that both opinions are probable; opposite opinions may both be probable, when cogent reasons weigh on both sides; there are several matters in which we never can advance beyond the bounds of mere probability; this occurs even in moral questions every day, on which we find the most learned men divided in their opinions.

Are we to collect that the Roman Catholic church has no doctrine at all upon that subject?—The Roman Catholic church has never proposed any doctrine regarding the Pope's infallibility to the faithful to be believed.

Are we to conclude therefore that she holds no such doctrine, because it is one thing to declare a doctrine and another to hold it?—The Roman Catholic church does not hold any decided doctrine on that point. No doctrine is considered of Catholic faith, that has not been defined as such by the universal church, assembled in Council, or is not held as such by the unanimous consent of the church dispersed. Now the Catholic church in neither relation has confirmed the doctrine of the Pope's infallibility.

It is clear then that it does not negative it?—It does not negative it; it neither affirms nor denies it. It is a maxim with our church, not to interfere with opinions that do not conflict with any principle of faith universally and explicitly received in the church. The Pope's infallibility is not a point of this nature.

You have said that you think the majority of Roman Catholics with whom you are acquainted, are inclined to the opinion that the Pope is fallible?—I have stated that as my opinion.

Of course there is a considerable number, though according to your impression not the majority, who are not of that opinion?—Certainly so.

Have you any means of forming a judgment what proportion of the present Roman Catholic bishops of Ireland may be of opinion, that the Pope is infallible?—I do not know the sentiments of our bishops on that head.

Do you know the sentiments of any of them?—I do not recollect to have heard any bishop declare his sentiments on that subject.

Appendix, N^o 27.Examination of
Rev.N. Slevin, D. D.
27 October 1826.

Then for aught you know they may be unanimously of opinion that the Pope is infallible?—They may be so; but I am sure they never came to any agreement on that subject, knowing full well that every one is at liberty to think as he may please concerning it; their private opinions may or may not be so; but I have no reason to assert positively what opinion they hold on the subject.

Are you inclined to the opinion that there is no bishop in the Roman Catholic church in Ireland, who sincerely in his conscience believes the Pope to be infallible in matters of faith?—I could merely express a conjecture upon that subject, for I mentioned before that I never heard them declare their sentiments upon it; so that it would be improper for me to attempt to give an answer upon a point concerning which I have no grounds to form a judgment.

You have offered already a conjecture that they are not unanimously of opinion that the Pope is infallible; the question now is, whether your conjecture extends to this further length, that there is no one of them that holds that opinion?—I cannot answer positively on that subject; this I know, that whichever side they may embrace, they embrace it merely as an opinion, and do not form any certain or decisive judgment on the subject.

You do not go the length then of conjecturing that every one of them holds the opinion, that the Pope is fallible?—I think it would be improper for me to advance any conjecture on the subject, as I have no grounds of forming a judgment.

You have brought from Maynooth a book, with which you are doubtless well acquainted, the Hibernia Dominicana?—I cannot say that I am very well acquainted with it; I have sometimes looked into it.

We observe that there are no fewer than four copies of it in the library catalogue, can you state any particular reason for that?—The only reason I can assign for it is, that I understand several bequests and donations of books have at different times been made to the library, and that it is likely copies of that work might have been bequeathed or bestowed by different persons.

Will you be so good as to look at the title page, and say where the Hibernia Dominicana appears to have been printed?—It appears to have been printed at Cologne, in Germany.

Do you believe it to have been really printed at Cologne?—I heard it was not, but I cannot positively say where it was printed.

Will you look at the list of subscribers, the Commissioners believe you will find them to be pretty nearly the Roman Catholic clergy of Ireland of the day, who were of course resident in Ireland?—The subscribers appear to have been generally Roman Catholic clergymen.

Where, if not at Cologne, may you have heard, as a matter of conversation, that that book was really printed?—There is some impression on my mind that I heard it was printed at Kilkenny. I am in reality little acquainted with the work.

To what cause should you attribute it, that a book really printed at Kilkenny, should assume on the title page to be printed at Cologne?—I know no other reason but that the contents might perhaps be offensive to the English Government.

Who was the writer of that book?—The writer I believe, was the Roman Catholic Bishop of Kilkenny.

What was his name?—De Burgh.

At what period did he die?—I do not know his history, further than that I recollect to have heard, he was a father of the Order of Saint Dominick, who studied in Rome, and was, on the presentation of the Stuart family, promoted by the Pope, to the see of Ossory. It appears that family, even after their deposition, were allowed that privilege by the holy see.

Will you look at the supplement to the book, and that will perhaps inform you of the time at which he must have been alive?—[The book was handed to the Witness.]

Upon looking at that supplement, have you any difficulty in naming the year in which the writer of it was alive?—This edition might have been given after his death.

What is the date of it?—1772.

Does not the author say, in his preface to the supplement, that he had published it originally in 1762, and that he had gone to Rome in 1769?—He does.

Have you any doubt, after reading that preface, that he was the Roman Catholic Bishop of Ossory so late as 1769, and perhaps at a later period?—I have not.

How does he designate himself in the title page to the supplement?—By the title of “Episcopum Ossorensem, omitting the vowels, (Ep-sc-p-m Oss-r-n-s-m.)

For what reason do you conceive the vowels were omitted?—Perhaps he was afraid at that time to assume that title openly.

Will you look at page 143 of that work, and mention by what epithets he describes the repeal of the Act of Settlement, and the passing of the Act of Attainder of the Protestants by the Parliament of James the Second?—In the passage referred to he calls the decrees issued by that Parliament “Salubria decreta” which are thirty-five in number; the eleventh section now before me runs thus, “Salubria eo in Parlamento facta sunt decreta, numero triginta quinque, quorum principaliora, notatû magis digna, sunt sequentia”

How many does he go on to particularize?—Nine.

Will you have the goodness to read them?—They are as follows: 1. Regnum Hiberniæ declaratur independens à Regnis Angliæ et Scotiæ.—2. Leges in Parlamento Anglicano latæ Vim non habebunt in Hibernia.—3. A sententiis per Justitiæ Curias in Hibernia factis non dabitur appellatio ad Curias Angliæ.—4. Publica conscientiæ conceditur libertas, omnesque abrogantur Leges, ac earum Clausulæ eidem refragantes.—5. Tolluntur, et abolentur abolentur omnes Inhabilitates Hibernis Catholicis, ne militaribus, curialibus, civilibusve fungerentur Muneribus inflictæ.—6. Decreta in Anglia tempore Caroli Secundi Regis facta, vulgo Acta stabiliminis, anglicè, the Acts of Settlement, nuncupata, quibus iniquissimæ confiscationes, et Donationes, de Hibernorum Catholicorum Bonis per Cromwellum Usurpatorem factæ, confirmabantur, irrita, et nulla declarata sunt.—7. Res eas possessiones, quas in Hibernia dùm Dux esset Eboracensis (vulgò York) habuit, restituet, et vicissim, in Recompensationem, habebit in Domino suo ea fugitivorum Rebellium Bona, quæ Regio jam adjudicata sunt Fisco.—8. Durante Tredecim Mensium Spatio, singulis Mensibus solventur, et numerabuntur Regi Viginti Millia Librarum Sterlingarum.—9. Factæ sunt sanctiones contra eos, qui pœnis obnoxii rebellarunt contra Regem, et sine debita Facultate ex Hibernia fugerunt.”

Is not the 6th of those nine decrees the repeal of the Act of Settlement, and is not the last of them the Act of Attainder of those who had taken the contrary part to King James the Second in Ireland?—With regard to the 6th there can be no doubt at all that it is so; with regard to the 9th, I believe it is what the question supposes it to be.

Are not those two statutes, as well as the other seven with which they are connected, termed by the author of that work “Salubria decreta” and “Notatû magis digna”?—They are.

Does it not appear that the expression, “salubria decreta,” would apply to the whole thirty-five Acts of Parliament, and the expression “Notatû magis digna,” to those nine that include the two specified in the question?—Just so; the expression seems to apply to all the Acts passed in King James’s parliament.

Will you translate the paragraph which immediately follows the enumeration of those nine Acts?—“These and the twenty-six other decrees, which will be too long to insert, were issued in that assembly of the nation concerning which, though very just in themselves, whilst Protestants murmured, the Orthodox might oppose the following words of the first Book of Maccabees, chapter 15, verses 33d and 34th, viz.: Neither have we taken the land of another, nor do we seize the property of another, but the inheritance of our fathers, which was unjustly possessed for a time by our enemies; but we having an opportunity, claim the inheritance of our fathers.” The writer clearly alludes to the Catholics who lived at the time the Acts were passed in 1687.

Will you turn to page 167 of the book, and be so good as to translate the commencement of the 17th section, as expressive of the author’s opinion of the infallibility of the Pope?—That part of the 17th section runs thus: “And truly if the Roman Pontiff, who is the head of the church, were not infallible in deciding on questions of faith, the condition of the synagogue would have been better than that of the church, for in the former there was one high priest, who infallibly terminated all controversies that arose concerning the law, consequently a better provision would have been made for the synagogue, the hand-maid, than for the church, the spouse, better for the shadow than for the body, better for the figure than the thing represented, and the consummation of all the figures, than which nothing can be more absurd. The Pope’s infallibility also appears clearer than the noon-day light from the ancient practice of the church.” This was the private opinion of the writer, which of course he was at liberty to maintain, but had no right to support as a doctrine of the church.

Will you look a little lower and translate the sentence that is pointed out now to your attention?—This is another part of the same section, “The general Councils themselves very openly assert the infallibility of the Roman Pontiff, for the dogmas of faith defined by them were defined before by the supreme rulers of the church.” The author alone was accountable for his opinions, it is unfair to hold any other accountable for them.

Do you understand by that, that it is meant by the author that the Popes in fact had anticipated the decrees of the councils in substance?—That appears to be the meaning of the author, he is delivering his private opinion, and supporting it by plausible arguments.

We will trouble you to translate one passage more relating to the Gallican liberties, the first paragraph of the 18th section?—That paragraph runs thus: “Neither is the contrary opinion which asserts that the Roman Pontiff is not infallible without a general Council adopted by the whole Gallican church, as some who deceive themselves, or wishing to deceive others, circulate among the people, for besides Aquinas, the ornament of the University of Paris, and all the ancients, the celebrated Doctor Duvallius, nearer to our times maintains it, seeing that the promises of Christ for the privilege of infallibility passed to the Roman Pontiffs, the successors of St. Peter, is taught by all Catholic doctors, except a few. Whence the Pope can, without a synod, by the plenitude of his monarchical power irrefragably condemn errors. And whether the adversaries will or not, the ancient chiefs of the Gallican church always clearly acknowledge infallibility in the Supreme Pontiffs.”

Examination of
Rev.

N. Slevin, D. D.
28 October 1826.

YOU have been interrogated with respect to a work, intituled the "Hibernia Dominicana," are you aware that the bishops of Munster shortly after that work appeared, pronounced a solemn condemnation of it?—Yes, I understood they did in a meeting held at Thurles in 1775.

Do you understand this to be the condemnation pronounced at the time?

[Here the following paper was shown to the Witness.]

DECLARATION of the Titular Bishops in July 1775, on occasion of the "Hibernia Dominicana."

"A Book under the title of the 'Hibernia Dominicana,' having been printed, as appears from its title page, in the year 1762, and a supplement thereto published in the year 1772, as appears also from the title page thereof, the general uneasiness and alarm which the said book and supplement occasion among our people, have put us under the necessity of publicly examining them. We have attentively examined them, and we think it incumbent on us to express, in the most decisive manner, and with all sincerity, our entire disapprobation of them, because they tend to weaken and subvert that allegiance, fidelity and submission, which we acknowledge ourselves to owe from duty, and from gratitude, to His Majesty King George the Third, because they are likely to disturb the public peace and tranquillity, by raising unnecessary scruples in the minds of our people, and sowing the seeds of dissension amongst them, in points in which they ought, both from their religion and their interest, to be firmly united. And because they manifestly tend to give a handle to those who differ in religious principles from us, to impute to us maxims that we utterly reject, and that are by no means founded in the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church. For these reasons we consider it our indispensable duty, not only to manifest, as we hereby do, our sentiments, but also to inculcate the same as far as in our power, to those under our care, but particularly our clergy, to whom we most earnestly recommend, that they be careful and zealous upon all occasions, to instruct their flocks in those unfeigned principles of allegiance, fidelity and attachment, to the person and government of our gracious Sovereign, His Majesty King George the Third, which we conforming ourselves to the doctrine of our Holy Church, and to the repeated instructions of the Supreme Pastors thereof, have heretofore constantly enforced, and will always, with God's blessing, continue to enforce by our words and our example. Given under our hands in Thurles, this 28th day of July 1775."—Yes.

Are you aware that the principles of the oath of allegiance taken by Roman Catholics in which they disclaim any right of the Pope in civil or temporal matters have been indicated by the late Doctor Butler, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Cashel?—I am aware that he took a very active part in the adoption of the oath of allegiance prepared by Parliament about the year 1775.

Will you look at the work now shown to you, intituled, "A Justification of the Tenets of the Roman Catholic Religion, and a refutation of the charges brought against its clergy by the Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of Cloyne. By Doctor James Butler." Is that the work to which your former answer referred? [A book being shown to the witness.—This is the work to which I alluded.

That book contains the following passage, in page 69, in a letter addressed by Doctor Butler, to the Cardinal Secretary of the Propaganda, after referring to the penal laws then in force against the Catholics, "It would be a subject of consolation to us, and of merit, were it on account of our religion that we endured what we do from them" (meaning the laws); "but they are not the principles of our faith or morals that have edged such laws against us, but certain scholastic opinions which, through too intemperate a zeal, have been unhappily spread amongst us; these being looked upon by our dissenting brethren as a part of our creed, excite their aversion for a religion so inimical to the safety of kings and tranquillity of subjects. They cannot but be alarmed to hear that faith is not to be kept with heretics; that kings excommunicated can be murdered by their subjects; that the Sovereign Pontiff can absolve (or dispense) them from their oaths of allegiance; that he has even a power of disposing of Christian kingdoms; and they are terrified by a religion which they believe fraught with such principles. We, the Prelates of Munster, desirous of removing such prejudices from their minds, did unanimously and publicly declare that a formulary of allegiance enacted by the Parliament of this kingdom, in which those opinions are required to be abjured by us, contained nothing contrary to the principles of our belief, and of course that such opinions by no means belonged to our creed. God grant that this our declaration may serve to open their eyes, that when they shall have found that there is nothing feared from our religion, dangerous either to the authority of kings or the safety of subjects, they may shew us the same favour as they do the other inhabitants of this kingdom." Do you concur in the sentiments expressed in that passage?—I do perfectly; they are the sentiments of every Roman Catholic.

In page 75, of the same work, Doctor Butler, in answering certain charges brought by the then Bishop of Cloyne, against the Roman Catholics, grounded in some degree on the Hibernia

Hibernia Dominicana, speaks thus: "But, asks his Lordship, the Bishop of Cloyne, Who is the authorized voucher of the decrees of the Gallican church? (and who, he would, I suppose ask, is the voucher of the Sorbonne), to be set in opposition to the Pope's Legate? I will ask what is the opinion of Doctor Burke, in opposition to the united decision of all the titular Bishops of Munster, with the subsequent concurrence of all the Irish titular Prelacy, and in opposition to the Superintendent of the Catholic church in Ireland, a person higher in dignity relatively to us than the Legate at Brussels? And what is the opinion imputed by the Right Reverend the (Protestant) Lord Bishop of Cloyne, in opposition to the positive and well known doctrines of the whole body of (titular) Bishops, asserted by them and not rejected by the See of Rome; but on the contrary, allowed to be the tenets of their religion? When, however, we have denied the power of deposing temporal sovereigns, as it is asserted by Doctor Burke to belong to the Pope, it has been answered that Popes have yet frequently excommunicated and deposed temporal princes; very true. A bull of this kind was published against Queen Elizabeth, by Pope Pius the Fifth. But what did her Roman Catholic subjects upon it? they prayed for her and fought for her; and afterwards in an insurrection, headed by Westmoreland and Northumberland, the greater part of the noblemen and gentlemen, (for the clergy could not venture to assemble), voluntarily made a tender of their lives in defence of her Majesty's title, against the Pope himself, or any Popish invader, and did actually join her standard to oppose those two noblemen, though they were both Roman Catholics." Do you not understand Doctor Butler in that passage, as applauding the conduct of those English Roman Catholics, who in defiance of the Bull of the Pope, maintained their allegiance to Queen Elizabeth?—I do; he shews that the example of Popes, far from constituting a rule of Catholic doctrine, has been, when bad, reprobated by Roman Catholics; which he instances by the conduct of the English Catholics, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth.

Will you describe the book in which you find the condemnation of Burke's "Hibernia Dominicana," to which you have referred?—The book is intituled, "A Justification of the Tenets of the Roman Catholic Religion, and a Refutation of the Charges brought against its Clergy, by the Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of Cloyne. By Doctor James Butler. Dublin, printed by B. Byrne, 1787."

Was not Doctor Butler, titular Archbishop of Cashel?—Yes; several documents in this book shew that he was.

Is it in the Appendix to that pamphlet, that a copy of the condemnation to which you refer, is contained?—It is in the body of the work.

Will you state by how many Roman Catholic bishops it is signed?—By seven.

Was Dr. Butler one of them?—He was the first who signed it.

Are those bishops the seven bishops of Munster?—One of them was the titular Bishop of Kildare, who was then casually at Thurles; the document is dated from Thurles.

That condemns the political opinions contained in the "Hibernia Dominicana;" but can you point out any thing in it, that goes the length of condemning Dr. Burke's opinions, as to the infallibility of the Pope?—This declaration seems to condemn in general, the principles expressed in the work that had excited dissatisfaction and given offence; but it does not specify the principles or particularize the doctrine of the Pope's infallibility. As that opinion is tolerated and not abjured in the oath of allegiance, Dr. Butler could not censure Dr. Burke for holding that doctrine, though he justly blamed him for wishing to force it on Catholics, as the doctrine of the church.

Pray explain how it is a tenet permitted, and not abjured, in the oath of allegiance?—We merely declare in the oath of allegiance that we do not hold it as an article of faith, but we may hold it as an opinion, whereas we abjure the doctrine of the Pope's temporal power altogether; and therefore cannot maintain it even as a mere opinion; it is one thing to say that a doctrine is not certain, and another to declare that it is false. Many things of which we cannot attain certainty of any kind, may, notwithstanding, be very true. We abjure the doctrine of the Pope's temporal power as false, we declare that the doctrine of his infallibility is not certain; but we do not abjure it as false.

The words of the oath of allegiance are, that "it is not an article of the Catholic faith, neither am I thereby required to believe or profess that the Pope is infallible." You will observe the distinction between being bound to believe it and actually believing it. Is it not thus a possible state of things that no Catholic should be bound to believe it, and yet that all Catholics might actually believe it?—No Catholic can believe it as an article of faith, because it is not one. It is a possible state of things, though not indeed probable, that all Catholics might adopt it as a private opinion, having a degree of probability; but it is impossible, in our principles, that they should believe it as an article of faith, when it is not one*.

The words of the oath are, that they are not bound to believe it?—Yes; whereas, we are bound to believe all articles of faith.

Is there not a difference between really having an article of faith, and being bound to have an article of faith?—According to our doctrine there is no difference. We are bound to

[Subsequently added by the Witness.]

* The proposition, that the whole church may believe actually what they are not bound to believe, involves a contradiction in our principles; for whatever the whole church believes actually, is an article of faith, which consequently all are bound to believe.

to believe every article of faith; but a matter of mere opinion, as such, can never be an object of divine faith*.

You have stated, that it is a particular part of your office to form the religious opinions of the Dunboyne students in Maynooth College?—I am their Professor.

In theology?—Their Professor in Theology, Canon Law, and Ecclesiastical History.

Those students are at present eleven in number; the Commissioners beg for your opinion as to what proportion of that number of eleven do actually believe, without being bound to believe, that the Pope is infallible in spiritual matters?—I mentioned, already, that a matter of mere opinion can never be an object of divine faith, and therefore (accurately speaking) cannot be believed; it may be held as a mere opinion, but never can be an object of faith; therefore none of my students can believe the infallibility of the Pope, speaking with correctness; they may hold it as an opinion; whether any of them do, in fact, hold it as an opinion, I cannot positively say, but I am inclined to believe they do not.

Not one of them?—I am inclined to think none of them hold it, as the more probable opinion.

As to his infallibility in spiritual matters?—As to his infallibility in spiritual matters, that is, when he speaks ex cathedra, proposing matters of faith to the universal church to be believed. I am inclined to think that none of them hold the affirmative opinion, but I cannot positively assert this, because it is a maxim with me, in all matters of opinion, after explaining the reasons pro and con, to leave it to their judgment to adopt which opinion they please; in matters of mere opinion both sides of the question are tolerated, and therefore I think every man has a right to judge for himself, according to that admirable principle of St. Augustine, "in necessariis unitas, in dubiis libertas, in omnibus caritas."

Have you explained to them the grounds pro and con, with respect to that opinion?—When the question was discussed in our class, we weighed the arguments advanced on both sides, without coming to any decision.

Will you be so good as to state those reasons for each side of that opinion to the Commissioners?—I cannot be supposed to recollect, without time to reflect, the numerous arguments adduced on either side; but for the satisfaction of the Commissioners I will state, that in favour of the infallibility of the Pope very strong texts of scripture are quoted, particularly the words of Christ addressed to St. Peter, Math. 16. "Tu es Petrus et super hanc Petram edificabo ecclesiam meam et portæ inferi non prevalebunt adversus eam." And again, Luke 22. "Ego autem rogavi pro te ut non deficiat fides tua."—Many other texts are quoted, and a variety of arguments, from holy fathers and councils, brought to strengthen this opinion, which it would at present be too tedious and even difficult for me to repeat.

It is a question of such importance that the Commissioners would wish you to state to them the two sides of the question at present?—On this side other texts of Scripture are quoted, in which our Saviour tells St. Peter to feed his flock, John 21, "Pasce oves meas pasce agnos meos;" by which words the advocates of this opinion understand, the power of feeding the flock of Christ with the word of life, and consequently of expounding the doctrine of faith. They also endeavour to prove their opinion by the authority of councils, and chiefly by that of Chalcedon, the fathers whereof, after hearing the letter of Leo the Great to the Patriarch of Constantinople, in which the Pope expounded the faith of the church regarding two natures in Christ, all exclaimed, "Petrus per Leonem locutus est;" and the same fathers, in their synodical letter, call the Pontiff "fidei custodem et St. Petri interpretem." But I should never end if I were to go over all the councils, holy fathers and divines quoted in the support of this opinion.

What are the Scripture authorities against the doctrine of the infallibility of the Pope?—The divines, who impugn the Pope's infallibility, contend that this gift was promised to the church, and not to St. Peter alone. This they show from various texts of Scripture, as Math. last ch. "Ecce ego vobiscum sum omnibus diebus usque ad consummationem seculi." Timoth. 3. "Ecclesia dei vivi est columna et firmamentum veritatis." They contend that the texts quoted by their adversaries do not prove the infallibility of the Pope, because St. Peter represented the whole church at the time, and the promises addressed to him, were not made to him personally, but to the whole church, of which he was the representative.

Do you, upon those occasions, state to them the weight of authority among writers of eminence in the Roman Catholic church that have contended for the infallibility of the Pope?—Of course we refer to the most eminent writers on both sides.

Do you state the names of the writers of eminence in the Roman Catholic church who have contended against the infallibility of the Pope in spirituals?—Certainly, we take occasion to mention them also.

Will you mention any of the latter class to the Commissioners?—Those who contended at all times with the greatest warmth and most success against the infallibility of the Pope in matters of faith, were Bossuet and the French divines.

Whom do you mean by the French divines?—Nearly all the French divines, at least all the Faculty of Paris impugn the infallibility of the Pope. I mentioned Bossuet, Launoi, and Tournelly particularly, because they treat the question more diffusely than the rest.

Did

[Subsequently added by the Witness.]

* What is at one period only a matter of opinion, for want of evidence that it is revealed doctrine, may afterwards become an article of faith, when by a declaration of the church we acquire an evidence of the point having been revealed.

Did any of the French divines who were of the order of the Jesuits ever publish against the infallibility of the Pope in spirituals?—The Jesuits are considered to be generally favourable to the Pope's infallibility.

Could you mention the name of any one Jesuit writer of any nation, who has held the opinion of the Pope's fallibility in spirituals?—I cannot mention any at present, but some of them may have held that opinion.

Will you state any other arguments that are brought forward in support of the opinion of the fallibility of the Pope?—Those who deny the infallibility of the Pope, support their opinion chiefly by alleging instances in which Popes have really and in fact erred in matters of faith; others in which particular churches refused to submit to their decisions, and many in which the sentence of the Pope was not considered sufficient, but general Councils were considered necessary to decide controversies.

Could you mention any such instance to the Commissioners?—One of the instances of having actually taught error, is that of Pope Honorius.

In what did he err?—He was accused of a heresy called Monotholism, and condemned by the 6th and 7th general Councils, whether justly or unjustly is a question, but those who deny the Pope's infallibility adduce this as an instance in which the Pope embraced and taught heretical doctrines; another instance commonly alleged is that of Pope Liberius.

What was his case?—He is accused of having embraced Arianism, and having subscribed an Arian formulary of faith.

Was he condemned for it?—No; he was not condemned in any council. If he erred at all he repented in exile, and made profession of the true faith; however I must add, that the conduct of these two Popes is vindicated by the divines who hold the opposite opinion, and even by several of those who deny the Pope's infallibility.

Will you explain what is the import of the term which is used in one, if not more of the professions of the Roman Catholic faith, where the Pope is described as vicar of Jesus Christ—what is the extent of authority and jurisdiction in spirituals expressed by that term?—We say that the Pope is head of the church, and vicar of Christ on earth, because he was appointed by Christ to govern the visible church on earth in his name and by his authority, who though not visibly present, is its invisible and supreme head.

Can he err in that government?—Concerning the supremacy of the Pope, Catholics are required to believe only that the Pope is the head of the church, successor of Saint Peter, and vicar of Christ, and that he received through Saint Peter, from Christ, the power of ruling, of governing and of feeding the whole church of Christ; these are the words of the Council of Florence, in which the Greek and Latin churches united, established the spiritual jurisdiction of the Pope over the whole church, proposing to us what we are to believe on that subject. We are not therefore required to believe that he cannot err in the exercise of that power.

Is that Council received as a general Council?—It is.

Is the power thus declared by that general Council to be vested in and committed to the Pope, understood to be so committed to him individually and personally, that is, to each successive Pope, without the support or aid of other authority?—That power is considered to belong to every Bishop of Rome canonically appointed, constituted and installed. He thus becomes the successor of Saint Peter and inherits all his prerogatives.

Without the concurrence of the church?—Without any express concurrence of the universal church. He derives his power immediately from God; and to possess it, it is considered sufficient that he be lawfully constituted Bishop of Rome; in that quality he becomes the successor of Saint Peter, and is entitled to the power conferred upon him by Christ.

Does the power of governing the church necessarily imply the exercise of power in various matters which would be comprehended under the title of matters of discipline?—With regard to the extent of the Pope's power, or limits to which it extends in particular cases, nothing has been defined by any Council; as I mentioned, we are merely required to believe in general that the Pope possesses a supremacy not only of honour, but also of jurisdiction over the universal church. But neither the Council of Florence nor any other Council has ever defined how far exactly such a power extends. Hence divines disagree very much in assigning the extent and limits of the Pope's power.

Do you conceive that it does or may extend to any points of discipline as contradistinguished from points of faith or morals?—All Catholics agree that the Pope's power extends to laws of discipline, because they consider that universal jurisdiction essentially includes the power of governing the whole church; some however will hold that this power of governing is absolute, while others, and by far the greater part contend, that it must be regulated by the canons. The latter opinion is followed in practice by Popes, who always proceed according to the canons of the church.

Is there any limitation to the extent of the Pope's power in spiritual matters, included under the declaration that he is entitled to govern the church universal?—The Pope's power is also allowed by all Roman Catholics to extend to spirituals, that is, to matters of faith and morals, but all do not hold that he is infallible in his decisions on those subjects. The Pope's decision on matters of faith or morals, is received by the universal church with great respect; and is obeyed by them provisionally, until it be rejected or received by the universal church, and thus become an article of faith.

How is the doctrine which was declared by the decree you have referred to of the Council of Florence, that the Pope has, without the concurrence of the church, a power of governing it, to be reconciled, or how is it reconciled with the opinion that the Pope is not infallible?

Appendix, N° 28.

infallible?—The Council of Florence merely declares in general terms, that the Pope derives from Christ a power of feeding with the true faith, and governing by wise laws the universal church, but does not at all speak of the gift of infallibility; this power of feeding and governing does not essentially include in it the gift of infallibility, because if so, it might then be a question whether bishops were infallible, as according to the greater number of divines and canonists, bishops also possess jure divino, the right of governing their respective dioceses.

Do you conceive, therefore, that the Pope may err in exercising that jurisdiction which was declared to be vested in him by the Council referred to?—No divine has ever doubted that the Pope is subject to error in making or enforcing laws of discipline; the only question among divines is, whether he be infallible when he proposes matters of faith or morals to the universal church; and on this point the Council of Florence made no declaration.

Can he err therefore in a decree which he declares to be purely of a spiritual nature, referring to the jurisdiction declared to be vested in him by the Council of Florence?—According to the opinion of all those divines, who deny the Pope's infallibility, he can; and at all events it is no article of our faith that he cannot.

The propositions usually called the Gallican Liberties have been referred to more than once in this examination, is it not to be inferred from the circumstance, that those qualifications so declared by the French Bishops, with regard to the Pope's supremacy, were thought by them to be necessary for the purpose of preserving their independence, that without such qualification the doctrine of the Roman Catholic church must be understood to hold that the Pope is infallible?—The Gallican Liberties, properly so called, mean nothing more than a right possessed, or supposed to be possessed, by the French church of retaining its ancient laws and usages, and rejecting any law of discipline issued by the Pope, or even by a general Council, inconsistent with those laws and usages. The Gallican clergy in 1682, published a declaration composed of four articles, the third of those articles establishes, what is properly called the Gallican Liberties. The other three establish other points. The first article rejects the temporal power of the Pope; the second goes to establish the superiority of general Councils over the Pope; and the fourth rejects his infallibility. The Gallican clergy thought it advisable to adopt the opinion, denying the infallibility of the Pope; and though they expressed the highest respect for all dogmatical decrees issued by him on matters of faith or morals, still they declared that they held such decrees not to be irrefragable, but to be subject to the revision and reformation of the universal church. The qualification of papal decrees thus established by the Gallican clergy, far from supposing the doctrine of the universal church to have been, before that period, favourable to the Pope's infallibility, supposes quite the contrary. For the French church could never adopt a principle, which they considered opposed to the doctrine of the universal church.

If it was not understood at the time to be a doctrine of the church that the Pope is infallible, whence arose the necessity of making a declaration against it a particular proposition?—If the Gallican clergy had considered the doctrine of the Pope's infallibility to have been an article of faith, maintained by the whole church, they never would have rejected it; because they, with all Catholics, admit the principle, that any article, maintained as of faith by the universal church, cannot be rejected without incurring the guilt of heresy. The rejection of it, therefore, is a clear proof that they were convinced such doctrine was not maintained by the universal church as a doctrine of faith.

Do you not conceive that the clergy of the church of France, by declaring that it was not an article of faith, shew, not that they understood it to be an article of faith, but that it was understood by them not to be an article of faith?—Most certainly.

And that they denied it, not because it was understood to be an article of faith, but because it had been asserted, as they considered, by erroneous writers to be an article of faith?—Some writers went so far as to assert that the Pope's infallibility was a doctrine of faith, and hence arose the necessity on the part of the Gallican clergy, of giving this public avowal of their principles.

Was not that declaration the result of a quarrel which existed at that time between the Pope and the state of France upon the subject of the regalia?—The object of the French clergy was to put an end to all controversies on that subject, by this public avowal of their sentiments.

Did not the declaration import, at least, that it had been a disputed or a questionable point?—Most certainly, and it remains such to the present day, and probably ever will.

The Roman Catholic church of France, the Roman Catholic church of Spain, the Roman Catholic church of Portugal, the Roman Catholic church throughout Germany, the Roman Catholic church in Great Britain, the Roman Catholic church in Ireland, the Roman Catholic church in every state in Europe, although in communion with the see of Rome, denies that the Pope has any civil or temporal power or right to interfere directly or indirectly in matters of a civil or temporal nature, does it not, as far as your information goes?—In all those countries that is, I consider the general doctrine; there may be individuals who still hold the opinion, affirming the Pope's power in temporals, but generally speaking the opposite is the doctrine maintained all over the Catholic world; it is well known to the See of Rome that this doctrine is universally maintained, yet no Pope has ever come forward to censure it; the See of Rome considers those who openly maintain it as obedient children of the church, and holds communion with them. Our oath of allegiance is perfectly known at Rome, it has been examined there, and it has, if not an official, official, at least an express and verbal sanction of the holy see; it is known at Rome that the greater part of our Bishops, at least all who are Trustees of Maynooth College, take that oath; and that all the students of Maynooth take it; this is tolerated, and we are considered as faithful and obedient children of the holy see.

Does not the holy see give spiritual institution to the Roman Catholic Bishops in those countries, knowing that they take that oath?—Most certainly.

Would it not be the duty of the holy see to refuse such institution, if that oath expressed an erroneous doctrine?—The holy see in such case would not hold communion with Bishops professing what she considered erroneous doctrine.

Suppose therefore any Roman Catholic were now to hold, as some may and probably do, that the Pope is infallible, or has the gift of infallibility in propounding articles of faith, ex cathedra, to the church, must not that Roman Catholic hold it to be morally impossible and utterly incompatible with the Divine Law, that the Pope could teach, as an article of faith, that the Pope had that civil and temporal power, which the Roman Catholic churches and prelates declare he has not?—Every Roman Catholic that holds the opinion that the Pope speaking ex cathedra, is infallible, must consider it impossible that he ever could dictate to the universal church a false doctrine, and therefore he must also hold it to be impossible that he ever could propose to the church the doctrine of temporal power which he holds to be false.

Do they not hold it to be as impossible that he could propound such a doctrine to them as that he could propound the doctrine that our Lord's divinity was not united to his humanity?—Most certainly; we abjure as false the doctrine asserting the Pope's power to depose princes and absolve their subjects from their oath of allegiance, and therefore must hold it impossible that the infallible Judge of controversy appointed by Christ could sanction it.

Do you know how late it is that the Pope has interfered to prohibit the circulation of any printed book in Ireland or in England?—I have never understood that the Pope has in a special way interfered in this or any other kingdom in prohibiting books. A general prohibition is issued at Rome of pernicious works from time to time by the congregation of the Index, but the decrees of that congregation are not considered obligatory in this country, nor I conceive in any country, until they are received and promulgated there.

Are the books so prohibited comprehended in the list published by the Index transmitted to this country?—No such list is transmitted officially to this or any other country. Individuals returning from Rome may occasionally bring with them a catalogue of the Index.

When that catalogue finds its way into the hands of any persons of the Roman Catholic persuasion in this country, do they feel themselves bound to abstain from reading the books so prohibited, or if they are ecclesiastics, are they bound to prohibit their flocks from reading the books contained in that catalogue?—All Catholics will respect the prohibition of the congregation of the Index, but the general opinion among us is, that their decrees do not bind beyond the Pope's states, unless where they have been received and promulgated; they certainly are not observed in this country, for we never enquire whether a book be inserted in the Index or not.

The prohibition of reading books is by no means confined to books published by the members of the Roman Catholic church?—The prohibition of the Index often extends to works written by Protestants, and circulated in Catholic countries.

Is there any prohibition of the Bible in the vernacular languages of the different countries of Europe by the Index of which you speak?—There is no general prohibition of the Bible in the vernacular languages, but some Bibles have been prohibited for other causes. Roman Catholics use no translation of the Bible that has not the sanction of their pastors.

Can you mention any versions of the Bible that you know to have been prohibited?—I recollect that an Italian translation of the Bible was prohibited, but I do not recollect the name of the translator; I think it was the first translation of it into that language.

Were you ever at Rome?—I was.

At what time?—In the year 1815.

How long did you continue there?—Nearly a year.

Do you know any thing of an officer at Rome who is called the Lord Protector of Ireland?—There was such a personage at Rome; one of the cardinals usually took the title of Protector of Ireland; however it could not be considered a particular office under the Pope, it was rather a character voluntarily assumed by some cardinal.

Do you mean that the cardinal appointed himself to the office, or that some one else appointed him?—I conceive the cardinal assuming that character, volunteered his services to protect the mission of Ireland.

Who accepted them?—I do not think there was any formal acceptance; there was formerly an Irish College at Rome, and the Cardinal Protector, as he was then called, took the College and the mission under his special patronage; his services consisted in promoting the interests of both at the Court of Rome.

You say that he offered his services; to whom did he make the offer?—I do not know precisely, but suppose he corresponded on the subject with the superior of that College, and with some of our bishops.

Do you know who filled the office during the year that you were at Rome?—I believe there was no such personage in my time, I did not at least hear of any one; the Cardinal Prefect of the Propaganda transacted every business relating to the Irish mission.

In the pamphlet of Doctor Butler which you have referred to, we observe this expression in relation to that office, "that he is a person higher in dignity relatively to us, than the

Rev.N. Slevin, D. D.
28 October 1826.

Legate at Brussels." Will you look at the passage in the 75th page, and state what you conceive Doctor Butler to have meant by that expression? [The pamphlet being handed to the witness].—It appears to me that the writer means the Cardinal Protector of the ecclesiastical concerns of Ireland.

He assigns to him, does he not, a higher degree of dignity than to the Pope's Legate?—He does with relation to Ireland.

Do you think that that dignity attaches to the office without any business belonging to it?—The dignity of cardinal always merits great respect from an Irish Catholic prelate, chiefly when connected with the superintendence of the ecclesiastical affairs of Ireland.

If it is the office of cardinal that is the fountain of the dignity he spoke of, it would attach equally, would it not, to sixty-nine other persons?—It would, but Doctor Butler I presume was not at the time in correspondence with the other cardinals.

Do you think that he means then that the seventy cardinals were all higher in dignity "relatively to us," that is, to the Roman Catholic Bishops of Ireland than the Legate at Brussels?—The dignity of any cardinal is superior to that of a legate, unless he be also a cardinal, which is commonly the case.

Pray remark the expression "relatively to us," and state whether you think that it was his dignity as cardinal that is referred to by Dr. Butler?—He does not only refer to his dignity of cardinal, but also to his character as protector of the ecclesiastical concerns of the Irish mission, and in that capacity prefers his authority to that of the Legate at Brussels, with whom Dr. Butler and the other prelates had no connection or relation whatever.

Can you describe the nature of the superintendence of the ecclesiastical affairs of Ireland that was exercised by the Cardinal Protector of Ireland, at the time that Dr. Butler wrote?—I consider that the functions of the Cardinal Protector consisted merely in promoting, at the court of Rome, by his influence, what he considered the interests of the Irish Roman Catholic church. His protection was purely in spiritual matters, as the relations of the Irish mission with Rome must have been of that nature.

Does not the word "Protector," imply, that the protection is to be extended against something or some person?—Not when applied to a cardinal; I conceive it means nothing more than to protect the interests of the church or college which the cardinal may voluntarily take under his protection.

Is it not understood in general, that the business of the Roman Catholic church at Rome is now transacted through the Cardinal Prefect of the Propaganda?—It is.

Have you any reason to believe, or have you heard, that any instructions were given to the Roman Catholic prelates of this country and of England, to abstain from any allusions to matters of a political nature in their correspondence with the Propaganda?—I have not heard of any such recommendation; but I am sure the Propaganda attends only to spiritual concerns, and that our prelates could never think of alluding to political matters in their correspondence with that congregation. So that I consider such a recommendation totally uncalled for.

While you were at Rome, had you any particular opportunity of observing any ceremony performed there in any way connected with Ireland?—Never.

With regard to the work called "Hibernia Dominicana," you have stated, that the copy, now before the Commissioners, is the only perfect copy in the library?—I stated, that there were two perfect and two imperfect copies of it in the library.

The Commissioners have before them a catalogue of Mr. Peel's select Irish library, and there is this statement in it with regard to the "Hibernia Dominicana." "It is difficult to be procured, as that part of it containing the reign of James the Second, has been carefully cancelled in most copies." Are the two copies in the library, which you have stated to be imperfect, made so by that part being cancelled relating to the reign of James the Second?—Just so.

Can you tell at what time that cancellation took place?—I do not know when or how that happened, but the copies to be met with are generally imperfect; that is, the offensive part of the work, which, no doubt, was cancelled on that account.

Is the part that is wanting that part relating to the reign of James the Second?—Exactly so.

Will you point out the particular passages in Bossuet, in which he denies the infallibility of the Pope in spirituals; you have already said that there are such passages, the Commissioners will beg of you to point them out to them?—Bossuet wrote a long and laboured vindication of the declaration of the Gallican clergy, issued in 1682. The fourth article of that declaration runs thus: "In questions also regarding faith, the Pope takes a leading part, and his decrees regard all and every church, yet his decision is not unchangeable, unless it be confirmed by the consent of the church." Bossuet, in his defence of this article, enters into a most ample discussion of the question regarding the Pope's infallibility. For the arguments he advances in proof of the article, and the answers by which he refutes the objections of his adversaries, I beg to refer the Commissioners to the second volume of his defence of the said declaration. ‡

YOU are Professor of Canon Law at Maynooth?—I am.

We observe, that in the oath that is taken by a Roman Catholic bishop on his consecration, are the following words:—"Regulas sanctorum, patrum, decreta, ordinationes, seu dispositiones, reservationes, provisiones, et mandata apostolica totis viribus observabo, et faciam ab aliis observari;" which we would translate, "I will observe with all my might, and cause to be observed by others, the rules of the holy fathers, the decrees, the ordinances or dispositions, the reservations, provisions and apostolical mandates." Will you be so good as to explain your view of the nature and extent of the obligation that is incurred by the bishop in subscribing to that sentence which has been read to you?—The extent of the obligation which a bishop incurs by this oath relates merely to decrees, ordinances, dispositions, reservations, &c. of the Holy See, in spiritual matters, and not in temporals. In the hypothesis that the Pope does not possess, at least, jure divino, any temporal power*.

Pray describe what is meant by the word "decreta" in that sentence?—By "decreta," I understand principally all decrees issuing from the Pope in matters of faith or morals, and addressed to the universal church. In the canon law, decretum means an ordinance emanating spontaneously from the Pope, rescriptum, one issued on an application.

Do you include discipline in it?—I would include only such decrees of discipline as are received by the universal church. Bishops are not considered bound to receive all the decrees of discipline that may be issued by Popes. The present practice of the church is, that decrees of discipline do not bind in any particular country till they are received or promulgated there, and therefore bishops do not bind themselves to receive, indiscriminately, all decrees of discipline issuing from the Holy See; in a word, bishops are considered to promise obedience to all ordinances of the Pope issued according to the canons, and not inconsistent with their acknowledged prerogatives; hence the clause in the oath "salvo meo ordine."

Pray be so good as to state what books you consider as containing the text of the canon law?—The canon law or common law of our church, is contained in a work known by the title of "Corpus Juris Canonici." It was published by Pope Gregory XIII. and is composed of several parts or collections of the canon law, made at different times.

The "Corpus Juris Canonici," necessarily includes several original works. We beg of you to specify what the original works are, that contain what is understood to be the text of the canon law, as contra-distinguished from mere abridgments that may have been made of it?—The body of canon law contained in that work, is composed of texts of Scripture, Decrees of Councils, Decretals of Popes, Extracts from the Holy Fathers, and even some from the civil law.

It has been stated in a work of some authority, and we should wish to know your impression, whether it is correctly stated, that the Corpus Juris Canonici is composed of the following works; first, the Decretum Gratiani; secondly, the Decretalia Gregorii Noni; thirdly, the Sexti Decretalium; fourthly, the Clementina Constitutiones; fifthly, the Extravagantes Johannis; and sixthly, the Extravagantes Communes; do you conceive that to be a correct enumeration?—That is an accurate statement of the different collections of the new canon law made at different times, and all taken together from the work which I called the Corpus Juris Canonici, published under Gregory XIII.; but the sources from which the different laws contained in those collections are taken, are those that I mentioned.

Is not the text of the canon law to be found in those works?—What we call the text of the canon law, is to be found in those collections, so far as they go; but to form a complete body of canon law, we must add the decrees of the Council of Trent, the different bulls that have been issued by Popes since the time of Pope Sixtus the fourth, as none of a more recent date are included in the collection of Gregory XIII., which was published towards the end of the sixteenth century. The bulls that were issued after Sixtus IV. down to Clement XII., have been included in the Bullarium Romanum. There is also a collection of the bulls of Benedict XIV.

Are we to understand, that all the bulls that are contained in the Bullarium Romanum, constitute a portion of the canon law?—They constitute a portion of the canon law in the same sense as the decretals of Popes, contained in the collections already mentioned, are said to constitute a part of the canon law, with this difference, however, that the Bullarium Romanum, was compiled by private authority, and is not authenticated by any Pope; but the collections before specified, have been authenticated by the respective Popes under whose inspection they were made. The Decretum Gratiani, was a private compilation, and has never been authenticated by any Pope. But the Decretals of Gregory, the Sexti Decretalium,

[Subsequently added by the Witness.]

* The obedience a bishop is considered to promise to the Pope is canonical obedience only, and therefore is limited by common understanding to those decrees, &c. that are canonically issued, and acquire the force of obligation according to the canons. Hence a bishop is not understood to be bound by any decree, &c. that conflicts with the laws and usages of the country in which he resides.

Decretalium, by Boniface, the Clementina and Extravagantes, have the sanction of Popes, as it appears from the briefs prefixed to them.

In truth have not almost all the parts of the six works that have been mentioned to you, been in their times the bulls of the existing Popes?—The parts of those works that are properly called decretals, were of that nature; but they also contain, as I have already stated, Decrees of Councils, and also extracts from the works of the Holy Fathers.

For instance, were not all the decretals of Gregory IX., Papal bulls, in their time?—Yes.*

And the Sexti Decretalium, also consists of Pope's bulls?—I do not know that it consists solely of them.†

Does not the chief part of it consist of those?—Yes, it consists in a great measure of the bulls of the Popes, who reigned between Gregory IX. and Boniface VIII., a period of something less than a century.

As also the Clementine Constitutions?—Yes, that collection is composed solely of the constitutions issued by Clement V. in the Council of Vienne.

Were not also the Extravagantes Johannis, all Pope's bulls in their time?—They were; but the decrees of Clement V. may be considered as the acts of the Council of Vienne.

But the Extravagantes Johannis, and also the Extravagantes Communes were, for the far greater part Pope's bulls, issued by the respective Pontiffs, perhaps with the addition, as you state, of some matters from general Councils, and from the opinions of the fathers?—Just so.

Do you consider that the sentence which has been read to you, in the Roman Catholic bishop's oath, binds him to maintain those decrees that are contained in the works that have been mentioned by force of the word "Decreta," which he swears to observe with all his might?—By no means; they are considered by the church and by the Pope, to promise only canonical obedience. We do not consider that the different decrees that compose the body of the canon law, are all binding in every country. We must consider the nature of the different decrees or mandates, and each document binds, according to the nature of the authority from which it emanates, and the acceptance it receives. The decree of a general Council, for example, relating to faith or morals, is binding all over the church; a decree of a general Council relating to discipline, if it has been published or received and acted upon universally, is binding in like manner—otherwise it is binding in the countries wherein it has been received. With regard to decretals of Popes, I think I have already mentioned the general principle we act upon, which is, that those decretals are binding in the countries in which they have been published, or adopted as the canon law of the country; so that decretals which bind in one country may not bind in another, because they have not been adopted there, and are not acted upon in the ecclesiastical courts of that country; hence we find, that the canon law in the different Catholic countries is different, because in different countries they have received different decretals, according as they were found useful or agreeable to the laws and usages of each country. Bishops promise to maintain the Pope's decrees according to the meaning of the canons, and not otherwise. In the same manner as a subject swears allegiance to his King, according to the meaning of the constitution and laws.

Is there any way of ascertaining what decretals have been received in Ireland, and what have not?—The decretals of Gregory IX. have been adopted as the common law, throughout the church. They are considered in the canon, what the Justinian Code was in the civil, that is, a supplement to the particular laws and usages of each church; and are considered binding in all cases in which they do not conflict with either, or with the municipal law of each country—Say the same of the other parts of the "Corpus Juris." Here, then, we have a principle by which we can at once know whether a decretal binds in a country‡. Our church government has been in such a state of confusion for two centuries past, that we can scarcely say we have any canon law. For positive laws do not bind when they cannot be observed without great inconvenience.

For instance, do you consider that the decretals of Gregory have been received in Ireland, or not?—I cannot say that they have ever been received in a formal manner. But I have no doubt that they were acted upon in Ireland, before the Reformation, according to the principle above mentioned, that is, so far as they were consistent with the laws and usages of Ireland.

Do

[Subsequently added by the Witness.]

* The collection of canons made by St. Raymond Pennafort, by order of Gregory the Ninth, was compiled from all the different sources of the canon law, already specified, though it is called by the name of Decretalia.

† The above mentioned collection was made by Boniface VIII. and contains all the bulls issued after Gregory IX.; together with the canons of the two councils of Lyons.

‡ The following words of Van Espen place this principle in a clear point of view. "Quemadmodum jus civile Romanum ubique pene gentium pro jure communi habetur, ut nimirum jure patrio aut consuetudinario deficiente, causæ civiles ac reipublicæ negotia ex illo dirigantur, et si quid in lege patria aut consuetudine dubii occurrat, in jure Romano dilucidationem accipiat; ita quoque causæ ecclesiasticæ ac exterior ecclesiæ politia, jure canonis tamquam jure communi, diriguntur, dirimuntur, ut deciduntur; et si quid difficultatis in jure ecclesiastico particulari, aut consuetudinario occurrat, in illo interpretationem accipiat." Van Espen, T. 4. p. 7.

Do you consider the decretals of Gregory IX. to be a part of the canon law in Ireland, of which you are a Professor?—I consider they are in the sense already explained; they constitute the canon law of the church of Ireland. If there was question of any particular decretal, and I were asked whether it was binding in Ireland, I would examine whether it was opposed to any of the particular laws or usages of our church, or to the municipal law of the land; and if I found it was not, I would consider it binding; if on the contrary, I found that it conflicted with any of them, I would infer the law was not received nor binding in our church.

If it were a decretal, relating either to a matter of faith, or to a matter of morals, would you then consider it binding in Ireland?—Certainly, if it was the decree of a Pope, I would consider it binding, not so as to constitute an article of faith; but that it should be adopted till the church would decide ultimately on that point, whatever it might be; however, I must observe, that decrees of faith are only indirectly introduced into the canon law, which is meant principally to deliver the positive laws of the church.

Would such a decretal be one of those, which the bishop swears to observe in the oath that has been stated to you?—I consider that the bishops by that oath would be bound to receive such a decree of faith, as prescribed by the canons of the universal church; that is, they should receive it with great respect, and hold, and maintain it, till the church would define ultimately the faith of the church on the point in question.

Are not such parts of the decretals as relate to matters of faith and morals, examples of those decrees propounded by the Popes and ratified by the tacit assent of the church, about which the Commissioners had some discussion with you on a former occasion?—The decretals of Popes are generally answers to particular questions proposed to them, and very seldom relate to matters of faith.

We mean to refer particularly to the decretals of Gregory IX., collected in the volume well known by that name, and the question is, whether the decretals that are there put forth, relating exclusively to faith and morals, (the present questions do not refer to any others) are not decrees that have been propounded by the Popes for the time being, and ratified by the tacit or express assent of the church?—I apprehend that among the decretals of Gregory IX. there are very few indeed, if any, that refer purely to matters of faith, they generally refer to matters of discipline. Some may be solutions given to moral questions or points of law proposed to the Pope for his decision.

Do you mean in particular cases?—I mean answers to decisions in particular cases referred to him*.

In what manner does a bull, when propounded by the Pope, pass into the body of the canon law, and become of authority as a canon in the church?—I had occasion to mention already, that decretals are commonly decisions on particular questions proposed to Popes; for instance, a difficulty occurs to a bishop; he refers the case to the Pope and receives an answer—that decision is a rescript or decretal epistle. As it refers to a particular case, it does not at once become a general rule, according to which the different ecclesiastical tribunals are bound to decide; the decision being very just in itself may be adopted afterwards in different countries, and thus become a general law. In the same manner as a civil judge on the bench, who decides in a particular case, his decision is not binding on other judges, however they may take it as a precedent, and act upon it. When the Pope addresses a bull to the whole church on matters of discipline (which he scarcely ever does, because the general laws of discipline have been made by general Councils,) when the bull has been universally accepted, it obliges and becomes a law of discipline all over the church; otherwise it would bind only in the countries in which it was published or acted upon; and hence we find that decrees issued by Popes are obligatory in one country, and do not oblige in another. What I have stated is the practice of the church, but I must observe, that the see of Rome in theory, claims the right of enacting laws that bind without acceptance.

The object of the preceding question was to ascertain the distinction between such particular bulls as you have been speaking of, that prevail only in particular countries, and the general canon law of the church of Rome, which it is presumed prevails in all Catholic countries?—I laid down as a general principle, that the different laws that compose the body of the canon law bind according to the source from which they have originated, and the acceptance of the different churches. A Decree of a general Council binds as such—of a national, provincial, or diocesan synod respectively, and wherever it has been adopted as law, a decree of the Pope, according to the nature and acceptance of it, will bind more or less extensively; if it be a decision on a particular question, it will not bind, unless where it has been adopted as law; if it be a bull addressed to the whole church, it will bind in the countries where it has been published or received in practice, and where it has not been published it will not be considered binding; hence, as I mentioned, we find that the canon law in different countries is different, because the decretals specified are received and acted upon in

* Veronius, in his Rule of Faith, highly appreciated by all Catholics, expresses himself thus, regarding the decretals. "None of the decretals of Popes contained in the 'Corpus Juris Canonici,' the six books of the Decretals, the Clementines, or the Extravagantes, are sufficient to constitute an article of faith. Wherefore, when our adversaries oppose to us decretals extracted from Gratian, or any part of the canon law, we ought to reply, by stating, that none of all those appertain to the Catholic faith." Veronius Regula Fidei, §. 4.

in one country and are rejected in another as incompatible with the laws and usages thereof*.

Are there any provincial constitutions or canons peculiar to Ireland, and not received at large throughout the Catholic church?—I mentioned that our church government in Ireland has been and is still very irregular on account of the unhappy circumstances of our church; it is not governed in the systematical manner as observable in Catholic countries, so that our canon law is reducible to a very small compass†.

The question is, whether you are aware of any canon law peculiar to Ireland that is not received in other Catholic countries?—No; I am not aware that any such laws exist in Ireland‡.

Do you know of any bull received in Ireland, which is not in force in other Catholic countries?—I do not know of any bull establishing or purporting to establish a particular discipline for the Roman Catholic church in Ireland. By a rescript of Pius VI., clandestine marriages between Roman Catholics and Protestants are declared valid, notwithstanding the law of the Council of Trent annulling such marriages; however this discipline is not peculiar to Ireland; and that rescript may be considered as an explanation of the existing law rather than a new law.

In what manner is it determined in Ireland whether any particular bull that may come into the country is received, or not received in the country, so as to form a portion of its canon law?—By the same rule as in all other countries, by its publication, or general adoption in practice.

Its publication, in what manner?—If it be published in the country, we then consider that it is binding; the bull for instance would be addressed to our bishops, they would receive it in a body, or perhaps individually, and order it to be published; the publication would be made in the parish chapels, or at least in the episcopal chapel of each diocese. However the general adoption of a bull in practice, without a formal promulgation, would give it the force of law, on the ground that custom becomes law.

Was that the course pursued with the late bull of the jubilee?—It was. The bull of the jubilee was received by our bishops assembled—it was published in each diocese, first in the bishop's chapel, and in all the parish chapels in succession.

What becomes of the original instrument, is it laid by in any archives or place of security?—The original is preserved in the archives at Rome; a copy is sent to the particular churches which it may concern. The bull ought to be registered in the diocesan records by each bishop, and a copy of it preserved in the archives of the diocese.

Do you conceive that in point of fact there is any place of deposit for such in Ireland?—I am not aware that there is,—I am sure there is no general place of deposit.

Do you believe that there are any original instruments of that description existing in Ireland?—There may be some rescripts in the hands of particular bishops; we make a distinction between bulls and rescripts; a bull is commonly addressed to the whole church, and generally refers to matters of faith or morals, such as the bull Unigenitus. Ordinances that relate to particular questions, and to matters of minor moment are called rescripts or briefs.

If a bull were now to be addressed to the universal church, would any particular copy of it be transmitted as a matter of course to Ireland from Rome?—I have no doubt but there would.

By what authority in Rome would that bull be transmitted?—By the Cardinal Prefect of the Propaganda.

And

[Subsequently added by the Witness.]

* As to the matter of fact, whether any particular decree contained in the Corpus Juris be actually received in a country or not, we have the following principle: it is received, if it be not opposed to any law or usage, civil or ecclesiastical, of the country. Hence the canon law of the church of Rome can be called general, and common to all Catholic countries, only in the sense that it constitutes the common ecclesiastical law of all those countries, as explained. However strange it may appear, our canon law is received on the same principle in the different Protestant states of Europe, as appears from the testimony of an eminent Protestant writer; which I beg may be inserted on the Minutes.

“It redounds exceedingly to the credit of the canon law, that the Protestant states of Germany, and others, after they had separated from the church of Rome, and embraced the doctrines of Luther and Calvin, and had shaken off all the authority of the Roman Pontiff, did not, however, shake off the canon law, but use it to this day in deciding their causes, in the same manner precisely as the European princes, after they had renounced the jurisdiction of the Cæsars, yet continued to observe the laws of the Cæsars; and though Martin Luther, through a rash and preposterous zeal, caused the books of the canon law to be publicly burnt at Wirtemberg, in opposition to the remonstrances of the juris-consults, yet the Saxons, Brunswickers and other Protestants, have since that time preserved the use of the canon law, without any change, as they agreed in the Confession of Augsburg; and the canon law is still publicly taught at Wirtemberg, and in the other Protestant universities.”

A Duck de Auct. Juris Civilis, L. 1. c. 7. N. 17, 18, quoted by V. Espen. T. 4. p. 7.

† However, diocesan and provincial statutes have been adopted in different parts and at different times, which will, no doubt, be now improved and enlarged. It may even be hoped that the time is not remote when our bishops, assembled in synod, will, under the paternal protection of a benign sovereign, draw up a code of national regulations adapted to the circumstances of our church.

‡ The peculiarity of our church is rather of a negative than of a positive nature. Circumstances disable us from observing the general laws of the church in many respects, whilst we have no particular national canon law of our own. There are, as I mentioned, provincial and diocesan statutes, but these do not constitute a national canon law.

And directed probably to one of the Roman Catholic archbishops here?—Probably to the Roman Catholic primate, to be communicated to all the bishops; a copy might be sent to each archbishop or even bishop.

Will you describe the courts in which the Roman Catholic canon law in Ireland is administered?—We have no ecclesiastical courts established in Ireland; each bishop is in his diocese judge in ecclesiastical matters; he exercises his power by himself, or by his vicar general, or by any person to whom he may delegate it.

Are there any Roman Catholic ecclesiastical courts in Ireland of any description, except the bishops courts which you have now described?—None whatever.

Are there not vicars general appointed in almost every diocese?—The bishop commonly appoints a vicar general, and the chapter a vicar capitular, sede vacante, but it is at the option of the bishop to appoint a vicar general or not.

But when he is appointed, he is the ecclesiastical judge, is he not?—He acts in the name and by the authority of the bishop—he is considered to possess the ordinary jurisdiction of the bishop in all cases not excepted in the canon law—the bishop and the vicar general have the same court.

How often do you give lectures upon the canon law at Maynooth?—Once a fortnight during our academical year.

Do you comprehend in your lectures the whole extent of the canon law?—In the course of three years we read over those parts of our treatise that relate purely to canon law; there are some parts of it that are theological, which the students read in the course of theology; those we pass over, and confine ourselves to what we consider to be properly speaking canon law: for example, there is a book in our Class Book on the Sacraments; we do not study that as canon law, because we have a treatise in theology on the same subject. There is also a book on right and justice; that subject is also treated in our moral theology; we therefore pass over those books and confine ourselves to what is purely positive law.

Do you, as a portion of the canon law, lecture on the degree of binding authority contained in the papal bulls and rescripts?—Our author confines himself chiefly to the practical parts of the canon law, and seems to have industriously avoided all speculative questions controverted among canonists.

Do you pursue that course?—We do.

Do you not lecture on whatever you think to be material to the right understanding of the canon law?—Certainly on what we consider to be material in church government.

Do you not lecture upon this title “De summorum pontificum rescriptis generatim”?—There is a chapter in our author under that title, but he does not examine the nature or extent of their obligation, which is a disputed question.

Does not that in fact include the subject of the degree of power and authority that the Pope's bulls, decretals, rescripts, and pontifical letters of all descriptions are entitled to?—If the Commissioners will please to order that chapter to be read, they will perceive that the author does not enter into the controverted question relative to the Pope's authority; he merely explains the nature of the different sorts of rescripts, bulls and mandates, that are issued by Popes.

Do not the students in canon law refer in the library to the original sources of information from which the book of Cabbassutius was extracted?—They have full liberty to refer to the different works on canon law in the library.

Have you the least doubt that they exercise that liberty?—I have no doubt that they exercise it as often as they require elucidation on any point.

Do not you conceive that it is an act of commendable diligence upon their part to do so?—I applaud their diligence in doing so, and beg to observe, that though our author does not enter into those speculative questions, we do not always avoid them; however, we do not enter very minutely into them, as we make it a rule to follow the author in his mode of treating the canon law, and chiefly confine ourselves to practical matters; perhaps I should add, that it is not necessary for practical purposes to come to any decision on the speculative questions regarding the Pope's authority.

The Commissioners have procured copies and translations of some bulls issued by Benedict the 14th in the middle of the last century, for the sake of illustrating the distinctions you have taken in a preceding part of your examination, respecting the spiritual and temporal power of the Pope, and of trying the general principles you have laid down by the test of particular instances. We have had recourse to those bulls as being the latest published to which access can be had in the public libraries of this country, and also from their peculiar authenticity; the collection having been edited by the Pope himself, and printed by the types of the Propaganda; you have had an opportunity, have you not, of considering the bulls in question?—Yes, I have read them over attentively.

Have you had any opportunity of reading them, except that which was afforded by this Board to you, by having the bulls copied from a book in the library of the University of Dublin which contains them, and having those copies put into your hands?—No other opportunity; we have none of the latest collections of bulls in our library.

Have you any copy of the Romanum Bullarium at Maynooth?—We have not; I beg however to observe, that I have read over the bull “Cæna Domini” in a theological work in our library.

N. Slevin, D. D.
1 December 1826.

THE first of these bulls now before the Commissioners to which your attention is directed, is one beginning with the words "Singulari Nobis," dated the 9th February 1749, directed to the late Cardinal York. The fifteenth section of this bull lays it down as follows: "This we see observed in the case of deserters and traitors, whom the civil laws entirely exclude from the privileges of faithful subjects. The ecclesiastical laws also grant not clerical privileges to those clergy who neglect the commands of the sacred canons. But no one can suppose that either traitors, or clergy, who violate the canons, are not subject to the authority of their princes or bishops;" and the sixteenth section goes on, "These examples, if we mistake not, are pertinent to the question; for as well as the former, so heretics also, are subject to the church, and are bound by the ecclesiastical laws;" this is laid down as the conclusion of a train of reasoning to establish, that though the Catholic church has no jurisdiction over an infidel, or a Jew, yet it has over a Protestant, in consequence of the Protestant having been baptized, and that therefore obedience is due from the Protestant to the Roman Catholic church; the passages treating upon it are somewhat long, but they will not admit of being condensed; it is stated in sections 11, 12, 13, and 14 of the bull, as follows:

§ 11. "It remains then to be considered, whether a woman belonging to the heresy of Protestantism, whilst she was married to a Jew could be bound by this law, introduced as we have mentioned by the universal practice of the church, which commands that the marriages of Christians with Heathens, or with Jews, should be annulled in consequence of the disparity of religion. To this question we think no other answer can be given, than that she was bound by the law at that time, inasmuch as this impediment does not exist in the marriages of those who have not been baptized, though both may follow an erroneous religion; nor does it possess any force in the marriages of those who have received baptism, though the one may have been a Catholic, the other a heretic, whilst it is plain that they are illicit, though at the same time ratified. But it is quite certain, that it has full force in the marriages of those, of whom the one has participated in baptism, the other has not; though he were as yet a catechumen and had determined to embrace the Catholic faith. That is confirmed in Can. Cave, 28. quest. 1. where the following passage occurs; it is not sufficient if she be a Christian, unless both may have been initiated in the sacrament of baptism; and besides, St. Thomas in the passage cited in responsione ad quintum; and besides Sotus in the passage above cited. § Hinc fit, the same decision is likewise given by Pontus in cas. 7. on the word impedimentum disparitatis cultus; and by Juvinin, de Sacram diss. 10. quæst. 2. § 2. Vers. Quæres utrum Cathecumeni; by Sancha, de matrimonio lib. 9. cap. 12 num. 66. and seq. Clericat. de matrim decis. 26. num. 3.

"But since this now is in force as the common discipline of the church, and as we have hinted, the woman addicted to the errors of Protestantism is subject to it, it will necessarily follow, that the contract of marriage, which she has entered into with a Jew, who has not received the sacrament of baptism, must be deemed null and void through the impediment of disparity of religion."

§ 12. "But perhaps it might be objected, that the baptism of which we now treat had been conferred not by a Catholic, but by a Protestant minister; and that the woman, as being enslaved by heresy, after having received baptism, had been without the bosom of the Catholic church, and consequently was not bound by its laws. But these objections, we can easily remove, if we first consider that which is agreed on by all; if a heretic in baptizing any one, employs the form and due matter, as we suppose to have been done in the case of the woman of whom we are now speaking, such person is marked with the character of a sacrament. For on this principle, as a foundation, S. Augustin and the ancient fathers depended, in order to refute the Donatists, who contended that those baptized by heretics, should be baptized a second time."

§ 13. "In the next place it is ascertained, that he, who has duly received baptism from a heretic, by virtue thereof is made a member of the Catholic church, inasmuch as the private errors of the person baptizing cannot deprive him of this happiness, if he confer the sacrament in the faith of the true church, and observe its institutions in those things which pertain to the validity of baptism. Suarez fully confirms this in his defence of the Catholic faith against the errors of the Anglican. Sect. lib. 1. cap. 24. where he proves, that a person being baptized, becomes a member of the church; adding this moreover, that if a heretic, as often happens, baptize an infant unable to make an act of faith, this cannot prevent him from receiving with baptism the habit of faith."

§ 14. "Finally we have ascertained that those baptized by heretics, if they have arrived at that age in which they can distinguish good from evil, and adhere to the errors of the person baptizing, they are thereby repelled from the unity of the church, and are deprived of all those advantages, which those who are in the church enjoy; yet that they are not exempt from its authority and laws; as Gonzalez wisely argues in Cap. Sicut. num. 12. de Hæreticis."—The Pope lays down here a great deal of canon law that claims authority for the

the church, which may by some be considered as of a spiritual, and by others of a temporal nature. We beg first to refer to these words, "But since this now is in full force as the common discipline of the church, and as we have hinted, the woman addicted to the errors of Protestantism is subject to it;" and to ask you whether the position that a Protestant woman is subject to the common discipline of the church, refers to matters of a temporal or spiritual authority?—The case proposed to the Pope's consideration by the Cardinal York was, whether a marriage contracted between a Protestant female and a Jew was valid or not—both parties it appears from the statement in the bull, afterwards became Roman Catholics, but the question regards the marriage which took place before they had become Roman Catholics; the Pope decides in the negative, declaring, that the marriage which had been contracted between a Protestant female and a Jew was not valid, on the ground, that there is in the Roman Catholic church a matrimonial diriment impediment, called disparitas cultus, which annuls all marriages between Christians and Infidels; and the Pope contends that this impediment occurred in the case proposed, because the female being a Protestant was a Christian, and as such was subject to the laws of the church of Christ; and the Roman Catholic church being of course considered by him to be the true church, he infers that the Protestant female was subject to the Roman Catholic church; now one of the laws of the Roman Catholic church is, as stated before, that no marriage contracted under the said impediment of disparitas cultus is valid, whence he concludes that the marriage in question was invalid. The Pope assigns reasons why a Protestant should be considered subject to the laws of the Roman Catholic church. These reasons may be reduced to this, that a Protestant is a Christian, that all Christians are subject to the authority of the true church of Christ, that the Roman Catholic church is the true church of Christ, and therefore that a Protestant is subject to the laws of the Roman Catholic church. The Pope claims authority over Protestants, on the ground, that though Protestants have separated from the Roman Catholic church, and declared themselves independent of her, yet, having been baptized, they are subject to her laws; he compares them to rebels under a civil government. A citizen who rebels against the government under which he lives, is still liable to be punished by the laws of that government; he is deprived of the privileges of a faithful subject, but he is not freed from the yoke of the law, though he declares himself a rebel against it; if he commits a crime, he will still be considered liable to be punished by that law. A rebel is considered as a subject owing obedience to the law, though deprived of the privileges enjoyed by good and faithful subjects. Hence, infers the Pope, those who separate from the Roman Catholic church, and declare themselves independent of her laws are disobedient members, and as such, subject to punishments she inflicts—not of a temporal nature (the church having no power to inflict temporal punishments,) but to censures. They are excommunicated by her, but still remain subject to her laws. The Pope concludes, that the Protestant female being subject to the laws of the church, and there being a law that annuls marriages between Christians and infidels, she incurs that impediment, and consequently that the marriage contracted between her and the Jew must have been invalid. By invalid, we mean that it is void, as to what we call the vinculum of matrimony; it is void as to that part of it which is spiritual, as to its spiritual nature and effects. It will be also invalid as a civil contract, and as to civil effects, if the municipal laws of the country, where the marriage is contracted, declares it to be void, but if it be contracted in a country where the municipal laws consider such a contract, that is, a marriage contracted between a Protestant female and a Jew, valid, the civil contract is good, but the spiritual bond is null. It appears that the marriage in question took place in Rome, and consequently was invalid, not only as to its spiritual, but also as to its civil effects, as the municipal laws of Rome annul such marriages. But supposing it to have taken place in England, where the law tolerates such marriages, it would be valid as to civil effects; but as to the spiritual bond and effects, we should consider it to be null and void.

Suppose there were issue of a marriage which was good as a civil contract, would the issue of that marriage in your view be entitled to any property descendible to such issue?—Certainly, we should consider the issue of such a marriage to have a just title to their inheritance.

You would consider it to be valid by the municipal laws of the country?—We should consider the civil contract valid, to all intents and purposes, in itself, and as to its effects; because we consider that the laws of the church merely regard the bond of wedlock, which is considered to be of a spiritual nature, and also the effects, so far as they regard spiritual matters. The dispositions of the law regarding temporal goods, may be followed in conscience.

So far as the church would have any authority in the matter, you would consider it as an invalid marriage, inasmuch as the spiritual effects arise from the circumstance of the marriage itself, whereas the civil effects depend, do they not, upon the laws of the country where it is contracted?—The civil effects depend upon the laws of the country in which the contract is made. This principle is clearly laid down in a thesis, which was sustained at Maynooth last year, from which I beg leave to read an extract, and to have it inserted on the Minutes, because it explains distinctly our doctrine on this subject:—

"Hinc contractum naturalem non civilem assumpsit Christus in rationem sacramenti; ordinandum verò ecclesiæ legibus. Unde contractus ecclesiasticus, non autem civilis, materia hujus sacramenti. Et quidem in civilibus immiscere se noluit Christus dominus. Contractum ergo civile intactum reliquit. Hicce respicit tantummodo bona conjugum, eorum negotia temporalia politicæ potestatis regulis subicit, et sic sapienter consulit reipublicæ paci et felicitati. Ne mireris igitur, si quandoque sit contractus civilis absque sacramento, et vice-versâ sacramentum quin valeat contractus civilis. Neque ideo secum mutuo pugnant leges ecclesiasticæ et civiles; utraque enim potestas diversum habet et finem et objectum. Impedimenta matrimonium dirimentia jure innato apponunt principes, jure divino apponit et ecclesia. Priora respiciunt contractum civilem, et effectus tantum politicos generant; posteriora spectant materiam sacramenti, ipsumque sacramentum, et effectus spirituales, et non alios pariunt. Ecclesia enim, in temporalia regum nequidem indirectam accepit potestatem a Christo; 'cujus regnum non est de hoc mundo.'"

"Hence it appears, that Christ made the natural and not the civil contract, the subject of the sacrament, to be regulated, however, by the laws of the church; hence the ecclesiastical contract, and not the civil, is the matter of the sacrament of matrimony; and truly Christ did not intend to interfere in civil matters. He therefore left the civil contract untouched; it relates to the property of the parties, and subjects all their temporal concerns to the laws, and thus wisely provides for the peace and security of the state. It is not therefore strange, that the civil contract should sometimes exist without the sacrament, and sometimes the sacrament should be valid and the civil contract void. Neither does this cause a conflict between the civil and canon law, for both powers have a different end and object. Princes institute matrimonial impediments in virtue of the civil authority they possess, the church institutes impediments by divine right. The former relate to the civil contract, and to political effects, the latter respect the matter of the sacrament, and the sacrament itself—they produce spiritual effects and no other. For the church has not received even an indirect power from Christ in temporal matters, 'whose kingdom is not of this world.'"

Would not the issue of a marriage, such as you have described, when entered in a Roman Catholic register of baptisms, be there denominated illegitimate?—When the marriage is declared null by the laws of the church, they would be considered illegitimate with relation to spiritual effects, but not to temporal; we should consider a marriage contracted between two Roman Catholics under similar circumstances, that is, under an impediment, null and void, and the issue spurious as to spiritual effects.

Could the issue of such a marriage as the one in question, become a priest in the Roman Catholic church?—If the invalidity of the marriage were proved juridically, or notoriously, he could not.

Must the invalidity of the marriage be proved within the life-time of the parties?—If at any time juridically or notoriously proved, the offspring should be considered spurious, and the irregularity would take place.

If it were officially proved, a disability would attach?—It would. Illegitimacy is in our church an irregularity; when the marriage is valid according to the civil institutions, if no complaint be lodged with the ecclesiastical court, no notice would be taken of it. Before the irregularity is declared, there should be some official enquiry made concerning the matter.

Would not the issue of any marriage that had been celebrated before a Protestant clergyman, and not before a Roman Catholic clergyman, be entered as illegitimate, if brought to be baptized in the Roman Catholic church?—Certainly not; many marriages contracted before Protestant clergymen are considered valid in the Catholic church, at least as a contract, though not perhaps as a sacrament. In the Roman Catholic church matrimony is considered a sacrament, and in the Protestant it is not considered as such. I said, not perhaps as a sacrament, for some of our divines make the contracting parties the minister of matrimony, and in this opinion it would be valid as a sacrament also.

The question is, would the issue, under the circumstances mentioned, be entered as illegitimate?—We consider marriages contracted before Protestant clergymen valid in many instances, at least as a contract, perhaps as a sacrament; in such instances we consider the issue legitimate to all intents and purposes.

How would it be entered?—If Protestant parents, validly married by a Protestant clergyman, sent a child to be baptized by a Catholic priest, it would be entered as legitimate, specifying that the parents were Protestants.

Suppose, for instance, that the issue were born of a marriage celebrated between a Protestant and Roman Catholic, which marriage had been celebrated by a Protestant clergyman, but not by a Roman Catholic clergyman, would such issue, if brought to be baptised by a Roman Catholic priest, be marked with the word illegitimate, or would it not?—It would not; such child would be considered legitimate to all intents and purposes; legitimate in reality, and as to all effects both spiritual and temporal.

Could the issue of such a marriage become a priest without dispensation?—Certainly, so far as legitimacy is concerned; there is, however, another irregularity in our church, forbidding the children of parents, not professing the Catholic religion, to be admitted to holy orders, but it is considered that this irregularity has no force in this country at present.

Does the answer which you lately gave, depend upon the circumstance whether the discipline of the Council of Trent has been received in a particular country or not?—The discipline of the Council of Trent does not extend to marriages contracted between Catholics and Protestants. The law of clandestinity established by that Council has no effect until thirty days after its publication; now it is considered that the decrees of the Council of Trent, having never been published among Protestants, cannot extend to them.

Has it been published among the Roman Catholics of Ireland in the Roman Catholic church?

church?—The law of clandestinity has been published in the greater part of the dioceses of Ireland, but not in the province of Leinster, nor in the wardenship of Galway.

Does the same distinction apply to the other canons of the Council of Trent?—The exception has been made in the Council of Trent only with regard to clandestinity, which was a new matrimonial impediment introduced by that Council.

If a marriage be contracted between Catholics lawfully capable of contracting, and the marriage ceremony be performed by a Roman Catholic clergyman, do you not hold in that case that the parties derive the grace of a sacrament?—Most assuredly.

If a marriage be contracted between Catholics, that is, if the parties enter into a contract of marriage per verba de presenti, but a clergyman does not perform the marriage ceremony, in that case is not the marriage a good and lawful marriage as to spiritual as well as civil consequences, although the party does not derive from it the grace of a sacrament, where the Council of Trent, does not prevail?—A marriage, such as the question specifies, is considered by us to be valid but not lawful; because the laws of the church, at all times, even before the Council of Trent, prohibited clandestine marriages, contracted before any other than the lawful ministers of the church.

Do you mean by saying that it would be valid, but not lawful, as applying to all consequences that would follow to the parties or their issue, though they would err in the act of marriage?—They would violate the law, the parties would sin, but the marriage would be valid as to all consequences; the law often forbids what it does not annul.

Would the issue of that marriage be legitimate in the eye of the church?—It would be legitimate in the eye of the church.

Could the children be priests, would they be admitted to holy orders?—Most certainly; they would be considered lawful issue; however I must observe, that, according to our doctrine, a doubt would arise whether such a marriage would be a sacrament, because it is a question whether the priest, or the contracting parties, be the minister of the sacrament of matrimony.

We observe in the seventh section of the bull in question, that the Pope lays down, "That the law as having been made by a lay prince, ought to have no force in marriages—these laws, in whatever way understood, cannot prescribe to the church." Does not that appear to you to take a different view of the subject from that which you have given in the former answer?—Not at all; the Pope is there speaking of matrimony with relation to spiritual and not to civil effects; we do not admit that temporal princes, by any laws which they may enact, can affect the vinculum of matrimony, which is of a spiritual nature, but we allow, that, in their capacity, they can make impediments which annul the civil contract, and thereby impede the civil effects, as stated in the quotation given from our thesis.

But would it not annul the marriage bond?—No, we consider the marriage bond to be of divine institution, and of a spiritual nature; and consequently subjected only to spiritual authority.

Pray explain in what practical sense the Protestant female is said to be subject to the Roman Catholic church, as stated in your first answer?—The laws of the church affect all its members, and are considered to extend also to Protestants, who by baptism become members of the church of Christ. But this subjection is of a purely spiritual nature; they sin, when they are guilty of a wilful violation of the laws.

The question is, what practical consequences you consider to attach to that subjection?—No practical consequences of a temporal nature can ensue from it; at least in countries that are not Catholic, and where the ecclesiastical laws are not supported by the arm of civil authority.

You mean that all spiritual consequences, including excommunication, might follow?—All those who culpably separate from the church, incur that censure; after their separation, they are considered to sin as often as they knowingly and wilfully violate the laws, and to incur any spiritual penalty that may be annexed to their transgression.

Suppose the case of infant baptism, does it apply in that case as well as in others?—Infants are incapable of transgression.

You were understood to state that a person baptized, though by a Protestant, would become a subject of the church of Rome, would not this be the case where the individual is baptized in infancy?—Yes, we consider that the baptized infant becomes a member of the church, and is subject to her laws, when he reaches the age of reason.

Do you mean that every person who is properly baptized, is by the act of baptism admitted a member of the Catholic church?—We hold that baptism is the gate of the true church of Christ, and considering the Roman Catholic church to be that church, we consider all baptized persons to become members of the Roman Catholic church.

By whomsoever they may be baptized?—By whomsoever they may be baptized, using the proper matter and form.

Do you conceive that a Protestant clergyman can use the proper matter and form?—Most assuredly.

Do you conceive that he may not?—Any person who does not use the proper matter and form will not baptize validly, not even a priest, not the Pope himself.

Observe, in the twelfth section of the bull in question, that the expression with respect to the consequences of baptism, is stronger than those which have been already cited to you; in those already cited, the woman is said to be subject to the church; but in this it is said that she is bound by its laws; the present question is, what is the nature and extent of the binding or obligation of obedience to the Roman Catholic church imposed upon a baptized Protestant by reason of such baptism?—Baptism imposes a general obligation of obedience to the laws of God and of the church, when the baptized person attains the age of reason.

Appendix, N^o 30.Examination of
Rev.N. Slevin, D. D.
1 December 1826.

What meaning do you attach to the words, in that passage of the bull, of being bound by the law of the church, does not binding imply a degree of obligation?—Most certainly, and the violation of that obligation implies the guilt of sin, and sin subjects the delinquent to the penalties inflicted by God, and by the church, which are always of a purely spiritual nature.

Explain the nature of that obligation, and under what sanction it is to be enforced?—Every obligation is founded on authority and a proper sanction—the obligation of obeying the laws of the church rests on the authority with which she has been invested by her divine founder; he that wilfully violates her laws, sins.

Does he expose himself to any manner of punishment?—He exposes himself to no other punishment in this life than those spiritual punishments which the church inflicts on disobedient members.

But in point of fact, has the Roman Catholic church any spiritual power over Protestants, for instance, in this country?—I have stated repeatedly that all Protestants become by baptism members of the church of Christ, and subject to her laws. We, holding the Roman Catholic church to be that church, must, to be consistent, consider them subject to her laws in this country or in any other; if therefore they culpably disobey her laws, they incur the guilt of such violation, and the spiritual punishments which she inflicts on her disobedient members. But I must observe that censures, the only punishment the church can inflict, are annexed only to some heinous crimes, and to a wilful contempt of her authority.

The question at present is, what power of spiritual punishment has the church of Rome over a Protestant, born and baptized in Ireland?—The same spiritual authority she has over Catholics, that which she received from Christ. As disobedient members, she may issue censures against them, as against Catholics, when they disobey her laws—whether she does so or not is another question—there is now question of the authority which she assumes.

The Commissioners understand perfectly the nature of spiritual censure issued by the church of Rome against Catholics, but it is not so easy to understand the consequences that may affect Protestants; pray explain them?—The effects of censure may be either of a temporal or of a spiritual nature. In a country where the ecclesiastical is supported by the civil power, the church censures have temporal effects derived from the civil authority; where the church is not supported by the state, censures have purely spiritual effects derived from the spiritual authority; now, as Protestants despise the censures of our church, they have nothing to apprehend from the spiritual effects, which a Roman Catholic considers to follow from them, and dreads very much.

Are there any other means by which the church can carry into execution any censure inflicted upon a Protestant?—No other means whatever; her censures are to him a brutum fulmen; at present the Roman Catholic church never inflicts censures on those who separate from her body, and form a distinct religious society; much less on those who are born in a religious sect, which long since separated from her. But the general law of the church has declared some censures that are incurred ipso facto by transgressors, and those who culpably separate from the church are considered to fall into them.

Do not those censures in point of fact amount to absolute excommunication ipso facto?—That is the censure declared by the church against those who separate from her body.

Are not all the Protestants of this country excommunicated by the church of Rome, without any particular or further exercise of spiritual power on their part?—All those who knowingly and wilfully separate from the church of Rome, are considered to incur excommunication ipso facto; however, until they are denounced in a formal manner by the church, they are not subject to the public effects of excommunication; now, as Protestants in the different countries of Europe have never been denounced, they consequently do not incur publicly the general effects of excommunication.

Do you mean as to intercourse with other persons?—Yes; chiefly as to intercourse, and public reputation; they cannot be considered publicly as under censures.

But do they not incur all spiritual effects, whatever those may be, of spiritual excommunication before denunciation, though they may not incur the temporal ones?—I have mentioned already, that the censures of the church have in reality no temporal effects whatsoever in any country, unless where the municipal laws impart those effects to them; they may be considered to have public and private effects—the public suppose denouncement.

Do not the Protestants of this country incur the spiritual effects of excommunication, whatever they may be, ipso facto, although they do not incur the temporal effects before denunciation?—The effects of censures being spiritual, as far as the church is concerned, as they have not been denounced, they do not incur any of the public spiritual effects, and cannot be considered actually under any censure in the eyes of the public; an excommunicated person, before denunciation, incurs some spiritual effects of a private and internal nature, that merely regard his own conscience; for example, one of the effects of excommunication is, that the person under censure ought not to attend divine service, or join with the faithful in their public devotions; this spiritual effect is incurred, even before denunciation with regard to conscience, but not with regard to the public, who can hold no one excommunicated, until he be denounced. Hence, if the person in this case attends divine service, conscious of the censure, he will sin against conscience, and before God; but this effect is private, being confined to his own breast. Protestants who reject the authority of our church will feel little concern about internal and invisible effects of this nature, which they will consider imaginary.

What is the meaning of the expression ipso facto excommunicated?—That by the act itself, itself, without any declaration on the part of the church, or her ministers, the censure is incurred because it is pronounced in the law.

Still the denunciation is necessary before it has effect?—It is; that the person should be looked upon in the eye of the public as under censure.

Do you or do you not conceive, that the general principle with respect to the authority of the church of Rome in this case, is or is not pretty much the same as is laid down in the confession of faith in the church of Scotland, under the head “of church censures,” as follows, “The Lord Jesus as King and Head of His church, hath therein appointed a government in the hand of church officers, distinct from the civil magistrate. To these officers the keys of the kingdom of heaven are committed, by virtue whereof they have power respectively to retain and remit sins, to shut that kingdom against the impenitent, both by the word and censures, and to open it unto penitent sinners, by the ministry of the Gospel and by absolution from censures as occasion shall require?”—I consider that these words express the authority, which the Roman Catholic church assumes of inflicting censures.

Can you state, whether by the law of Scotland any civil consequences in the way of punishment or penalty of whatever kind, follow upon excommunications, or church censures?—I know no more of the laws of the church of Scotland, with regard to censures, than what I have just heard read.

You are not aware, that there is an Act of Parliament in that country, which abrogates and takes away all the civil penalties that followed at one period from church censures?—I am not acquainted with the law of Scotland upon that subject; I have previously stated, that in our church, we consider ecclesiastical censures have no temporal effects whatever, unless they are imparted to them by the civil authority. The censures issued by the ministers of the established church, have still very powerful civil effects by the laws of this country, and of England*.

Are you alluding to this country when you say, no temporal consequences follow the censures of your church?—I allude particularly to this country, but the observation applies to all countries; in Catholic countries the law commonly annexes temporal effects to our censures, in the same manner as the common law does in this to those issued by the Protestant church.

Observe the language of the 14th section of the bull in question, which seems stronger than either of the passages which have been read to you; it is there laid down, that a baptised Protestant, though deprived of all those advantages which those who are in the church enjoy, yet is not exempt from its authority and laws. Will you explain what is meant by the laws of the Roman Catholic church, binding a baptised Protestant?—I think I have already explained, that by the laws of the church, I mean all the laws that have been generally enacted by her for the direction of the faithful, though not all for each.

The canon laws for instance?—So far as they may regard the person concerned; of course different laws affect different persons according to their social relations.

Is it not meant that they would bind the person in question as much as they would bind a Roman Catholic?—Exactly so; if the law be of a nature to affect him, but merely, as I have often stated, with respect to spiritual effects.

Suppose a law made by the Roman Catholic church which required fasting on certain days, do you mean that a Protestant would be equally bound with a Roman Catholic to obey that law?—I do; but I beg to observe, when I say that Protestants are bound by the laws of the church, I do not mean, that as often as they do not observe them they sin as Catholics would in the same case. I consider that the greater part of Protestants may bona fide suppose that they are not subject to such laws, the infraction of them is consequently in them only a material, and not a formal sin, as happens with all those who violate a law through invincible ignorance or blameless inadvertency.

Will you explain what you mean by a material sin?—A material sin is an infraction of the laws which in the sight of Almighty God is not a sin, because it is not voluntary.

We now beg to direct your attention to another bull, issued in the year 1748, directed to the primate, archbishops and bishops of the kingdom of Poland, which begins with the words “ad tuas manus,” the principle which has been under discussion, is there laid down more clearly than in the passages which have yet been read to you; in this bull is to be found the following passage; “We are by no means unacquainted with the distinction which exists between an infidel and a heretic; that the first cannot be compelled (cogi) to embrace the Catholic faith, to which he did not bind himself by baptism; that the case is different with a heretic who has already received baptism;” is it not then a practical consequence of baptism, alluded to in that passage, which you have not as yet contemplated in any of your former answers, namely, that a baptised Protestant may be compelled (cogi) to embrace the Catholic faith?—The meaning of those words must be, that the baptised person can be compelled (cogi) by spiritual punishments, but not by temporal means, at least so far as regards

[Subsequently added by Witness.]

* Blackstone speaks as follows of the effects of excommunication: “Heavy as the penalty of excommunication is, there are notwithstanding many obstinate or profligate men, who would despise the brutum fulmen of ecclesiastical censures. The common law therefore compassionately steps in to the aid of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and kindly lends a supporting hand to an otherwise tottering authority; and so with us by the common law, an excommunicated person is disabled to do any act that is required to be done by one that is ‘probus et legalis homo,’ he cannot bring an action to recover lands or money due to him,” &c.

Appendix, N^o 30.Examination of

regards the church, whilst an infidel, not being a member of the church, is not subject to her laws, and cannot be punished by censures.

Will you explain, how it is possible that any merely spiritual censure can have any compelling influence on a Protestant who disregards it?—I consider that in the mind of the Protestant it has no such influence, but in the mind of the Pope it may; because he considers that his censures do really and truly bind Protestants. It appears clearly from the bull which the Commissioners have now lying before them, that it was the opinion of the Pope, that heretics, in countries where they are tolerated, cannot be compelled by censures or otherwise to embrace the Catholic faith; and if I am allowed I will read a part of it, where he expressly tells the primate of Poland they cannot. These are his words, “but certainly it is unknown to us that it has been sanctioned by use and custom, that heretics can be forced to profess the Catholic faith, in those countries in which it has been decreed by the princes that they should live incorporated with Catholics”*.

You observe, that the proposition is laid down quite generally, that the Protestant may be compelled to embrace the Catholic faith by reason of his baptism; do you mean that this compulsion in all countries is to be purely spiritual?—The meaning of the Pope is surely such, so far as regards the church, but municipal laws have existed in some Catholic countries, which would compel heretics to return to the Catholic faith; how far those laws were just, I leave it to others to determine†.

But is not the Pope to be here understood as expressing what is the canon law of Rome, and not what is the municipal law of any particular country?—Of course; and therefore I understand the Pope to mean spiritual compulsion alone; in the words I quoted, he asserts no other compulsion can be employed.

Is it the contemplation of the canon law that spiritual compulsion alone is to be used in such cases?—Most certainly; the canon law never inculcates any other sort of compulsion as emanating from the church, and when temporal compulsion is annexed, it proceeds from the municipal law of the country, and not from the canon law.

Observe the principle which is laid down in the passage cited to you, “that a baptised Protestant binds himself by his baptism to embrace the Catholic faith;” is it your opinion that an obligation of that nature is imposed upon the Protestants of this country?—I have repeatedly stated, that all baptised persons incur the obligation of embracing the true church of Christ, or rather actually do embrace it; now Roman Catholics consider the Roman Catholic church to be the true church of Christ, therefore they must consider that all baptised persons are bound by their baptismal vows to embrace the Roman Catholic church, when they arrive at the age of reason.

Do you mean, that the Pope might proceed by spiritual censures against any person baptised, who did not profess the Catholic faith?—I mean that he has that authority, which Protestants reject; that has been my meaning throughout, but always with regard to spiritual and not temporal effects. The Pope however never pronounces censures against the members of any society of Christians separated from him; it would be ridiculous for him to do so, as they would despise them.

Is the spiritual censure to which you refer any other than that of mere excommunication?—We distinguish three sorts of censures—excommunication, suspension, and interdict; suspension is a censure confined to the clergy; the other two extend to the laity, and therefore an interdict might be imposed on persons separating or separated from the Roman Catholic church as well as excommunication.

Is it your conviction that the Pope distinctly meant by the words “cogi” and “constringi,” nothing but excommunication, suspension, and interdict?—It is my conviction that the Pope means spiritual compulsion only.

In what cases does the interdict apply?—In particular cases only, in which the Pope or spiritual superior issues an interdict, which now rarely happens.

In what cases does he issue an interdict, when he does issue one?—For disrespect shown to the papal authority, Popes have often placed provinces and whole kingdoms under interdict. The effects of it are of a very alarming nature; all public ecclesiastical functions cease, sacraments are no longer administered, the people are excluded from all benefits, the dead are refused Christian burial, &c.; but a length of time has elapsed since any Pope has inflicted this dreadful censure.

With

* It may be well to observe, that our church never issues censures against Protestants, or any other society, already separated from her; she issues them against Catholics who disobey her laws, and despise her authority. All our laws that pronounce censures against heretics, were made at a time when all Europe was Catholic, and therefore were made for Catholics, and not for heretics. The first who disseminate heresy are punished by the church and by the civil laws; but when the sect is once formed and organized, it is tolerated by the laws, and the church withholds all interference. The object of censures is to reclaim; and the church does not intend they should ever be issued, unless with a prospect of a reformation.

† The spiritual compulsion of which the Pope speaks, and the physical coercion employed by the laws in some countries against heretics, both regard a state of things when one or more would attempt to introduce heresy, and form a sect in a purely Catholic country. This appears evidently from the Pope's words quoted above, in which he distinctly states that compulsion of any sort cannot be employed, when they are tolerated by the laws. It is not fair, therefore, to wrest a law, or an observation that regards only heretics, who are disturbers of social order, and endeavour to apply it to Protestants incorporated into a nation, or forming a sect tolerated by the laws.

With respect to marriages, we observe, in the bull now in question, a distinction which may be material, that is taken by the Pope in the passage now read to you, "The Apostolic See tolerates marriages between Catholic and Heretic in some places, or between Heretic and Catholic, since it cannot prevent them, and with ecclesiastical prudence "dissimulat," (which we suppose may be translated "overlooks,") and is silent on the matter, lest greater evils may arise; but that an absolute dispensation by the authority of the Apostolic See in such marriages could be granted with regard to degree or other impediment, is quite impossible, unless the abjuration of heresy should first precede, according to the discipline of the same Apostolic See, expounded by us in the preceding epistle, and according to the words of the conceded power already cited." Does not the Pope there lay down the proposition, that it is impossible that the Apostolic See should ever positively sanction a marriage of that description?—In order to answer the question, I must state the case which the Pope is discussing in the bull now under consideration; the question proposed to the Pope was, "Whether a dispensation granted by a Polish bishop to two Lutherans to contract marriage within the prohibited degrees of kindred, was valid or not;" the Pope in the paragraph which has been read, declares that the Church never grants dispensations to persons who have separated from the Catholic church, until they return to her bosom; he at the same time observes, that the church disapproves of mixed marriages between Catholics and Heretics.

Pray observe, that the passage which has been read to you does not relate to a marriage between two Lutherans, but distinctly to a marriage between a Catholic and Protestant, and is so expressed by the Pope?—The general question which the Pope is discussing, relates to a marriage between two Lutherans; however, in the paragraph quoted, he at the same time incidentally alludes to a marriage between a Catholic and Heretic, and even in that case declares, that the church does not grant dispensations until the heretical party embraces the Catholic religion. This appears clearly from the following words: "How can it be thence inferred, that a dispensation is granted with regard to any impediment in such marriages between Catholic and Heretic, and still more between two Heretics, as happened in the particular instance in question." I must however observe, that dispensations in mixed marriages are granted by the See of Rome, and have often been granted in this country.

Will you state as nearly as you can, what is the law laid down in the book you teach in Maynooth, with respect to the marriage between Catholics and Protestants in this and other Protestant countries?—The doctrine laid down by our author on canon law is, that the general law of the church forbids marriages between Catholics and Protestants, but that this law may be dispensed with by the Pope, or his delegates; that in countries where Protestants and Catholics are intermixed, such marriages are frequent, and when there is an urgent cause, may be contracted without referring to the Pope for a dispensation. This doctrine is laid down in book 3d, chapter 23, page 7, section 9, "Verum ex justa causa dispensare potest Papa ut quis licite contrahat matrimonium cum hæretica. Quin etiam in locis in quibus hæretici constituunt populi partem notabilem, secluso scandalo et periculo perversionis possunt contrahi licite talia matrimonia sine speciali dispensatione, si gravis urgeat causa, sive privata, sive publica, qualis est conservatio publicæ pacis quæ periclitetur ob bellum intestinum excitandum inter hæreticos et Catholicos si isti illorum fœdera aversentur."

Will you explain the distinction taken by the passage last referred to, between a toleration of what cannot be helped, and a positive sanction by the Roman See?—There is a very wide distinction between toleration and sanction; toleration does not imply approbation, nor legalize the act, whereas a sanction does; the Pope means, that marriages between Catholics and Heretics, though forbidden by the ecclesiastical law, yet on account of circumstances, are sometimes tolerated; the law was made at a time when there were few heretics in the world, and applies chiefly to Catholic countries.

Is it not the same doctrine as is laid down more clearly in the Class Book, Tractatus de Ecclesiâ, page 379: "Aliud esse quod ecclesia jubeat, aliud quod indulgeat, aliud quod toleret; id jubet ut quam maximè canones observentur; id indulget ut in causis necessariis interdum relaxentur: id tolerat quod sine gravi perturbatione punire non potest;" which we would thus translate: "It is one thing what the church commands, another thing what it indulges, another what it tolerates; it commands that the canons be observed as much as possible; it indulges that they may be sometimes relaxed in necessary cases; it tolerates that which it cannot punish without great inconvenience?"—That is a very clear explanation of the distinction between toleration and sanction.

Would not that passage seem to imply a toleration by the church where it is unable to punish, and might it not be inferred, that if the power of punishment should arise, that toleration should cease?—The words quoted do not imply that the church never tolerates but where it cannot punish; they merely declare, that the church tolerates what it cannot prevent without serious inconvenience; for even among Catholics, whom the church has in its power to punish, many things are tolerated that are not approved; the example selected by the Class Book is the observance of the canons; he states that the Roman Catholic church attaches peculiar importance to the enforcement of the canons, whenever she has the power of enforcing them, but she sometimes sees them violated with impunity; and this is toleration.

Are the Commissioners also to understand, that the church, upon prudential motives, will not enforce the canon law in particular cases?—Most certainly, when serious inconvenience might follow from enforcing it; positive laws of any kind ought not to be enforced, when evil instead of benefit would result to society.

Appendix, N^o 30.Examination of
Rev.N. Slevin, D. D.
1 December 1826.

Would it not follow from that maxim, that the baptised Protestant, of whom we were speaking in the former question, could be compelled to embrace the Catholic faith, if the church had the power to compel him?—The church enforces her laws by spiritual punishments, which she inflicts only when she expects they may produce a good effect; she has it always in her power to inflict them, but abstains from them when she considers no good effect would be produced. With regard to heretics in general, I have already mentioned, that the church inflicts her censures with a view to the correction and amendment of her disobedient children, whom she wishes to retain in her body; hence, when the heretical society is once organized, and the separation completed, she may use exhortation, but never issues censures which she knows would be despised; the submission to a censure being of course purely voluntary, wherever the civil authority does not lend a coercive power.

In the passage cited to you from the Tractatus de Ecclesia, do not these words follow from the end of the quotation given: “quæ quidem tolerantia pars est ecclesiasticæ disciplinæ, sed ea quæ peccantes non excuset, imo etiam gravet, quippe qui ultioni divinæ reservantur?”—They do.

Are you aware, that in the confession of faith in the church of Scotland, “such as profess the true reformed religion should not marry with infidels, papists or other idolaters?”—I have heard that such a prohibition existed in the laws of the church of Scotland.

Does it not so appear by the work before you, intitled, The Confession of Faith, &c., chapter 24, “Of Marriage and Divorce,” sec. 3, page 146?—It does.

Are you aware, that by the law of the state in Scotland, although the church prohibits such marriages, such marriages are good?—I conceive that such marriages, even according to the law of Scotland, are valid, though unlawful.

Does it not then appear by the law of the church of Scotland, that a marriage which is forbidden, and therefore in such case unlawful, when it takes place is valid?—Undoubtedly.

You have stated, that you understand that there is a prohibition by the church of Scotland against the Presbyterian contracting a marriage with “infidels, Papists and other idolaters;” will you point out the passage in the work now shown to you, in which that prohibition is mentioned?—Chapter 24, title, “Of Marriage and Divorce,” 3d section: “It is lawful for all sorts of people to marry who are able with judgment to give their consent; yet it is the duty of Christians to marry only in the Lord; and therefore such as profess the true reformed religion should not marry with infidels, Papists or other idolaters, neither should such as are godly be unequally yoked, by marrying with such as are notoriously wicked in their life, or maintain damnable heresies.”

Do you not consider, that in that passage there is a plain distinction taken between that which is strictly lawful, and that which is expedient or a Christian duty; inasmuch as the words are; “It is lawful for all sorts of people to marry,” yet it is the duty of Christians to marry only in a particular manner?—As it is laid down as their duty to marry in the manner described, I consider, that if they marry otherwise, they are considered to sin, and therefore perform an unlawful act.

Do you consider, that in that case they violate an express rule of the church there laid down, or that they sin against the law of God, as expressed in the Scriptures?—I cannot say whether this book states the positive law of the church of Scotland, or merely the practice, which of course they conceive to be conformable to the divine law.

Is it not rather given in the way of advice and recommendation of duty?—It is stated to be conformable to the divine law, and what the church of Scotland considers to be conformable to the divine law, I conceive she urges as a duty, rather than recommends as a counsel.

Does the word prohibition occur in that passage, or any other word equivalent to it?—I see no word that establishes any positive law of the church of Scotland; it seems to be inculcated as a divine precept.

Is there any sanction annexed to it?—I see no sanction, except those taken from the holy Scriptures.

Do you consider those given as a penalty in the way of sanction, or as the authority upon which the duty is recommended?—Merely as authorities upon which the duty is founded; but a duty founded on Scripture, has, of course, the sanction of the divine law.

Do you conceive, in that passage, that a duty is merely recommended, or do you not consider that a duty is declared, and that that passage is declaratory of the law?—The passage seems to propound a divine law, and inculcate that such marriages should not take place.

Are you aware, that the work put into your hands, from which the passage is taken that you have just read, contains the confession of faith of the church of Scotland, which it is necessary to sign by those who are bound to sign the declaration of the faith of that church?—The book in my hand, purports to be, “The Confession of Faith.—The larger and shorter catechisms, with the Scripture proofs at large, together with the sum of saving knowledge contained in the holy Scriptures, and held forth in the said confession and catechisms, and practical use thereof. Covenants, national and solemn league, acknowledgment of sins, and engagement to duties. Directories for public and family worship; form of church government, &c. Of public authority in the church of Scotland, with acts of assembly and parliament relative to and approbative of the same. Edinburgh, printed by Sir D. Hunter Blair, and J. Bruce, Printers to the King’s most excellent Majesty, 1815.”

Do you mean to state, that all the declarations and articles that are referred to in that title page, are necessarily subscribed by all members of the church of Scotland who are called upon to declare the articles of their faith?—I do not know.

In

In reference to the passage lately cited from the Class Book, "Id jubet ut quam maxime canones observentur;" we beg to ask you, whether an obedient Catholic, and particularly an ecclesiastic, can avoid observing the canons as much as possible,—is he not bound to obey the canons?—By all means.

Is it not in reference to a particular injunction of the church, that the passage is inserted in the oath taken by the Roman Catholic bishop at his consecration, viz: "Regulas sanctorum patrum decreta, ordinationes, seu dispositiones, reservationes, provisiones et mandata apostolica totis viribus observabo." Do not the bishops here swear they will observe the canons with all their might, and make them be observed by others?—That passage means, that they will, to the utmost of their power, observe the canons enjoining obedience to the Apostolic See; and also enforce the observance of them by all their subjects. I observed before, that this obedience is understood to mean canonical obedience, whilst the Pope proceeds according to the canons, and within the sphere of his jurisdiction.

Does a priest, at his ordination, take a similar oath?—He takes no oath, but makes a promise of obedience to his bishop and his successors.

Is it any part of your duty to lecture upon the oath taken by the Roman Catholic bishops, or to give any instructions as to the meaning of it?—No; I never read the oath taken by bishops at their consecration, but I know the nature of the obedience they owe the Pope.

Is it not to be presumed, that the Dunboyne students, who are under your particular instruction in canon law, have, all things considered, a greater probability of being bishops, and therefore a greater probability of being called on to take the oath, than any equal number in the College of Maynooth?—I consider they have a better prospect of attaining that dignity than any other equal number of that establishment; and if it should be the lot of any of them to be appointed bishops, it will then be their duty to examine minutely, the nature and obligation of the oath that will be proposed to them.

Appendix, N° 31.

Further Examination of the Reverend Nicholas Slevin, D. D.;
Monday, 4th December 1826.

IS the declaration which you referred to in your last examination, as made by a Roman Catholic priest, the same as that which is contained in what is commonly called the creed of Pius IV.?—I stated that a Roman Catholic priest, at his ordination, makes no declaration, further than a promise of obedience to his Ordinary and his successors.

Then it contains no declaration of obedience to the canons?—No; he merely promises obedience nearly in the following words; the ordaining bishop says, "promittis obedientiam mihi et successoribus meis," and he answers "promitto."

In the office for the absolution of heretics, which is contained in the "Ordo Administrandi Sacramenta," reference is made to a profession of the Catholic faith containing the following expressions; "I promise true obedience to the Bishop of Rome, successor of St. Peter, Prince of the Apostles and Vicar of Jesus Christ. I likewise undoubtedly receive and profess all other things delivered, defined and declared by the sacred canons and general councils, and particularly by the Holy Council of Trent." Are we not to understand that this is a profession of Catholic faith which is to be made, or the principles of which are held by all Roman Catholics, whether clergy or laity?—The principles set forth in this profession of faith are held by all Roman Catholics, laity as well as clergy; however it is a profession drawn up by Pius IV., and not by the Council of Trent, and therefore has not the sanction of a general council; it has the sanction of the Pope, and it is received as containing the principles of the Catholic faith.

And received in this as well as other countries on that account?—It is.

Although that profession of faith is not subscribed by a clergyman upon ordination, is it not subscribed by every clergyman on his being appointed to any cure of souls?—It is.

You made a distinction in your last examination between some parts of the canons of the Council of Trent and others, and also a distinction with respect to the reception of the canons of discipline in different parts of Ireland; in the Tractatus de Ecclesia, page 454, it is laid down, "That the council," viz. the Council of Trent, "ought to be held in the greatest estimation by all the clergy, since both in respect of doctrines, it is, as it were, the summary of all preceding councils; and in respect of ecclesiastical discipline, it may deservedly be called the manual of priests, or of those who are preparing for the priesthood." It does not appear that the distinctions to which you alluded, are laid down in the doctrine here delivered by Mons^r Delahogue?—The eulogy of the Council of Trent set forth in that passage is general, and all Roman Catholics would willingly subscribe to it. I mentioned in an answer to a former question, that a matrimonial impediment was instituted by the Council of Trent, which we call the impediment of clandestinity, and that the Council of Trent, as to that law, was not received in all parts of Ireland, (say in the province of Leinster and wardenship of Galway.) But notwithstanding all Roman Catholics hold the decrees of the Council of Trent in the greatest respect, and consider that in point of discipline it has done more for the church than any previous council, and explained the tenets of the Roman Catholic faith more clearly, and with more perspicuity, than all the former councils taken together, still the decrees of the Council of Trent regarding discipline are not received in all countries. They were never promulgated in France, nor received in that country in an official form, that is, as decrees of the Council of Trent, though in substance, the greater part of them were adopted and received as laws sanctioned by the ecclesiastical and civil authorities of the country.

Did the Gallican church make any protestation against the reception of the decrees?—The Gallican church made no protestation against them; but the French government would never sanction the official acceptance of them, though the clergy often petitioned for it.

Has the same or any similar expression of opinion respecting the Council of Trent taken place in this country, on the part of the clergy?—The decrees of the Council of Trent, I conceive, have in general (except the one I mentioned relating to the impediment of clandestinity) been received in Ireland. I speak of the decrees relating to ecclesiastical discipline; those of faith have been universally received; there are some decrees of the Council of Trent, that would seem to infringe on the rights of princes—with these we have nothing to do in this country; it was on account of those decrees that the council was never published in France. There are also many regulations of the council that would not apply to all countries, which we would not consider binding, because not applicable to the circumstances of our church.

Are you aware that in those Catholic states, in which the council has been published, an express reservation has been made as to those decrees, with respect to matters of a civil or of a temporal nature?—I am aware that the decrees of that council regarding discipline, have been received in all countries, out of Italy, with some limitation, arising from the particular laws and customs. In Spain and Belgium, it was published by the order of Philip II., but with the understanding, as expressed in the royal edict, that it should be considered binding, only as far as it was consistent with the laws and customs of those countries. It was received by the bishops, and Catholic princes of Germany, with the same salvo; and also with that of the concordatum between Nicholas V. and Frederic III. Thus in the reception of the Council of Trent, in Catholic countries, the royal prerogative and the laws of the country have been secured.

Can you by a reference to the canons of the Council of Trent, specify which of them you hold to be binding in Ireland, and which not?—I can state that the decrees of the Council of Trent relating to church discipline are generally received in Ireland, with the exception of the one mentioned, relating to the impediment of clandestinity. I have mentioned before, that the few decrees that would seem to interfere with temporalities, we have nothing to do with, for the confiscation of property depends upon the civil authorities, which do not protect our discipline in Ireland.

Are not some of the canons so mixed together, that it is difficult to distinguish whether they are canons of faith or canons of discipline; and in the latter, whether they are canons of ecclesiastical discipline merely, or connected with matters temporal?—The Council of Trent has distinguished very clearly between the canons of faith, and the decrees of discipline; the matter of discipline is treated separately from that of faith, and is not expressed in the form of canons, but in the form of decrees, intitled de Reformatione; whereas the doctrine of faith is expounded apart in chapters, and in the canons subjoined, an anathema is always pronounced on the erroneous doctrine opposed to what the council teaches; however, it has happened in the decrees of councils, that some obscurity might exist, and a doubt arise, whether the doctrine was a doctrine of faith or not.

You are requested at your leisure, to supply to the Commissioners, a copy of the canons of faith, and the decrees of discipline of the Council of Trent, specifying which of them are in force in Ireland, and which not?—

[The Witness was informed he need not copy, but merely refer to the respective numbers or titles of the different canons and decrees.]

There are some decrees of the Council of Trent, as I mentioned, that would seem to interfere with temporal matters, and on account of those decrees, the French government declined publishing that council; now those decrees cannot interfere in any way with Ireland, because our church possesses no temporal property, and the municipal law does not protect the canon law in this country. In Catholic countries, the decrees might have a pernicious tendency to support the principle of the church interfering with temporalities. One of the decrees alluded to relates to duels, and declares that the lords who permit duelling shall forfeit their lands to the church, if they derive from her; otherwise to the supreme lord from whom they derive. Another relates to the protection of church property, and an excommunication is issued against all those who should attempt to seize on the goods of the church or of charitable institutions.

You do not mean to say, that those decrees are not received by the Roman Catholic church, but that in this country they are ineffectual and inapplicable?—I mean to state that this, at least seeming infringement on the rights of sovereigns, with regard to the disposal of property, excited a jealousy in Catholic countries where those decrees are not received; but with regard to this country, there can be no question, as our church is not protected by law, and possesses no temporalities.

In the profession of faith, to which your attention has been called, there is this passage, "I likewise undoubtedly receive and profess all other things delivered, defined, and declared by the sacred canons and general Councils, and particularly by the holy Council of Trent; and I condemn, reject, and anathematize all things contrary thereto, and all heresies whatsoever, condemned, rejected, and anathematized by the church;" in what way are we to understand the words, "all other things delivered, defined, and declared," do they refer to matters of faith only, or matters both of faith and discipline?—They refer to matters of faith; because it is intended to be a profession of Catholic faith, and therefore requires our assent to nothing, but what is proposed as of faith.

To matters of faith only?—I conceive that part of the confession to apply to matters of faith only.

What is the difference between a matter defined, and one that is declared?—When there is question of a general Council, and a matter of faith, I do not conceive there is any difference between declared and defined; whether a council declares or defines a doctrine to be of faith, I consider synonymous.

And the same as to the expression delivered?—Yes, I think so; the different terms are used merely to give strength to the expression.

Do they not include matters of morals as well as matters of faith?—Yes, of course, matters of faith and morals.

Would you have the goodness to define the distinction between a matter of faith and morals, as laid down by any general Council?—By matters of faith we mean purely speculative matters, which are believed, and have no reference to practice; matters of morals are rules laid down for the regulation of human actions; the doctrine of the Trinity, for instance, is an object of faith, because it is purely speculative.

In reference to the bull that we were discussing upon the last day of examination, respecting marriage, we beg to direct your attention to the following passage; the Pope says, that the Polish bishop had mentioned, that he had been induced to grant a dispensation for the marriage of two Lutherans, "by the hope which the married couple themselves afforded him, that they would conform, as soon as possible, to the Catholic faith, which if they did not perform within due time, that he had the power of obliging them, by preventing them from cohabiting;" we should wish to know, whether you consider it a part of the canon law in Ireland, that where two Roman Catholics have married, and one of them afterwards conforms to the Established Church, that there is any power in the Roman Catholic clergy of this country to prevent their cohabiting together afterwards?—There is no power invested in our clergy, but spiritual power; the power referred to in the bull may have been temporal, because Poland is a Catholic country. When there is a sufficient cause, a bishop may order a separation of the married pair; but he has no coercive power, unless where the civil authority lends it.

The present question is, whether, by the canon law of the Roman Catholic church, as you understand it in Ireland, the Roman Catholic clergy in this country are at liberty to separate a married couple in a case where both of them originally were Roman Catholics, but one of them has subsequently conformed; have they the power to separate them de mensa et thoro?—That would not be considered a sufficient cause in our church for separating a married couple, quoad thorum et mensam; so long as the consort, whatever faith he or she may profess, consents to cohabit peaceably, and without scandal, no dissolution would be ordered, quoad thorum et mensam, merely on account of a difference of faith. In the case proposed, however, the wife might claim a permission to separate from her husband, which could not be withheld from her if she insisted.

Suppose a Roman Catholic husband, married to a Roman Catholic wife, has conformed lately to the Protestant religion, is there any case in which it would be proper for the Roman Catholic clergy to enjoin it, as a matter of spiritual duty to his wife, no longer to cohabit with him on account of his having conformed to the Established Church?—There is one case; if he will not consent to live peaceably and charitably with her, and seeks to compel her to abandon her faith, in such case we should consider it expedient she should separate from him, agreeably to the advice of the Apostle, "Si infidelis discedit, discedat—non enim frater vel soror hujusmodi subjectus est servituti." The case the Apostle contemplates is where an infidel happened to be married to a Christian, and would not cohabit peaceably and charitably, but harassed, and endeavoured to induce the christian party to embrace infidelity—in that case the Apostle declares the Christian may withdraw to preserve the faith; on the same ground, I consider that if, in the case proposed, the husband endeavoured to pervert the wife, she ought to withdraw from him.

The present question is, not as to the right of the wife to separate from the husband in the case put, but whether the Roman Catholic church would feel it right to enjoin it as a matter of duty, under the pains of spiritual censures, to separate from her husband in any and what case?—The spiritual director of the female in question, would feel it his duty to recommend to her to withdraw from temptation and danger.

That is, to separate from the husband, and not to live with him?—Yes, if the husband did not let her live in peace, or used undue means to pervert her, or to prevent her from exercising the duties of her religion.

Under those circumstances, must not the spiritual director himself be the judge as to what were to be considered as undue means?—Certainly, in the tribunal of conscience.

Would not that be an interference with the civil rights of the husband?—I think not; it is the duty of a spiritual director to recommend to the christian, who applies to him for his advice, what he considers to be the law of the gospel. The husband has no reason to complain of a violation of his civil rights, which do not give him a power over the faith of his wife.

Would the husband in the case put, have any opportunity of making his own statement as to what he has done?—The case before us, would, in this country, commonly belong to the "forum internum." A female comes and makes a statement to her spiritual director;

Appendix, N^o 31.

Examination of

Rev.

N. Slevin, D. D.

according to the statement made, he gives his advice how to act; if she has made an erroneous statement, that is not his fault.*

But does not that amount to this, that spiritual influence would, in the case put, lead to a separation of the husband and his wife?—I mentioned before, that if, in such a case, the husband suffered any inconvenience, it is to be attributed to himself, because it is supposed from the statement, that he has acted improperly, by using undue influence to seduce his wife from her faith.

Would the recommendation which you say would be given by the spiritual director to the woman, be in the shape of an injunction; would it be under pain of any spiritual censure, in case she should happen to continue living with her husband?—Not of any spiritual censure.

Would it be left perfectly to the option of the woman, whether she would comply or not, meaning by compliance, whether she would leave her husband?—I consider that a spiritual director, in such case, would recommend what he considered under existing circumstances to be her duty; if he conceived from her statement that she ran the risk of perversion, he would enjoin her as a duty to withdraw from the temptation; as to spiritual censures he could inflict none; they are inflicted only for heinous sins, notorious or proved juridically; however, if from her statement he apprehended that she could not persevere in cohabiting with her husband without an imminent risk of perversion, he would feel it his duty to refuse her sacraments, as he would to any person who voluntarily perseveres in what we call a proximate occasion of sinning; such persons are not admitted to sacraments until they withdraw from the occasion; on this ground, that he who voluntarily remains in a state of temptation actually sins by violating the express words of holy scripture "qui amat periculum peribit in eo."

But is not the practical consequence of this a very serious interference with respect to the civil rights of the husband, namely, the taking away his wife?—I think not, because he is the unjust cause of any consequences that may follow; he has to blame the gospel, and not the director, who merely points out the moral duty, and acts as a wise dispenser of the divine mysteries.

But it appears that the matter of injustice is decided upon by a tribunal to which the husband has no access, namely, the spiritual director of his wife?—The spiritual director gives his advice only to persons who voluntarily submit to that tribunal—he is lawfully constituted judge in it by a power received from above; when he prudently applies the law of the gospel, he is not accountable for the consequences that may follow to men, not from his advice, but from their own perverseness.

Are you aware that according to the principles of the Established Church, cruelty on the part of the husband is a legitimate ground for the wife withdrawing from him?—I do not know precisely the law of the Established Church on the subject, but I consider that it is a reasonable ground, according to every law, divine and human, for separation quoad thorum et mensam.

Do not your answers to the former questions come to this, that the mere circumstance of the husband being of a different religion to the wife, is not of itself sufficient cause for the wife leaving him, but if cruelty shall be practised towards her, for the purpose of inducing her to change her religion, that would be a reason in the sight of God for leaving him?—That is the purport of my answers.

Is there not however still this most important difference, that in a proceeding of divorce before the ecclesiastical court, known to the laws of this country, the husband has the means of being heard, and the fact of cruelty must be established by evidence, but in the other case the husband has no opportunity of being heard, and a spiritual director, who is the judge upon the occasion, exercises a purely arbitrary discretion on the view which he takes of the statement made to him by the wife?—In the case mentioned, I stated that the spiritual director merely gives his advice to the female who consults him, according to the statement which she lays before him; he does not prevent her from applying to the tribunal which the law of the land may point out for a divorce, but tells her what he considers her spiritual duty. I consider that in every christian persuasion, in every christian sect, it must be allowed that it is the duty of the minister of the gospel to advise the faithful who consult him, and to recommend to them what he conceives to be their spiritual duty; this cannot be considered as an interference with the tribunals established by the law of the land which looks to temporal objects; he merely points out the spiritual duty, without any wish or power to coerce.

Is not his advice and recommendation enforced by the prospect of his denying the sacrament of the church to the woman, if she does not follow that advice?—It is his duty to do so; it is his duty to deny sacraments to all whom he considers unworthy of them. As long as the female, in the case proposed, freely and voluntarily remains in the immediate and proximate danger of sinning, he must consider her unworthy of sacraments. For as I have mentioned, the gospel says that he who exposes himself willingly to the danger of sin, actually sins. He must therefore consider her in the state of sin as long as she willingly exposes herself to the danger of sinning, and therefore unworthy of sacraments.

Do

[Subsequently added by the Witness.]

* But it would be his duty to impress on the wife her obligation of cohabiting with her husband, from which necessity alone could exempt her. If the case was notorious, and the complaint lodged publicly before the competent authority, the bishop for instance, it would be examined and decided juxta allegata et probata; but the submission of the husband to such decision would be purely voluntary, as we possess no coercive power.

Do you not think that advice confirmed with such a penalty, and liable to be enforced in the manner stated, differs much from what is ordinarily called advice?—No, as far as it is an advice; the minister of the gospel alone can dispense sacraments, being appointed by God the dispenser of them; any layman, any prudent layman, under the same circumstances, I am sure would give the same advice, for it is founded in reason and common sense; but the priest will moreover judge when he is to give, and when to withhold the sacraments, according to the words of the Apostle, “Sic nos existimet homo, ut ministri Christi, et dispensatores mysteriorum Dei.”

Do you conceive that it can be said to interfere with civil rights, if advice be given to persons to resist the gross abuse of any civil right?—Not with propriety.

If therefore the husband has a civil right to the society of his wife, but that he so exercises that civil right as to make the exercise of it amount to cruelty, then you consider that the wife is not bound to give him her society?—I think not by our law, nor by the law of nature.

Supposing, however, the facts stated by the woman to her spiritual director, should not warrant any apprehension of cruelty on the part of the husband, but merely warrant a suspicion, that she might be induced by affection and respect to her husband, to follow his example of conforming to the Established Church, would you in that case consider that it would be right to give her the advice you have mentioned to withdraw from the society of her husband?—I should consider, weighing all circumstances, were I the spiritual director, whether she was or was not in imminent danger of perversion; if I saw she was, I should tell her it was her duty to withdraw from that proximate occasion of losing her faith; but if the danger appeared to be remote, I would recommend her to act prudently, to endeavour to secure the affection of her husband, and to prevail on him to let her live peaceably in the exercise of her own religion. If she succeeded in reconciling her husband, I should advise and enjoin her to continue to cohabit with him as in duty bound.

The Commissioners now beg to call your attention to another bull intitled, “Concerning the estates of the churches which had been once in the possession of infidels, and afterwards fell into the hands of the christians,” issued by Pope Benedict XIV., in the year 1752, and addressed to the secretary of the Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide; the whole of this bull appears to be a careful exposition of the canon law upon this subject; the Pope declaring in the third section, that “We have spent considerable time in examining and weighing the matter carefully, and we have now at length determined to reduce to writing our decision concerning this matter, which may produce effects of great moment;” the sections to which we beg now immediately to call your attention are, the 4th, the 22d, and the 23d, which are as follows: § 4. “No one doubts that whatever of an enemy’s property is taken in a just war, passes over into the dominion of the conqueror, the moveables into the power of him who first takes possession of them, whilst the immoveables fall under the dominion of the sovereign prince who carried on the war, that he may indemnify himself for the expenses of the war; sometimes also, in order that he may acquire greater strength for defence, and that he may protect himself from future contingencies. Sylvius in 2. 2. quæst. 40. art. 1. quæsit. 6. conclus. 6. and conclus. 7. Covarruvias in. 2. part. Relect. Regul. Possessor Malæ fidei. § 11. sub. num. 6. In like manner it is beyond dispute, that whatever is taken in an unjust war ought all to be restored, as taking possession of property under such circumstances is nothing else but rapine in set form. So teaches S. Thomas 2. 2. quæst. 66. art. 8. ad primum. His words are, Circa quædam distinguendum est quia si illi, qui deprædantur hostes habeant bellum justum, ea, quæ per violentiam in bello acquirunt, eorum efficiuntur; et hoc non habet rationem rapinæ; unde nec ad restitutionem tenentur, &c. Si verò illi, qui prædam accipiunt, habeant bellum injustum, rapinam committunt, et ad restitutionem tenentur. Striking examples may be found among the old Romans, who, when they acknowledged the injustice of the undertaken war, promptly restored whatever they had taken away, and with the greatest punctuality repaired whatever losses they had caused in the course of the war to the subdued and vanquished states. These examples may be found in Livy’s History; two of such a description are related by Valerius Maximus, the one regarding the Falisci, who had been subdued by Quintus Lutatius, the other respecting the Camarini, who had been vanquished by Publius Claudius and dispersed through the entire globe. Cum Publius Claudius Camarinos ductu atque auspiciis suis captos, animadvertibat; tamen quia parum liquida fide id gestum ab Imperatore videbatur; (Senatus) maxima cura conquisitos redemit, iisque habitandi gratia locum in Aventino assignavit, et prædia restituit, &c. justitiæque promptissimo tenore effecit ut exitio suo lætari possent, quia sic renati erant.” § 22. “Wherefore we think that we by no means contravene the decrees of the year 1630, if we assert, that the opinion is well founded which attributes to the owner of immoveables the right of recovering his property, without any restitution of price, together with all the produce thence derived from the person, who, by paying down his money has purchased it from the invaders, for such a decision is required by the nature of the unjust war in which such property had been seized; such is warranted by the opinion of those authors who most clearly show, that the man who doubts or suspects that he purchases stolen property, cannot afterwards demand back from the owner the price which he has paid to the thief; a fraudulent buyer, if he buy a thing which he either knew or doubted or suspected to be stolen, cannot demand back the price of it from the owner which he paid to the thief who sold it, since for such a demand he has no just title; such are the words of Sylvius in 2. 2. S. Thomæ quæst. 62. quæsit. 6. art. 6. Conclus. 3. page 631. of the last Antwerp edition; such a decision is warranted by the general opinion of those who lay it down, that even he who without any fraudulent intent has purchased, chased, either from the thief himself or from another, a thing stolen, is bound to restore the same to the owner, nor can he demand back from him the price paid; this is to be seen in Sanchez in summa lib. 2. cap. 23. num. 2. and in Borcacin, tom. 2. de restitutione in genere disput. 1. quæst. 2. punct. 1. proposit. 1. num. 4. This same deduction is made from the rule which the higher tribunals follow, by whose authority in truth it is decided, that the immoveable property of the churches, which has been seized on by heretics, as soon as it has escaped from their hands, returns by right to the churches to which it belonged; as may be seen in Decisionibus Herbipolen Monasterii, 10 Junii 1707, and 17 ejusdem mensis coram bon. mem. Caffarellio Confirmatis indecis. 562. num. 1. tom. 5. Coram bon. mem. Lancelta Decano. So it is prescribed by the celebrated text of Innocent 3. in cap. Sæpe de restitutione spoliatorum. For whereas the civil law had granted the benefit of the interdict, unde vi, or of restitution only against him who had driven another from possession by force, and against his universal heir, as is stated in Lex. 1. § ult. and Lex. 2. ff. Unde vi, but by no means against him into whose possession a thing taken away fraudulently had come, as appears, ex L. 7. ff. eod. tit.—although in buying it, he had not been ignorant that the thing was fraudulently acquired; and that for this reason, because the interdict unde vi had been directly proposed against him who had offered violence, unde tu illum vi dejecisti. That great Pontiff did not consider this disposition of the civil law sufficiently safe, and therefore he decreed that the remedy of the principle unde vi, should hold good also against him who had not indeed committed the plunder, but had purchased from the plunderer a thing which he well knew belonged to another, and had been fraudulently taken. Notwithstanding the rigour of the civil law, we ordain, that if any one shall for the future, knowingly receive such property, since he succeeds, as it were, to the defective title of the plunderer, &c. let relief be afforded against the possessor, and against such plunderer, by the benefit of restitution; and the following reason he has adduced for his decree, because there is a wide difference as to the danger of the soul, between unjustly detaining or invading what belongs to another. This, in fine, the adage of canon law requires, which is in Can. Rapinam, 14. quæst. 5, where the following passage occurs: To purchase plunder is not lawful, unless with the intention of restoring it to the person from whom it was taken (23.) But if what has been hitherto said hold good in the case of those who have purchased lands seized by unjust invaders, and if they are bound to restore them, not receiving back the price—by what plea will those others be able to sustain themselves, who, as the Archbishop of Antivari states, have themselves fraudulently invaded, and taking advantage of the proximity or vicinity, have usurped the lands and farms belonging to the churches and monasteries? How will they be able to free themselves from the obligation of restitution to which they are manifestly bound? The civil laws by no means admit long continued possession in stolen property, in consequence of fraud. But when a question arose among the old lawyers, whether theft held good in moveable goods only, or in immoveables also; and when the opinion of those prevailed, who asserted that theft was to be understood only of moveables; then going further, they agreed to this, that if any one, without violence, though fraudulently, had usurped possession of any immoveable property, he could not make such property his own by long use (usucapione), though another, however, who might have received that property fairly from him could do so, as may be seen in L. furtum 37. § 1. and in L. sequ. ff. de Usucap. and in the Institutions of Justinian, under the same title (eodem titulo.) But neither does the excessive laxity of the writers on civil law stop here, who, to establish the right of possession (usucapionis) deemed it sufficient that purity of intention (bonam fidem) existed when possession was first obtained, totally regardless whether fraud (mala fides) had subsequently supervened; as may be seen in L. 48. §. 1. ff. de acquirendo rerum dominio et in L. unic. C. de Usucap. But the sacred canons, regarding nothing else than justice, and the salvation of souls, have exploded so many useless subtleties, determining that no prescriptive right was established, unless integrity (bona fides) accompany the beginning, the middle, and the end of the possession. Since every thing which is not of integrity (ex fide) is a sin, we define, by the decision of synod, that no prescription, whether canonical or civil, can hold good without integrity (bona fide); as in general every constitution and usage is to be amended which cannot be observed without mortal sin. Whence it is necessary, that he who prescribes, should at no period be conscious that the property belonged to another. Such are the words of Innocent III. in his last chapter on Prescriptions. But this integrity (bona fides) most certainly cannot be admitted in the case of any of those now under consideration, since it is incredible, that in the entire course of their asserted possession, they could have had no knowledge that the property seized belonged to the church.” The question is, would it not follow, that the Roman Catholic church retains, through all times, a right to any landed or immoveable property which she may have lost in an unjust war?—I must beg to observe, in the first place, that Roman Catholics do not consider themselves bound to vindicate all the decisions of Popes. I have had occasion to state in my answers to former questions, that the decisions of Popes, in particular cases, are not at all considered as doctrines of faith, or rules of morals, by the Roman Catholic church, or as binding on Roman Catholics in general. In order to corroborate the answers I have already given, I will beg to read a short quotation from Veron’s Rule of Faith, which I have stated to be generally received by Roman Catholics, as a concise and accurate statement of Catholic doctrine. “All Catholics agree, that the Pope, as Pope, with his council, and even with a general Council, may err in particular controversies of fact, which must depend on the information and testimonies of men.”*

I beg

* “Conveniunt omnes Catholici posse pontificem etiam ut pontificem et cum suo cœtû consiliariorum vel cum generali concilio, errare in controversiis facti particularibus, quæ ex informatione, testimoniisque hominum præcipuè pendent.” Page 372. section 12.

I beg further to state, that the Pope, in the rescript now under consideration, does not give any decision, but states, that he thinks it prudent to abstain from giving any decisive judgment, and merely delivers his opinion on the matter, as appears from these words:—"This is what moves us to resolve, until we are better informed, not to come to a determination on the instructions to be given to the Archbishops of Antibaris."* Hence, I conceive, no inference whatsoever can be drawn from the rescript before us, as it is a mere opinion advanced by the Pope, and not a decisive judgment. From the whole discussion of the question given by the Pope, one thing appears evident, that he supposes that ecclesiastical property is transferable on the same grounds as any other property. For the whole discussion, as given by the Pope, would be applicable to any property whatsoever as well as to church property. In this respect, I would beg leave to oppose the Pope's doctrine, as here delivered, and also the doctrine of our canon law, to that of a celebrated Protestant divine, Hooker, who may be supposed to deliver the sentiments of his church on the subject of church property. Hooker expressly declares, that the dominion of it resides in God alone, and that there is no earthly power can interfere with it. The passage to which I refer, is as follows:—Book 7, page 344, octavo edition. "First, That in goods and livings of the church none hath propriety but God himself. Secondly, That the honour which the clergy therein hath is to be, as it were, God's receivers; the honour of prelates to be as chief and principal receivers. Thirdly, That from him they have right not only to receive but also to use such goods; the lower sort in smaller, and the higher in larger measure. Fourthly, That in case they be thought, yea or found to abuse the same, yet may not such honour be therefore lawfully taken from them, and be given away unto persons of other calling. Possessions, lands and livings spiritual, and wealth of the clergy, the goods of the church, are in such sort the Lord's own, that man can challenge no propriety in them, as they are not the owners; all things are His, and that from him they have their being; 'My corn, and my wine and mine oil, saith the Lord.'—And again, in page 349, concerning goods of this nature, "Goods, whereof when we speak, we can term them τὰ τῷ Θεῷ αφιερωθέντα, the goods are consecrated unto God, and as Tertullian spoke, deposita pietatis, things which piety and devotion hath laid up, as it were, in the bosom of God: touching such goods, the law civil, following the mere light of nature, defineth them to be no man's; because no mortal man, or community of men, hath right of propriety in them."—I would now beg leave to compare with this doctrine, that laid down by our canonists on the origin and nature of church property. The work to which I am about to refer is one of those on canon law, that are supposed to favour most the Pope's power. The title of the work is "Joannes Devoti. &c. Institutionum Canoniarum." In tome the second, page 440, he thus lays down the origin of church property. "When nations began to behold the light of religion, the consequence was, that the church which the heathens had reckoned among prohibited corporations, and therefore incapable of receiving gifts or bequests, began to be considered by the civil laws, as a society the most holy, and the most agreeable to every law; why therefore ought it not (that is to say the church) to enjoy the privileges of societies which have been approved by the laws, and in virtue of which privileges it was lawful for them to acquire property, either by contract among the living, or by the testaments of the dead? wherefore the civil laws acknowledged this right in the church, and sanctioned it, so that the church could acquire property like any other corporation in the state."† I will also beg to add a quotation from another approved canonist. It is the Class Book of the University of Salamanca on canon law; the name of the author is Dominicus Cavallarius, tom. 4. part 2d. chap. 42. sect. 4th. page 145. On the just cause of alienating Church Property: "For though the alienation of church property, if prohibited, notwithstanding, for just causes, and on lawful conditions, the canons permit such transfer to be made. For church property is not in its nature placed out of the sphere of commerce, nor is its alienation, intrinsically from its nature, prohibited; it is only prohibited to be alienated in ordinary cases, and where there is no just cause of alienation—three just causes of alienation are commonly reckoned, that is, necessity, piety, and utility; which causes are set forth in different parts of the canon law. And necessity indeed causes that church property may be alienated; thus, if the church be oppressed with debt which it cannot pay from its annual fruits. On this title, when bishops, as feoffees, were compelled to succour emperors and kings, ecclesiastical property was then given in fee to soldiers, and also in great emergencies of the state, on whose safety the welfare of the church depends, the property of the church was often disposed of to relieve the state."‡ The same author in page 146, states the conditions necessary for the lawful transfer of church property in the following words: "Wherefore whenever any church property is to be alienated, a chapter is called, according to custom, in which which, in the first place, the lawful cause of alienation is discussed, then the consent of the members is called for, which is to be reckoned by a majority. The deliberation and the consent given is reduced to writing, which document all do subscribe; to this must be added the sanction of the bishop, or of the prelate of regulars, if there be question of an exempt monastery; if there be question of alienating the property of a church, which is not a corporation, the usage then is, that the transfer be made on the inquisition, and by the decree of the bishop alone; but however this mode of alienation was abrogated by a decree of Paul II., by which it was ordered, that no transfer of ecclesiastical property, or property belonging to holy places, should be made, without consulting the Roman pontiff; which law is received among us," (that is in Italy, the author being a Neapolitan,) "but it is not so in other Christian countries."* By Christian provinces he alludes to France, Belgium, and other places, where the bull of Paul II. was never received; the inference I wish to draw from the whole of this statement is, that according to the doctrine of our canon law, our church property is placed exactly in the same predicament as any other property, with this exception, that by the municipal laws of different countries, church property enjoys certain immunities, and is not always transferable on the same conditions, and on the same terms as lay property; however, the principle that it is transferable by law is admitted by all our canonists, and is also supposed by the Pope in the discussion before us. For as I have already mentioned, the principles advanced in this rescript would be equally applicable to every other property whatsoever, as well as to church property. The Pope thinks, but does not decide, that the inhabitants of Antibaris, in the circumstances stated, did not acquire a title to the church property which they possessed. The reasons he advances are, because the Turks obtained possession of said property in an unjust war, and he lays down as a principle, equally applicable to lay property, that an unjust war cannot give a title to property. The Turks always continued the unlawful possessors of the property of Albania, because this government, at the period in which the rescript was issued, was not recognised by the Pope, or by any Christian power then existing. For at that time the different Christian powers waged perpetual war against the Turks, so that the Pope had a right to consider the Turkish government in Albania an intrusive government. Hence, as the Turkish government did not possess any real title to the church property which it had seized, it could not convey a just title to those who purchased it from them. The inhabitants of Antibaris, therefore, who purchased the church property from the Turks, were possessors malâ fide, because they were aware that the Turkish government was an intrusive government, and not recognised by any Christian prince, and consequently could not convey a just title to them. Another circumstance which proves they were possessors malâ fide, is, that the Bishop of Antibaris states, that they themselves entertained scruples with regard to their title to the property in question. As therefore a doubt was entertained by them respecting the validity of their title, they must have been possessors malâ fide; hence the Pope infers, that prescription could not take place, because according to the canon law, to constitute valid prescription bona fides is required. Now from all this it is clear, that the Pope weighed the question before him, relative to church property, in the very same manner as any juris-consult, or lawyer, would examine a question relative to property, or validity of title, that might be laid before him; the Pope's whole discussion supposes that the inhabitants of Antibaris might have acquired a title to the church property in question, in the same manner as they might have acquired a title to any other property that might fall into their hands, and he denies their title only because it was not founded on any solid basis or principle, and not because the property in question happened to belong to the church.

You have stated that the Pope in the passage in the bull in question, expressed only an opinion, as contradistinguished from a sentence, was it not an opinion on which the Bishop of Antibaris was to act, and so intended by the Pope?—The Pope leaves it to the prudence of the Archbishop of Antibaris, to act in the case as he might judge most prudent.

The passage quoted by you from Veron's Rule of Faith, seems to be confined to a controversy of fact; but in the passages read to you from the bull, there seems to be no controversy of a fact, but an exposition of the principles of canon law?—There is question of a particular fact, which depends, as Veron mentions, on the information and testimony of man; the question regards the purchase and sale of property, and therefore relates to a fact, clothed with all its circumstances.

The question appears not to be as to what the decision of the Pope was in the particular case in question, but whether the principles of canon law which are laid down in the passages pietas et utilitas, quæ variis legum et canonum textibus proponuntur. Et necessitas quidem facit ut res ecclesiarum possint alienari, veluti si ære alieno prematur ecclesia, nec possit ex fructibus satisfieri. Quo nomine ubi episcopi ratione feudorum adigebantur ad militiam imperatori et regibus exhibendam bona ecclesiastica militibus dabantur in feudum. Et similiter in magna reipublicæ necessitate in cujus incolumitate ecclesiæ salus continetur, ad sublevandam rempublicam sæpe bona ecclesiarum distracta sunt."

* "Itaque ubi res aliqua alienda est, de more indicitur capitulum, in quo ante omnia, de legitima causa alienationis tractatur, inde exquiritur consensus, qui ex majori parte censetur. Tractatus et consensus reducitur in scripturam, cui omnes subscribere debebant. Quibus omnibus antistitis accedit auctoritas, seu prælati regularibus, si monasterium exemptum est. Quod si alienanda sit res ecclesiæ, quæ collegio destituitur, usu receptum est ut unius episcopi inquisitione et decreto alienatio concedatur. Hæc autem sollemnitas abrogata e decretali Pauli II. quâ statutum, ut rerum ecclesiasticarum et locorum piorum alienationes inconsulto Romano Pontifice non fierent. Quod quidem jus apud nos receptum est secus in aliis Christianis provinciis."

passages of the bull that have been read to you, are really the principles of the canon law or not?—Taking the question in the general, it is a question of fact; and I beg to observe, that the Pope does not ground his opinion upon the principles of canon law alone, but upon the general principles of civil jurisprudence, natural law, and the laws of nations. He quotes the antient Roman law, he quotes Grotius, he quotes the civil law, and on all these together, he grounds his opinion; so that he discusses the question as a lawyer would a similar one laid before him relating to property. If the Pope had been of opinion that ecclesiastical property could not be at all transferred, or could not be transferred even without his approbation, he might have solved the question at once, by declaring that the inhabitants of Antibaris had acquired no title, because the see of Rome had never given its sanction. But as he enters into a laboured discussion upon the subject, he supposes that a title might be acquired to church property in the same manner as to any other. In the conclusion, he gives it as his opinion, that the inhabitants of Antibaris did not acquire a title, because they did not possess their property by right of conquest, nor by the transfer of a lawful government, nor by the consent of the owners, nor by prescription, which, I believe, are the only modes of acquiring a title to any property.

ARE there any of the principles laid down in the bull under discussion by the Pope, in the three sections read to you on a former examination, which you conceive not to be the canon law of Ireland, nor to be principles in any manner binding on the conduct of Roman Catholics in Ireland; and if so, the Commissioners would request you to state the particular principles which you conceive not so to apply in Ireland?—I consider that the abstract principles of natural justice set down in the rescript before us, are not only applicable to Ireland, but to all countries; with regard to the principles of canon law to which the Pope alludes, they are few, and confined to the following: First, the canon law exempting church property from the evils consequent on war; secondly, the canon law regarding restitution in cases of theft; and thirdly, that which establishes the conditions of prescription. The author of the rescript seems to confess that the canon law exempting church property from the calamities attendant on war, is already obsolete, and therefore, is not binding in any country. With regard to the canon law relating to restitution and prescription, a general proposition has been established, that the canon laws relating to property, or temporalities of any kind, are binding in any country, no further than they are sanctioned by the municipal laws of that country. In all Catholic countries, the canon law binding in that country is sanctioned by the municipal law of the country; and the ecclesiastical tribunals are authorised and sanctioned by the state; the church property enjoys immunities in all those countries, and the ecclesiastical courts alone take cognizance of causes relating to it. In the ecclesiastical courts established by law, cases are decided according to the canon law; but in countries where the canon law is not supported by the municipal law, nor the ecclesiastical tribunals authorised by law, nor the immunities of the church sanctioned, all canon laws relating to property can have no application at all. This I conceive to be the state of this country with regard to Roman Catholics; therefore any thing to be found in the bull before us, or indeed in the whole body of the canon law relating to property, can have no application whatever in this country, in which the property of the Roman Catholic church is not acknowledged, and her ecclesiastical courts are not sanctioned by law, nor her canon law received. I recollect to have read in Blackstone's Commentaries*, that the canon law, in general, is binding by the laws of this country, except in the cases in which it may have been modified by occasional Acts of Parliament; however, the canon law, thus sanctioned by the English laws, can only apply to the Protestant church, which is the only church to which the law gives civil rights as a corporate body.

Pray observe, that the question discussed by the rescript is not as to the enforcement of the canon law in any country, so long as that country continues in the power of infidels or heretics, but as to the right on the part of the Roman Catholic church to assert her claim to any property which may have passed into their hands, whenever opportunity should offer, in the words of the bull, "that the immoveable property of the churches, which has been seized on by heretics, as soon as it escapes from their hands returns by right to the churches;" do you not collect that principle as being clearly laid down by the Pope?—The preceding question regarded in general all the principles laid down in the rescript, and my answer therefore related to those principles. With regard to the general bearing of the rescript, I do

* "At the dawn of the Reformation, in the reign of King Henry 8th, it was enacted in Parliament, that a review should be had of the canon law, and till such review should be made, all canons, constitutions, ordinances and synodals provincial being then already made, and not repugnant to the laws of the land, or the King's prerogative, should still be used and executed; and as no such review has yet been perfected, upon this statute now depends the authority of the canon law in England." Blackstone, V. I. p. 82. Here we find the Roman canon law received in the same manner as in Catholic countries, as the common law of the church, which is very worthy of remark.

Appendix, N^o 32.Examination of

I do not at all conceive that it asserts a right in the Roman Catholic church to claim, at any period, church property that may have fallen into the hands of infidels or heretics, but merely to claim that property to which said infidels or heretics never acquired a just title; the whole tenor of the rescript admits the possibility of acquiring a title to church property, otherwise the whole discussion would be completely ludicrous. It merely denies that the purchasers of the church property, of which there is question in the rescript, ever acquired any title founded on equity to said property. In a preceding answer I have shown, that according to our doctrine of church property, a title may be acquired to it in the same manner as to any secular property; the question which the Pope discusses, is merely, whether in the case in question, the purchasers of church property acquired a real title or not; and this question, as I have often mentioned in preceding answers, the Pope discusses on the principles of natural justice, of the laws of nations, of civil law, as well as on those of canon law; the words quoted from the bull allude to church property unjustly seized by heretics, and to which the purchaser had not acquired a legal title. I have proved, I think to an evidence, that such a title can be acquired on our principles.

Does not the rescript make the justice of the acquisition of the property depend upon the justness of the war by which it was acquired?—The Pope, in the rescript, examines in what case war, or the right of conquest, gives a just title. He affirms that an unjust war cannot give a just title, but acknowledges that a just war can; he applies this principle to the case before him, and asserts, that the Turkish war was unjust, and therefore could not give a just title. Hence he concludes, that the Turks, who had obtained possession of the country by an unjust war, not having a title themselves, could not grant it to those who derived under them. But whilst he examines the right of the inhabitants of Antbaris on this title, he does not reject, nay, he admits and discusses, the other titles on which property may be acquired.

In a case where there might be a question as to the justice or injustice of the war, would the Pope, or the canon law, permit any other authority than the See of Rome itself to declare upon that question of justice?—The Pope, as one of the powers of Europe, would claim the right of forming a judgment on the justice or the injustice of a war. The Pope, as head of the Roman Catholic church, possessing in different countries of Europe civil rights, acknowledged by the laws of those countries, would also, in that capacity, claim a right of forming a judgment with regard to the justice of any war in which his rights might be involved.

Do you mean then, that he would claim as having a single vote upon the subject in common with other powers, or undertake to decide it for himself?—I consider the Pope could not reasonably claim any other right than that of a single vote, as one of the political powers of Europe, and also on the ground that he possesses, in different countries, a right of interference in the administration of church property as head of the church. I conceive he possesses no right of interference in political questions.

In one or two answers you have already given, you appear to be under the impression, that the conclusion at which the Pope comes in the rescript, is rather founded upon the civil than the canon law, we beg you to attend to the following passages in the sections that have been read to you; in one of them the words are, "That great Pontiff did not consider this disposition of the civil law sufficiently safe;" and the text goes on to point out, that he accordingly went beyond it in his own canon law. And again, in the 23d Section, the Pope censures what he terms the excessive laxity of the writers on the civil law on the point in question, and applauds the sacred canons in exploding so many subtleties, and regarding nothing else than justice and the salvation of souls. We beg you to reconsider your opinion and say, whether the Pope does not lay down his conclusion on the ground of the canon law, in contradistinction to the civil law?—In the 22d Section the Pope treats an incidental question regarding restitution in general; he points out the difference between the civil and the canon law, regarding restitution in the case of theft; the civil law, the Pope says, obliges only the thief and his heir to restitution, but does not bind those into whose hands the stolen property may have passed. The canon law, on the contrary, binds the possessor of stolen goods, whoever he may be, to restitution, whilst the property exists; he gives the preference to the canon law in this respect, as all moralists, and even civilians in general do, as being more consonant to the principles of equity; but however this law, thus quoted by the Pope, though it assists, does not lead to a conclusion on the general question. The other paragraph is in the 23d Section, where the Pope speaks of the conditions necessary for the acquirement of title by prescription; he compares the conditions required by the civil law with those required by the canon law; the civil law for prescription requires only bona fides in the commencement of the possession, and though the possessor should afterwards become a malâ fide one, still according to the civil law he might prescribe; whereas the canon law requires, that the possessor should not only enter bonâ fide on the possession, but continue so during the whole time required by law for prescription. In this respect also the Pope gives a preference to the canon law, as being more equitable; and moralists, as well as civilians, adopt this opinion, and amend the civil by the canon law; however, as I said before, this does not lead to a conclusion on the general question, which the Pope discusses on the principles of natural equity, as explained by the civil and canon law, and the most eminent writers on jurisprudence and ethics. The conditions of prescription depend entirely on the municipal laws of every country, because it is founded on that right which a government possesses of transferring property in all cases in which it is found necessary for the public good or safety. The canon law, regulating prescription, can bind only in the Pope's dominions, and in the countries where it has been adopted.

When

When you speak of a government do you not mean a lawful government?—I mean, of course, the lawful government of any country.

Is the present government of this country, or is it not, admitted by all Catholics to be a lawful government?—Most certainly; I consider a government is lawful when it obtains the general approbation, tacit or expressed, of the people, and is recognised by the neighbouring nations.

Do you not conceive that the transfer of the property formerly belonging to the Roman Catholic church, which has taken place, to the Protestant church, is or not now to be considered a lawful transfer?—I consider that it is now a lawful transfer, and has been such for many years; it would not be an easy matter to point out the period precisely when it became a lawful transfer; but I may state in general, that the transfer became lawful when the possessors of church property could not be molested in their possession, without disturbing the public peace and tranquillity, and the security of property in the country. We consider, indeed, that the spoliation of our church in the commencement, was unjust, but we also consider, that by lapse of years, like other usurpations, that also has been sanctified by time, and that time, or that period of time, is what I have already pointed out, that is, when the possessors could not be molested in the possession of it, without endangering the welfare and shaking the very foundation of the state.

Do you consider, that inasmuch as the property which formerly belonged to the Roman Catholic church, has been transferred for more than two centuries to the Protestant church, and as the Catholics have submitted to that transfer, and have sworn and do swear to maintain the settlement of property in this country, that the established church is now, to all intents and purposes, the legal owner of that property?—I consider that the present possessors of church property in Ireland, of whatever description they may be, have a just title to it on various grounds; first, on the ground of a lawful transfer made by the government of the country; for as I mentioned, though Catholics may consider the original transfer to have been unjust, still they all must and do allow, that in the course of time, the transfer sanctioned by the government became lawful, that is, when it became necessary for the public welfare to confirm the rights of the actual possessors of church property; secondly, on the ground that they have been bonâ fide possessors for all the time required by any law for prescription, even according to the pretensions of the court of Rome, which requires a hundred years. I consider they have possessed said property bonâ fide, because their right was founded on a title acquired from a lawful government, a title of whose validity they entertained no doubt; thirdly, on the principle that those who might be supposed to have any claim to it, have repeatedly, and in the most positive manner declared, that they freely cede any right which they might have or be thought to have to the same; this cession, or rather declaration, that they have no claim, is expressed in the oath of allegiance which is taken by the Catholics in general in this country, and in particular by many of our bishops and clergy, who never decline it when proposed to them; now those in this country who might be supposed to have any claim to the church property would be, according to the principles of canon law, the bishops and clergy of the country; then as they have renounced in the most positive manner, and even on oath, all such claims, it follows that the present possessors have a just title to that property, even on the ground of the express consent of those who might have any pretension to it. It therefore appears, that the present possessors of church property in Ireland, have a just title to the same, on all the principles laid down by the Pope, in the rescript before us; first, by lawful transfer made by the government; secondly, by lawful prescription; and thirdly, by the consent of those who might have any claim to it; those are the three principles on which the Pope discusses in the rescript, the right of the Antibarians.

The question remains how far those positions are reconcileable with the canon law; do you think they are reconcileable?—Most certainly they are perfectly reconcileable to the principles of canon law, as they are understood all over the Catholic world.

And with this rescript in particular?—Most assuredly; for, as I have repeatedly mentioned, they are the principles on which the Pope examines the title which the inhabitants of Antibaris might possess to the church property in question. For first, the Pope examines their title on the principle of war or right of conquest; he declares as his opinion that the purchasers at Antibaris did not acquire a title on this ground, because the war was unjust. Secondly, he examines their title on the ground of presumed assent on the part of the former owners; he gives it as his opinion, that such assent cannot be presumed, where there is question of immoveable property; and therefore, that the purchasers at Antibaris did not acquire a right on this ground of presumed assent. He again examines the title on the ground of dereliction; he declares as his opinion, that the property in question could not be considered as abandoned, and hence that the purchasers did not acquire a title on this ground; he also denies that they acquired a right by prescription, because they were not bonâ fide possessors; now on three of these grounds, as I have stated, the present holders of church property in Ireland hold their title; therefore, according to the principles set down or supposed by the Pope, in the rescript before us, the present possessors of church property in Ireland hold it by a just title.

When the Pope states in the rescript, that the persons from whom the property had been taken, did not give their assent; and when he states further, that they had not abandoned it, do you understand the converse as following, that if they had given their consent or had abandoned it, the transfer would have been lawful?—Undoubtedly; otherwise the reasoning of the rescript throughout would be puerile.

In the 25th Section there is a paragraph in it to this effect; "It is to be observed also, that Antibaris and the other cities of Albania, now under consideration, are placed under the temporal power of the Turks, whence the least which we could dread on the appearance of any disturbance, would be this, that a decree would come forth uti possidetis, ita possideatis, which would have no tendency to ease the consciences of individuals." Are we to conclude from thence, that if the Turkish government should issue a decree to that effect, that the power of the Pope as to the possession of those lands would be concluded by it, and no power in the see of Rome to interfere with the property over which the decree extended, would it give a legal right to the persons possessing the lands?—No; the Pope considered it would not be a legal right, the Turkish government being considered unlawful. The order, therefore, could not quiet the consciences of the possessors, because they could not flatter themselves to have acquired a legal right; it would, however, frustrate the Pope's recommendation of a just and equitable arrangement.

We beg you will consider the questions about to be put, as not meaning to enter into controversy with what may be your own particular opinion, but merely to inquire what are the positions of the Roman Catholic canon law on some points. Is it not a maxim of canon law, that no mere length of possession can give a title by prescription or otherwise against the church?—It is not; if it were, Benedict the 14th, one of the most enlightened men of the last century, would have been worse than an idiot to have composed such a rescript.

Have the goodness to state the rule upon the subject?—I have already mentioned, that the canon law requires for prescription bona fides during all the time of possession required by law; the time necessary for prescription, according to the canon law and civil law, that is, the Justinian law, is thirty years for civil property, and forty for ecclesiastical property; the court of Rome claims one hundred years; however, this is a pretension that is not admitted by canonists; some of them say that this pretension of the court of Rome is founded on a law of Justinian, who at one time, required a hundred years for prescription in ecclesiastical property, and afterwards changed the term to forty. But I must repeat, that this canon law, like every other that regards property, is founded on the civil, and can avail nothing where it is not confirmed by the municipal.

You will observe, that the Turks referred to in the bull in question, had been in possession of Antibarís for nearly two centuries, at the time when the Pope came to the conclusion that they had no title; are we to understand that forty years may give a right if the possession originated in bona fide, but neither two hundred years, nor a greater length of time, will give a right if it originated in injustice?—The possession may have originated in injustice, and bona fides might have commenced in the course of time. Those who possess bona fide during the time required by the canon law, will of course prescribe, if at the same time, all the other conditions required for prescription be fulfilled; a malá fide possessor can never prescribe, if he possessed 500 years, but he may acquire another title, grounded on the consent of the owner, the transfer of government, &c. I have already stated, that this canon law, requiring certain conditions for prescription, only prevails in those countries where it is sanctioned by the municipal, and in those ecclesiastical courts which are sanctioned by the state. With regard to the Turkish government in Albania, I have to observe, that though it had been long in possession, yet it was not recognized at the time in which this rescript was issued; it is well known, that the greater part of the Christian powers of Europe waged perpetual war against the Turks at that period, and until very lately, and therefore did not recognise them as the lawful governors of Albania; in the preface to the rescript it is also stated, that the Venetian government, to which Albania had formerly belonged, had never recognized the Turkish government of the country, but always contested the possession of it with them; the Venetian government is stated to have made an attempt to dispossess them in 1648, and also in 1717, therefore as late as 1717, the Turks were not the recognized lawful governors of the country; hence even after a lapse of so many years, the Pope, in the rescript before us, denies that the Turks had acquired a lawful title to the province of Albania, and consequently that they could convey a lawful title to any of the lands which they had taken possession of. The Pope however distinctly recognizes the general principle, that any person who possesses bona fide even church property during the time necessary, acquires a title by prescription. Still he had a right to deny, that the inhabitants of Antibarís, in the circumstances already mentioned, could acquire a title by prescription, because they were not bona fide possessors, even after such a lapse of time, knowing perfectly that they always derived under an unlawful government, and also entertaining scruples with regard to the validity of their title, as it appears from the statement of the Archbishop of Antibarís, as set forth in the beginning of the rescript in these words: "Whereas there are some of said possessors, who are not solicitous, and there are others who are desirous to free themselves from the stings of conscience, and to be absolved from the censures which they are aware have been pronounced against the detainers of church property."

But does not the bull place the whole question relating to Turks, or to heretics, exactly and expressly upon the same footing?—I consider that the reasoning of the Pope throughout this rescript is equally applicable to all sorts of persons or property, for it is a general principle, that no person can hold property justly without a title, and throughout the rescript the Pope only inquires whether the inhabitants of Antibarís had or had not acquired a just title, and therefore the reasoning of the Pope being founded on principles of natural equity, would be equally applicable to infidels, heretics, or Roman Catholics.

According to the principles of the canon law, is it possible for a heretic to acquire a just title to Roman Catholic ecclesiastical property?—Most certainly any person; an infidel may acquire it.

The question refers to a case in which possession commences adversely, and where possession is taken of it unjustly?—Even in a case of unjust possession, if in the course of time

time he acquires a just title to the property; and this just title may be acquired by Turk, Jew, or Atheist, on different grounds, as I have already specified.

Suppose a person having forcibly got possession of church property, makes a settlement of it upon persons who, believing the grantor to be the lawful owner, enter upon it bonâ fide, and enjoy it, but who are heretics, would they gain under those circumstances a just title, they having enjoyed it for the proper period of limitation, bonâ fide, and under a lawful government?—If the prescription in the case before us be conformable in all things to the laws of the country, there is nothing in the canon law, which prevents or could prevent said possessor from acquiring a lawful title, whether a heretic or an infidel.

Does the Pope's rescript, in the present instance, make any distinction between the case of those who had the scruples of conscience referred to by the archbishop, and those to whom no such scruples occurred, or is not his opinion applicable equally to both in the whole matter?—The question proposed to the Pope generally regarded the church property transferred in Antibaris, and therefore the answer handles the question generally without distinguishing between bonâ fide or malâ fide possessors,—the Pope throughout the rescript mainly discusses the question, whether they had or had not acquired a legal title to the property they possessed; indeed as the government was evidently considered unjust by Christians, the Pope had a right to suppose they were not bonâ fide possessors.

We understood by a former answer, that if they had possessed by a supervening bona fides, the title would have been good; might not this have happened in the instance of these parties on whose behalf the bishop makes application?—According to the principles I have set forth, any one of them who held a bonâ fide possession, during the time required by law, would have acquired a just title. I conceive, that any persons who possessed bonâ fide, even in Albania, during all the time required by law, prescribed in conscience; but in law they must prove the bona fides by showing a titulus coloratus, which they had not. The Pope's reasoning supposes them not to have prescribed on the ground that they were malâ fide possessors, knowing the government to be unjust.

Is there any fact in the bull going to show that the persons holding did hold bonâ fide?—There is not; the part of the rescript alluded to merely states, that some of them were not solicitous about obtaining a sanction of their titles.

Are we to understand your answers to the former questions as coming to this, that according to the facts stated in the bull, regard being had to the character of the government, and the circumstances under which the property was acquired, the persons could not be considered as holding bonâ fide?—Just so; because they were aware that they had derived under an unjust government, which was not recognised by the Christian powers of Europe, who, at the period, were waging perpetual war against them.

At the same time does not the reasoning of the Pope apply to the case of heretics as well as to the case of the Turkish government?—I have already mentioned, that the Pope's reasoning is equally applicable to any possessors, whether heretics or Roman Catholics.

But on your own principles would it not follow, that the Turks were bonâ fide possessors of this property, and therefore that the Pope ought to have come to an opposite conclusion respecting them?—I may allow that the Turks conceived themselves to have a right to the property of the Province of Albania; and no inference can be drawn from thence, because in the rescript, there is question of the Christians and Catholics who derived under them.

Is not this conception on the part of the possessors, the very criterion which you have already suggested as constituting the bona fides necessary for prescription?—I have repeatedly stated, that bona fides is one of the conditions required by the canon law, and by natural equity for a legal prescription, but I did not state it was the only condition; there is another condition required for prescription, a titulus coloratus, which is an apparently just title; now the Turks had apparently no just title, having acquired it by an unjust invasion of the country, which was evidently an unjust title. There are other conditions also required for prescription, they are all contained in this verse: Sit res apta, fides bona, titulus quoque justus, sit quoque possessor toto tempore legis. But in the rescript there is not question of the Turks themselves, but of the Christians who derived under them.

When the question of claim of church property is not merely between an individual heretic and the Roman Catholic church, but between an heretical church and the Roman Catholic church, do you conceive that the principle of bona fides can apply to the possession by the heretical church of ecclesiastical property, which formerly belonged to the Roman Catholic church. Pray recollect this passage in the 23d section of the bull; “but this bona fides most certainly cannot be admitted in the case of any of those now under consideration, since it is incredible, that in the entire course of their asserted possession, they could have had no knowledge of the property seized belonging to the church?”—The principles upon which prescription is founded do not depend upon the quality of the possessors. They are applicable to all possessors of whatever denomination or character; if, therefore, any corporate body, sanctioned by law, whether it be an heretical church or a Jewish synagogue, fulfils the conditions required for a legal prescription, it of course acquires a right founded upon that title. The passage quoted goes to prove they were malâ fide possessors, because they must, from the nature of it, have learnt that the property belonged to the church. It by no means asserts that church property cannot be prescribed, which would make the whole discussion absurd and ludicrous.

The question still is, whether you consider that the heretical church can comply with the condition stated in the rules you have set forth?—I have already stated distinctly, that the prescription does not depend on the quality of the person; therefore an heretical person, or an heretical church, or any other person, or any number of persons, that may form a corporate body, may fulfil the conditions, and if they do, the title is valid; but the question proceeds upon a false presumption repeatedly denied, that the church or the canon law, can in any case give a title by prescription, unless where it is supported by the municipal law of the country. I have frequently, in many answers, set forth, that the church has no right, in any case, to interfere with property, or transfer dominion, unless so far as it receives that power from the municipal law of the country. The church at one time possessed such power universally, and it was then those canon laws were enacted; they continued in the code after that order of things ceased, and the Justinian code was no longer that of all christendom.

You have referred, in a former answer, to the oath of allegiance as we understood it, taken by the Irish Roman Catholic bishops, as constituting one of the securities to the church property of this country; without questioning the force of the observation, so far as it may relate to any individual who may have taken such an oath, we would beg to direct your attention to what we find in the canon law upon the subject: we find in the decretals of Gregory the Ninth, book 2, title 24, chapter 2, these words, "Non valet juramentum prestitum a prelato de non repetendis rebus ecclesiæ. Vel sic: ab juramento meticoloso fit absolutio per judicem ecclesiasticum," which we should thus translate: "An oath taken by a prelate, not to seek to recover the goods of the church is not valid;" or thus, "absolution is given from an oath taken under the influence of fear by the ecclesiastical judge?"—In order to explain the preceding words, which are nothing more than the heading of the decretal in question, I have only to read and translate the words of the decretal itself. The Pope is speaking, and says, "we have learned, that the Bishop of Laodicea, having been deprived of his property by Count Arnolphus, was forced to swear, that he would not claim what he had been thus deprived of; having learnt the scandalous proceeding, we felt great regret, and assert, that said bishop could not be bound under the bond of any oath in this case, whom therefore we absolve, because he swore under a most wicked co-action."* It is allowed by all moralists, Protestant as well as Catholic, that lawful superiors have the power of absolving from an oath, or rather declaring that the oath does not bind in such circumstances, though the matter of the oath may be a thing lawful in itself.

Do you mean that an oath taken under violent compulsion, is an oath that does not bind, and from which a party may be absolved?—That he may in such circumstances be absolved from an oath; that is my meaning.

Does not the rubrick at the head of the canon, suggest another principle upon which the oath was void, namely, that it was taken by a bishop, not to seek to recover the goods of the church?—The heading of any decretal is not the text, it merely expresses the nature of the decretal, to which it refers; hence no inferences can be drawn from the words alone in which a decretal may be headed; the meaning is, that an oath taken by a bishop, under the circumstances of coercion specified in the decretal, is void.

We will now look to the text of a decretal itself. Have the goodness to turn to page 177, letter (a), and you will find as follows; "Pro juratione incauta imponi fecimus episcopo poenam congruentem, et primo. Quia non juramenta sed perjuria potius sunt dicenda quæ contra utilitatem ecclesiasticam attentantur;" which we should translate as follows; "For this incautious oath we have imposed upon the bishop a sufficient penance—and first, because they are not properly to be called oaths, but perjuries, that are attempted against the utility of the church." Is not the position clearly laid down in that passage, that an oath taken by a bishop against the utility of the church amounts to a perjury?—All will acknowledge that an unlawful oath never binds; an oath taken against the rights, or real utility of the church, must, according to the Pope, be an unlawful oath, and therefore cannot bind; but any thing that is lawful, according to the just laws of God and man, cannot be considered opposed to the real utility of the church. The Pope's principle is admitted by all. I am not bound to answer for the application.

Who is to judge in that case as to the unlawfulness of the oath?—In things relating to the jurisdiction of the Pope, of course the Pope considers himself authorized to pronounce whether an oath be lawful or not; any superior who considered himself possessed of a right to interfere in the matter in question, would also consider himself authorized to form a judgment on the lawfulness of the oath, and ought to form a judgment. A judge, a magistrate will declare an oath does not bind, when he finds it is opposed to the principles of equity, or to the laws of the land.

According to your views of the canon law, is the oath taken by the Roman Catholic bishops of Ireland, a lawful oath?—Of course I consider it a lawful oath, it is lawful in every sense of the word; it is lawful according to the laws of this country, and it is lawful according to the principles of reason and religion, according to the canon law, otherwise our bishops would not take it, nor would their taking it be approved by the holy see.

You referred yesterday to a passage in Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity, did you mean that the passage you cited expressed the doctrine of the Roman Catholic church, with respect to ecclesiastical property?—By no means, on the contrary; I opposed the doctrine of our canon law regarding ecclesiastical property, to Hooker's doctrine regarding the same.

We

* "Pervenit ad nos Laodicen episcopum ab Arnulpho, Comite rebus suis spoliatum, et jurare compulsam quod non repeteret sic ablata. Cognita igitur contumelia valde doluimus, asserentes ipsum episcopum nullius juramenti vinculis super hoc posse astringi; quem tum absolvimus quia nefandissima coactione juravit."

We beg now to refer you to the 18th section of the bull we have had under discussion, which is as follows; "Father Leonardus Lessius, died before the decrees of the year 1630 appeared, namely, in the year 1623. In his theological work on S. Thomas, are given the solutions of some cases of conscience; in the sixth of which, under the word beneficium, he proposes to himself the following questions, second in order; Whether Catholics can purchase from heretics ecclesiastical property? And he thus answers, It is not lawful for Catholics to purchase the property of churches or of monasteries which has been seized by heretics and confiscated, unless with the determination of restoring them at the proper time to the lawful owners, with all the emoluments and fruits which arose from thence, because this property in reality belongs to others, and in like manner the produce resulting from it. Whence it follows, as we shall afterwards shew, that the purchaser can never demand from the churches or monasteries the price of such property, which had been paid by himself. But when he saw that it might be objected to him that this property, had not Catholics bought it, would have remained in the hands of heretics, who would enjoy the produce of them, he replies that this availed nothing, inasmuch as heretics also were bound to restitution. Finally, he advises Catholics to treat with the owners of the property, to bargain with them and enter into new contracts, by which means they may retain possession of the property with a safe conscience." We would beg to ask you what you conceive to be the meaning of Lessius adopted by the Pope, that heretics were bound to restitution of ecclesiastical property which had been confiscated by them?—In the preceding section, the Pope gives it as his opinion that immoveable property, sold by an unjust invader, cannot be justly retained by the purchaser. After thus declaring his opinion, he then quotes the opinion of Lessius, a private doctor, who is of opinion, that the possessors of property, purchased from heretics, who were unjust invaders, are bound to restitution, not only of the property itself, but also of the fruits of it, without being entitled to the price which they might have paid for said property. From what goes before, it is very clear, that Lessius speaks, and the Pope understands him to speak of heretics, who were unjust invaders, and who consequently had acquired no title to the property in question; and therefore could convey no title to it,—hence he advises Catholics not to purchase property, unless from persons who can convey a just title; nothing then can be inferred from this opinion (which, I must remark, is only the opinion of a private divine, which I am not bound to vindicate,) contrary to the right which heretics may acquire to property; it may be well to observe that we may contemplate heretics in two states; one, when they first burst forth and are condemned by all laws, another when they form into a regular society, making an independent nation or tolerated in a country. Now, our divines and the canon law contemplate them in the first state, and declare many things regarding them in that state of rebellion against all laws, which cannot at all apply to them in a regular organized and lawful society; this observation may serve to explain many passages of the canon law that might otherwise appear absurd or cruel.

But is not the opinion of Lessius adopted by the Pope, as his own opinion, in the bull?—It is adopted so far, that the Pope agrees with him that the purchasers in question, are bound to restore not only the property which they purchased from the unjust invaders, but also the fruits of that property, without requiring any compensation; the Pope here compares the opinion of Lessius, with the opinion of other divines and jurists who considered that the purchasers, in the case in question, might retain the fruits, though they were obliged to restore the property. This appears from the following, section 19; "Post decreta anni 1630, scripserunt sequentes auctores, de illis expressam facientes mentionem. Verjuys loco citato, à Lessii opinione recedit in eo, quod respicit restitutionem fructuum, sed cum eo sentit, quod ad fundi restitutionem pertinet, etiamsi dominus emptori solum pretium non rependat." "After the decrees of the year 1630, the following authors wrote concerning them, making express mention of them. Verjuys in the place quoted, differs in opinion with Lessius, so far as regards the restitution of the fruits, but agrees with him as far as appertains to the restitution of the property, although the real owners should not refund the price which the real purchaser had paid."

The present question is merely as to the principle laid down by Lessius, and adopted by the Pope, that heretics who have seized or confiscated ecclesiastical property are bound to restitution, the question is, what is the nature of the obligation to restitution that is thus imposed upon heretics?—The obligation of restitution which Lessius supposes to be incurred by heretics, is the same as that which is incurred by any unjust invader. The obligation of restitution is founded on the natural law, and therefore must equally extend to all qualities of persons. Lessius refers to the religious wars in Germany, that of course were fresh in his mind; he looks upon those heretics as rebels to the laws of their country, and unjust invaders, who of course were in conscience bound to restitution. He does not speak of heretics in every state—in the state of regular and organized society, when they became invested with legal rights.

Is it a temporal or spiritual obligation, or both?—The obligation of restitution, of which Lessius speaks, is a spiritual obligation. An obligation founded on natural equity; he does not seem to refer to the obligation imposed by the civil law, which depends on the sentence of a judge; his solution is a general one of a case of conscience which he proposes to himself; the decision of the judge is often founded on false presumptions, and very different from that which applies in the tribunal of conscience.

Will you explain how a heretic in the case that is put, can be merely spiritually bound to make restitution; what compelling power can the spiritual power of the Pope have in such a case, inasmuch as the heretic necessarily disregards it?—I have often mentioned that spiritual obligation means an obligation in conscience, and in the sight of God, and

Appendix, N° 32.

Examination of the transgressor of such an obligation is guilty of a sin, incurs moral guilt, and is subject to punishment in a future life. The spiritual obligation is not imposed by the Pope, but explained and enforced by him or any ecclesiastical authority. Heretics may despise this authority, but they will notwithstanding violate an obligation, when they do not restore what they have seized, contrary to the divine and natural law. I have often stated that the church possesses no other means of enforcing the laws of God and her own, than spiritual punishments or censures, which she never pronounces against heretics, who have formed themselves into a body and disregard her authority. She has no other means of coercion but what she may receive from the municipal law, and the municipal law in Catholic countries generally supports the ecclesiastical, and lends it the means of external and corporal coercion when necessary. That of course is not the case in this country with regard to us; censures, however, inflicted by the Established Church in this country, would be enforced externally and physically, not in virtue of the spiritual power, which it may be conceived to possess, but by virtue of the municipal law which would lend its protection.

Is not the meaning of the passage in question, in fine, that a heretic who holds property unjustly, is bound to restitution, and consequently if he conveys it to another person, that person takes it subject to the obligation?—Nothing more.

But do not the canons go a step further, and lay it down as a general principle, and as the bounden duty of the secular power, to assist the ecclesiastical censure, by enforcing it?—The ecclesiastical power always of course solicits the aid of temporal authorities, and in all Catholic countries the civil and ecclesiastical laws go hand in hand. The civil law supports the ecclesiastical, and the ecclesiastical law, by its censures, on the other hand, supports the civil. We know from history, that the two powers, civil and ecclesiastical, have been generally blended together, since the fourth century, and hence arose that confusion which existed, with regard to the just limits of both powers.

But does not the canon law secure its own authority, by expressly excommunicating all secular powers, who do not lend the temporal authority to enforce the spiritual censures?—There is no law pronouncing such a general censure, and if such a censure had been pronounced, I conceive, that it would have been unjust. The civil authorities do not depend in the exercise of their power upon the ecclesiastical. They are subject to the power of the Pope, or even of the universal church, merely in spiritual matters, and in their moral conduct.*

We will now refer you to two of the decretals which appear to go to the whole length stated in the preceding question; look to folio 362, where you will find the first of these passages in the decretal of Gregory IX. 5th book, 7th title, and the 13th chapter. “Moneantur autem et inducantur, et si necesse fuerit, per censuram ecclesiasticam compellantur seculares potestates quibuscunque fungantur officiis, ut sicut reputari cupiunt, et haberi fideles, ita pro defensione fidei præstent publicè juramentum, quod de terris suæ jurisdictioni subjectis, universos hereticos ab Ecclesia denotatos bonâ fide pro viribus exterminare studebunt, ita quoddammodo quodocunque quis fuerit in potestatem sive perpetuam sive temporalem assumptus, hoc teneatur capitulum juramento firmare. Si vero dominus temporalis requisitus et monitus ab Ecclesia suam terram purgare neglexerit, ab heretica, fœditate, per Metropolitanum et cæteros comprovinciales Episcopos excommunicationis vinculo innodetur. Et si satisfacere contempserit, infra annum, significetur hoc summo Pontifici, ut extunc ipse vasallos ab ejus fidelitate denunciaret absolutos, et terram exponat Catholicis occupandam; qui eam, exterminatis hæreticis, absque ulla contradictione possideant, et in fidei puritate conservent, salvo jure domini principalis, dummodo super hoc ipse nullum præstet obstaculum, nec aliquod impedimentum opponat; eadem nihilominus lege servata circa eos qui non habent dominos principales.” Which we would translate as follows: “Let the secular powers, whatever may be their offices, be admonished and induced, and if it shall be necessary, let them be compelled by ecclesiastical censures, that as they desire to be reputed and esteemed among the faithful, so for the defence of the faith they publicly take an oath that from the lands subjected to their jurisdictions, they will with all their might study to exterminate all heretics denounced by the church, so that whenever any person shall be admitted into power, either perpetual or temporal, he shall be bound to confirm this chapter with an oath; but if a temporal lord, after being required and admonished by the church, shall neglect to clear his land from heretical filth, let him be bound by the fetters of excommunication by the metropolitan and the other bishops of the province, and if he shall contumaciously refuse to make satisfaction within a year, let this be signified to the chief Pontiff, that thenceforth he himself may proclaim that the vassals of such a person are absolved from their oath of fealty, and may set forth his land to be occupied by Catholics, who, after exterminating the heretics, may possess it without contradiction, and preserve it in the purity of the faith, saving the right of the chief lord, provided he has afforded no obstacle in the matter, nor any impediment; observing nevertheless the same law as to those who have not lords over them.” Is not the effect of that passage, that unless all secular powers go the whole length of exterminating heretics that are marked out by the church, they shall themselves be excommunicated, and if they do not make satisfaction within a year, that their own dependents shall be absolved from their fidelity to them, and that their own lands shall be given away to Catholics, who having exterminated those heretics, shall keep them discharged of the demands of their original lords?—The decretal now read is the celebrated decree of the Council of Lateran, that has repeatedly received the most satisfactory explanations, and yet is so often misrepresented*. It has been repeated over and over again, that the Council of Lateran was not purely an ecclesiastical council, but a mixed one, partly secular and partly ecclesiastical; it appears from history, that since the time of Charlemagne the greater part of the councils held throughout Europe were of this nature. This was a consequence of the feudal system, of which bishops constituted a principal part, being all in the middle ages temporal lords. The ecclesiastical and civil powers were thus so blended together that they had but one common interest, and so united their authorities in enforcing the measures which they conjointly adopted for the common advantage of church and state. This state of things is thus described by Cardinal Damian, who lived in the 11th century: "As it were by the cement of charity, the king exists in the Roman Pontiff, and the Roman Pontiff in the king; the former when there is a cause, punishes the delinquents with forensic power, and the king, surrounded by his bishops will, by the authority of the canons, dictate laws for the spiritual direction of souls†. The decrees therefore of the Council of Lateran may be considered mixed decrees, partaking of both a secular and an ecclesiastical nature, so far as regarded laws of discipline. The law before us was of this nature, and regarded both powers, being against the heretics of that day, who were at the same time enemies of the church and of the state. In this decree there are indeed censures pronounced against those princes who should not co-operate in restoring tranquillity to the church and state. But the conduct of those princes was condemned by the council; and therefore the censures pronounced were approved by the secular authorities that were present. The council so far as it was ecclesiastical did not impose any new duty on those princes, but supposing their civil duty as it was declared by the civil laws of the Justinian Code, and enjoined by that council in its civil capacity, the church enforced obedience to the civil law and to the orders of the council by her censures. Besides, this decree of the Council of Lateran does not apply to sovereign princes, but to inferior lords or magistrates who derived under them, and who despised their laws and ordinances by abetting or tolerating rebellious heretics, condemned by the laws of the state, as well as by those of the church. The sovereign princes who assisted at the council, either in person or by their ambassadors, condemned the conduct of those petty princes or magistrates who lent their support to heretics in violation of the existing laws, commanded them under pain of forfeiture of their lands, to exterminate heretics, not heretics as they are in our days, peaceable citizens enjoying the protection of the laws, but heretics who disseminated dangerous doctrines in a country united in the same religion, and spread disorder and massacre throughout the land‡. The church did no more than come forward and issue her censures in support of the civil authorities; very far then from interfering with the exercise of their power, the church did no more than copy the civil law adopted by them, and annex her censures||. Moreover, this decree of the Council of Lateran is not a general decree, which comprizes all times and all circumstances, but merely relates to the existing circumstances, that is, to the disturbed state of Europe at the time, and the object of the decree was to restore the public tranquillity which was disturbed by various sects of heretics that had arisen in France and Italy, and were rebels to the state as well as to the church, not being even tolerated by the laws of any country. Hence, no inference can be drawn from this decretal to impugn my assertion, that the church never attempts by censures to compel the civil authorities to lend their support in enforcing her laws; it on the contrary appears from the decretal before us, that it was the church that lent her censures to support the civil authorities of the day in the execution of their decrees§.

* Censures are justly pronounced only against sinners, who are guilty of heinous and scandalous transgressions of some law. Hence the church has a right to censure subordinate magistrates who sin by violating her immunities and prerogatives established by the municipal laws, but not to compel the supreme legislature to enact such laws in her favour.

* I will wave the objection made to the decree, as emanating from the Council of Lateran, however well supported by the testimony of M. Paris, and the rubric of the decretal "Innocentius III. in Concilio Lateranensi," indicating the canon, was from Innocent, and only read in the council, and not from that august assembly itself; admitting its authority not only as a decretal, but also a decree of the council, I maintain that no inference can be drawn from it injurious to Catholic tenets.

† "Quod cum mutue charitatis glutino, et Rex in R. Pontifice, et R. Pontifex inveniatur in Rege—cæterum Pontifex delinquentes, cum causa dictaverit, forensi lege coerceat, et ipse Rex, cum suis Episcopis, super animarum statu prolata, Sanctorum Canonum, auctoritate decernat."

‡ Hence, says Blackstone, the punishments inflicted on the Manicheans by the Emperor Theodosius and Justinian. Hence the constitution of the Emperor Frederic adjudging heretics to be burnt, and ordaining, that if any temporal lord, when admonished by the church, should neglect to clear his territory of heretics within a year, it should be lawful for good Catholics to seize and occupy his lands. Blackstone, 4. p. 45.

|| In the same manner as if the bishops of England, assembled in Parliament, issued an excommunication against the transgressors of a statute which had been just passed. The censure would come from the church, but it would be unfair to accuse it of therefore assuming the right of legislation in temporal matters.

§ In the reign of Henry IV. in that very Parliament which curtailed the temporal power of the Pope in England, was made that famous statute that condemns heretics to be burnt; and in the preamble to the Act is set forth among other charges, that they excite and stir people up to sedition and insurrection, and make great strife and division among the people. This Act was issued, not in obedience to the Pope's orders, but as it purports, to prevent division and suppress insurrection. All the civil laws against heretics, which have been copied into the canon law, and confirmed by censures, were made by different princes in similar circumstances.

Rev.N. Slevin, D. D.
5 December 1826.

Do you consider that to be the purport of the passage that has been read?—I do consider that the law of the decretal is a civil law of the Justinian Code, confirmed by the Council of Lateran as a political congress; and that there is nothing ecclesiastical in it but the censure, by which the church supports civil authority. I do not wish to dissemble that the introduction of it into the decretals by Gregory has made it a part of the canon law. But I have already stated, that decretals do not bind, except in countries where they have been received and promulgated, and are found compatible with the existing laws and usages. Decretals that may have been obligatory at one period, and in particular circumstances, may become obsolete in the course of time and fall into desuetude*. It cannot be considered at present binding in any country in Europe, nor has it been binding for centuries, except in countries where the inquisition has been established by the municipal laws. I conceive that it has been always understood as referring to the existing circumstances of Europe at that period, and not to enjoin a future and general effect longer than that state of things should prevail.

Has not the Pope, by adopting that extract from the council, and inserting it in the decretal, given it a place in the canon law?—Gregory the Ninth inserted in his collection the decrees of the different Councils of Lateran, but by doing so he gives them no more authority than they possessed before; neither do they, by the mere insertion, acquire more extension or comprehension than they originally possessed†. Though the Pope might have considered this part of the acts of the Council of Lateran to have referred merely to the times and existing circumstances, still as other parts of the same decrees were intended to be perpetual, he might have inserted it among the rest, and recommended its observance generally, as long as the present laws and state of things should last‡.

Does it not operate for the establishment of this principle, that the secular power is at all times to enforce the sentences of the spiritual power; does it not amount to the stating that as a universal principle of canon law?—I understand, and I believe Catholics in general understand, the decree of Lateran not to regard supreme sovereigns but the petty princes and inferior lords of the time, who disobeyed their sovereigns and the existing laws, and lent support to the heretics, who were disturbing the south of Europe at that period||.

Pray observe the expression, “seculares potestates quibuscunque fungantur officiis,” surely that is sufficiently comprehensive to include every sort of secular authority; could words more comprehensive have been possibly adopted than “secular powers, whatever duties they may discharge?”—Those words may now have some obscurity, though perfectly well understood at the time; however the following part of the decretal seems to remove, in a great measure, that obscurity; the words mentioned are merely an admonition, and the general tendency of the decretal may be considered as a solicitation to all princes as well sovereign as dependent; but where the censure is pronounced the words bear a more limited meaning, for they speak only of temporal lords, by which expression, we learn from history, was meant only the feudal lords who derived under the sovereign princes.

Is not the explanation which you have now given distinctly laid down in the class book, Tractatus de Ecclesia?—It is so laid down in it, and in every book which treats on the subject.

Has it not been one mode of explanation given of that text, to express a doubt whether the canon really existed in that Council of Lateran; and if so, is not at least that doubt put

[Subsequently added by the Witness.]

* The present decretal is clearly of that nature; the state of the world has totally changed since the 13th century, when Gregory IX. inserted the Canon of Lateran among his decretals. The world was then Catholic; there were no heterodox sects tolerated by the laws of any country; the Justinian Code was adopted all over Europe, and the protecting laws against the introduction of heresy were every where received and made a part of the municipal law of every country. Gregory did not consider he infringed on the rights of sovereigns when he inserted their laws in his decretals, and strengthened them with the censures pronounced by the Fathers of Lateran against the Albigenses. In doing so he was co-operating with, not trespassing on, the rights and authority of sovereign princes. But circumstances have long since undergone a great change—the laws of the Justinian Code have been abolished; those against heretics and their abettors have been repealed; heretics are become loyal and peaceable citizens, protected by the laws; they even form independent nations—in fine, the ground work of Gregory’s decretal has been removed, and it must fall with it.

† By general acceptance, as I have already stated and explained, the decretals have become the common law of the Catholic church, and even in Protestant states. But this means no more than that they are received so far and no farther than they are reconcileable with the existing laws and usages of each country.

‡ During all the time that the nations of Europe continued Catholic, and no heretical sect was any where formed, as the municipal laws against heretics every where prevailed, this decretal, which is founded on them, was in full force; but as soon as the municipal laws regarding heretics were abolished, it vanished with them. This is clearly established in the Bull of Bened. IV. to the Polish bishops, where he says “that no constraint can be imposed on heretics in countries where they are incorporated with Catholics, and are tolerated by the municipal laws.”

|| Sovereigns have voluntarily stepped forward at all times to support by their enactments ecclesiastical jurisdiction. The church does not presume to dictate to them in the exercise of their authority which they possess independently of her. In the decretal before us, the church does not enact the law ordering temporal lords to exterminate heretics; this was a civil law existing long before—she does not punish the refractory lords with the forfeiture of their estates; this punishment was inflicted by the laws, and confirmed by the sovereigns of Europe assembled in congress; in fine, she does no more than annex censures to the civil laws.

put an end to by our now finding the passage in the decretals?—No, it is not; some still doubt, and on good grounds, whether the canon be an act of the council, or a decree drawn up by Innocent III. but never sanctioned by the council. The decretals of Gregory the Ninth, are merely a compilation made by that Pope, who was the nephew of Innocent. We have no authority that secures us of the authenticity of that decree as an act of the council. The Pope, in the Rubric, heads it “Innocentius III. in Concilio generale Lateranensi,” words which would seem to indicate, that the decree was prepared by Innocent for the council, and perhaps read for the fathers, but not sanctioned by them. Hence many still reject the canon as an act of the council, and consider it merely as a decretal, inserted by Gregory in his collection through respect for the memory of his uncle.

Supposing it had never existed in the shape of a decree of the council, is it not now the canon law by virtue of its being thus incorporated in the text of the Corpus Juris Canonici by Gregory the Ninth?—I have repeatedly stated, that the mere circumstance of its being inserted in the decretals of Gregory the Ninth, would give it no more authority than it had before he inserted it as a decree of Innocent. It is the acceptation alone it might meet with that could increase its force or efficacy. It is well known that many spurious decretals are contained in the decree of Gratian, and still the decree of Gratian is a part of the Corpus Juris Canonici; all canonists allow that there are several false decretals in that collection, and still it has been included in the Corpus Juris Canonici by Gregory XIII. All decretals attributed to the Popes that preceded Pope Siricius, are spurious, and notwithstanding those decretals are still comprehended in the Corpus Juris Canonici, there are several decrees contained in the collection of Boniface the Eighth, and in that of Clement the Fifth, which are not considered obligatory; in fine, no decree is considered obligatory that is found to be inconsistent with the laws or usages of any particular country.

Where are we to look for the text of the canon law, if not in the decretals?—The Corpus Juris is in general the text of the canon law, but it does not follow that every document included therein is authentic and obligatory in every country; those which are universally received as authentic, and acted upon throughout the church, are universally acknowledged by all to be obligatory. Those concerning which doubts are entertained are not considered to be obligatory; the greater part of the decretals of Gregory are considered to be universally received, and hence they are called the canon law of the church, but after all, each of them does not oblige in every country.

Can it be known which are spurious and which not?—The canonists point out some as doubtful, others as spurious, introduced by Isidore Mercator; they point out others which, though authentic, are not obligatory; and though comprised in the body of the canon law are considered as extra Corpus Juris Canonici. In the collection called Extravagantes Communes there are decretals comprehended that go to establish reservations to the Pope; those decrees, though included in the Corpus Juris Canonici, are considered as extra Corpus Juris, because they are not received universally, nor considered to be binding.

Can you name any canonist who has treated the passage in question as of doubtful authority?—All canonists that treat of the decretal in question, mention that doubts are entertained of its authenticity as an act of the Council of Lateran. Van Espen for instance, states this doubt, and the grounds of it. [Van Espen, v. 4. p. 34. a.]

Does not Doctor Delahogue, in his Tractatus de Ecclesia, he having been the Professor of Maynooth, whose peculiar duty it was to discuss this subject, distinctly state, that the authenticity of that canon was doubted?—He does; as well as most divines, who treat the question.

Does not he state Collier, a Protestant writer, and also Dupin and Tournelli, as doubting it?—Yes.

You have stated that the decretals do not bind, except in the countries where they have been received and promulgated, we beg to direct your attention to the Class Book of Maynooth, in which it is stated, “Atque constitutio acceptata ab ecclesiis, ubi nata est controversia, cœteris tacitè consentientibus, judicium est ecclesiæ cui refragari nefas est, uti in Tractatû de Ecclesiâ ostendimus.” In English; “But a constitution received by the churches where the controversy arose, others tacitly consenting, is the irrefragable judgment of the church, as we have shown in the Tractatus de Ecclesia.” Does it not follow from that, that it is not necessary that the decretals should have been actually promulgated in all Roman Catholic countries, but if promulgated in one, and the others have not reclaimed (as is the expression), it becomes the law of all?—These words refer to a constitution of the Pope on matters of faith or morals; and in such case, the author states it is sufficient that the decree should be received universally, though no formal promulgation may have taken place. With respect to decrees of discipline the practice of the church is, that they are not considered binding till they are received or promulgated. I allow that a decretal may be acted upon in the ecclesiastical tribunals of a country, that it may be introduced gradually by practice into a country, without any formal promulgation; in such case it acquires the tacit sanction of the government and the church, and the practice supplies the place of a formal promulgation. In general then all decretals are considered to be binding in any country, only so far as they are sanctioned by express or tacit acceptation, and are not inconsistent with the particular laws or usages of the state or the church.

We beg to refer you now to another of the decretals. Sexti Decretalium, 5th book, the 2d title, and the 18th chapter; and we do it for this reason, that it seems to contain precisely the same principle above stated; but it is not extracted, so far as we are aware, from the Council of Lateran, and therefore does not seem to raise any question as to the universality of its application to secular powers of every description, nor as arising from any disputed or doubtful authority: "Ut inquisitionis negotium contra hereticam pravitatem ad Dei gloriam et augmentum fidei nostris temporibus prosperetur, leges quasdam per Fredericum olim Romanorum imperatorem tunc in devotione Romanæ persistentem ecclesiæ promulgatas (quatenus Dei ecclesiæ sanctæ suæ honorem promovent et hereticorum exterminium persequuntur, et statutis canonicis non obsistunt) approbantes et observari volentes. "Si quis verò de prædictis potestatibus, dominis temporalibus, rectoribus, vel eorum officialibus seu Balivis, contra prædicta fecerit aut præfato fidei negotio se præfatis Diocesano Episcopo vel Inquisitoribus incumbenti, se opponere fortè præsumpserit, vel ipsum aliquatenus impedire, nec non et qui scienter in prædictis dederit auxilium, consilium, vel favorem, excommunicationis se noverit mucrone percussus; quam si per annum animo sustinuerit pertinaci, extunc velut hereticus condemnatur." Which we should translate as follows: "That the business of enquiry against heretical pravity for the glory of God, and the increase of the faith may prosper in our times, we, approving of certain laws formerly promulgated by Frederic, Emperor of the Romans, who was then in the devotion of the Roman church, and wishing them to be observed so far forth as they promote the honour of God, and of his holy church, and accomplish the extermination of heretics, and do not impede the holy canons; we require and admonish all secular powers and temporal lords and rulers of provinces, of lands, of cities, and of all other places by whatsoever dignities or offices or names they are known, that as they desire to be reputed and esteemed among the faithful, so that for the defence of the faith they may obey the bishops of dioceses, and persons sent, or hereafter to be sent, by the Roman Catholic church, to inquire into heretical pravity, and that they give their best attention to the investigation, and arrest and keep in diligent custody those believing in, favouring, receiving or defending heretics, whenever they shall be so required; and that the aforesaid pestiferous persons they shall lead or cause to be led without delay, into the power or prison of the said bishops or inquisitors, or such other place as they or any of them shall command, within the power of the said lords or rulers of districts, where they shall be kept in strict and diligent custody, by Catholic men appointed by the foresaid bishops or inquisitors, until their business be brought to a termination by the judgment of the church." "But if any of the above named Powers or temporal lords or rulers, or their officers or bailiffs, shall act contrary to the things aforesaid, or in the aforesaid business of the faith, shall presume to oppose themselves to the before-named diocesan bishops or inquisitors, or in any respect to impede them, and also, whosoever knowingly, shall have given assistance, counsel, or favour in the premises, let him know that he is struck by the sword of excommunication; which, if he endures with an obstinate mind for a whole year, from thenceforth let him be condemned as an heretic." The first question we should wish to ask is, whether there is any doubt of the authority of that canon?—I have no reason to doubt of its authenticity; but it is not a canon of a council; it is a decretal of Boniface VIII.

Is it not a part of the canon law?—It is included in the Corpus Juris Canonici; but we consider it obligatory only in the manner I have very often explained. I have repeatedly stated, that the Pope or church have no right to controul princes in the exercise of their temporal power; they possess no power over them, only so far as regards spiritual matters. I have also stated, that different Popes may have interfered more or less with the temporal power of princes. Their decrees have been commonly rejected, and would at present, if any such were issued, be resisted with greater energy. The decree in question would at first sight appear to interfere with the free exercise of temporal power, and if it did, could not be considered obligatory, as I have already repeatedly stated, except in countries, where it might be received and sanctioned by the civil authorities. This answer I have already given with reference to many decretals, and will give as often as any particular decretal is brought forward, that would seem to encroach on the temporal power of princes; such decrees are not received at present in any country, and there is not a Catholic state in Europe, which would not at present spurn any attempt of the sort that the holy see might make*.

Do

[Subsequently added by the Witness.]

* After thus stating in general the nature and obligation of Papal decrees that might affect the rights of Sovereigns, I beg to observe that the one before us, though issued by an ambitious Pope, is not of that nature; like the Decree of Lateran, it does not infringe on civil authority, but strengthens its enactments by spiritual censures. Boniface quotes the laws made by the Emperor Frederic, and annexes censures to them. Boniface did not establish the inquisition, nor enact punishments against heretics and their abettors, nor against the lords and magistrates who should neglect to enforce the laws; all these laws had

Do not in fact all, or almost all Catholic princes lend the secular arm to the enforcement of the spiritual authority, and thereby accede to the principle of the very decretal in question?—They do freely and voluntarily; but they do not acknowledge a power in the church to controul them in the exercise of their temporal authority; they voluntarily and of their own right come forward to support the ecclesiastical law, which is incorporated with the laws of the state; they consider it necessary to do so, because the church and state have a common interest, and therefore ought, on all occasions, to render each other mutual assistance. But the prince is as independent in the exercise of his power as the Pope is of his own, and the Pope has no more right to interfere with a sovereign in the use of temporal power, than the sovereign would have to interfere with the Pope in the exercise of his spiritual power.* I confess, that Popes have attempted such interference in temporal matters, supported by the laws or customs of the age, but their decrees are not now considered obligatory, except when they are sanctioned by the civil authority. I have had occasion to mention, that even the decrees of the Council of Trent, which would seem to interfere, however little, with the power of sovereigns, have been rejected in all the Catholic states of Europe. This circumstance shows how jealous those sovereigns are of their prerogatives.

Is it not, upon the whole, the principle of the canon law, that the secular prince shall enforce an ecclesiastical censure?—It is not a principle of the canon law, and the canon law cannot impose any such obligation upon sovereigns. They freely come forward to lend their authority in the support of censures; they do so, not because they are compelled by censures or otherwise by the church, but because they consider that it is the temporal advantage of their subjects that they should support ecclesiastical authority.

Wednesday, 6th December 1826.

UNDER what title do you consider persons, who are now the owners of lands in France, which formerly belonged to the Roman Catholic church, but which were forfeited during the late Revolution, hold those lands?—I consider that the present possessors of church property in France hold it at least on two titles; the one a transfer made by a lawful government, and the other by the assent of those who might have any claim on said church property; that is, of the French clergy. This consent may be considered not only a tacit but an express assent, as the Pope, who may be considered to express the sentiments of the Catholic clergy of France, approved said transfer, in the bull confirming the concordat between his Holiness and the French Republic in 1801.

Can you give a copy of the bull to the Commissioners?—Yes, here it is (producing a book). In this bull there is the following clause: “Constantes in proposito ad omnia sacrificia pro bono unitatis descendendi, ad quæ salvâ religione descendi potest, ut etiam pro viribus nostris tranquillitati Galliarum coopereremur, quæ dennò totæ turbarentur, si bona ecclesiastica alienata iterum essent repetenda, et ut, quod potissimum est, felix Catholicæ religionis restitutio fiat, prædecessorum nostrorum exempla sectantes, declaramus eos qui bona ecclesiæ alienata acquisiverunt, molestiam nullam habituros, neque à nobis, neque à Romanis pontificibus, successoribus nostris; ac consequenter proprietatem eorundem bonorum, reditus et jura iis inhærentia, immutabilia penès ipsos erunt atque ab ipsis causam habentes.” The ground on which I consider a government can make a transfer of private property is, when the public welfare requires it; the sequestration of the church property in France was originally unjust, but in the course of time, when it became necessary for the public welfare to confirm that transfer, I consider the government had a perfect right to do so, and that on the general principle, that the government possesses the supreme dominion over all property, and can dispose of it, in extreme cases, in any way that may be considered necessary for the public welfare.

If it be true that every civil government has within itself the supreme power of regulating its own concerns, and if the Pope has no authority in things temporal within such state, pray explain how it came to be necessary to sign such a concordat, or issue such a bull?—I merely stated, that the Pope held no temporal power, but that which was given by the civil law; for though he holds a degree of temporal power in all Catholic countries, he does had been made by the Emperor, as I have shown from Blackstone. Boniface using his spiritual power, enforces the obligation already imposed by the civil laws of the state, by censures. If all the decretals, seeming to assume temporal power were examined, they would be generally found to be of this nature; it would be found that they do not go to enact the temporal regulation they comprize, but to corroborate what is already established by the civil power.

[Subsequently added by the Witness.]

* The municipal law of England takes compassion (as Blackstone has it) on the tottering power of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and fraternally lends it a helping hand; would it be good reasoning to infer, that Parliament is enthralled by the spiritual power of the English church? It is equally unreasonable to infer, that Catholic princes, whilst they support the canon law by their enactments, are subject to the control of the Pope in the exercise of their power.

does not possess it officially as Pope, but because the civil law has given him an interference in ecclesiastical property; this interference he possesses so far and no farther, than the civil law of each respective country allows him. That interference was not the same in all Catholic countries; in some it was more, in some less. I have had occasion to mention, that Paul the Second issued a decree, in which he declared, that no ecclesiastical property, in any country, could be alienated without the permission of the Holy See. This bull was not received in all countries, it was not received for instance in France nor in Belgium, it was however received in other countries; and in those countries, where this decree was sanctioned by the civil law, of course the Pope had a right to interfere in the transfer of ecclesiastical property; in many Catholic countries the government would not interfere without the sanction of the See of Rome; so it is in the kingdom of Spain, even to this day, nor do I think the king would then impose a tax upon the clergy without the permission of the Pope; as often, therefore, as this question of alienation of property arose, the Pope claimed the right of interference, though this right was not always granted him.

Could you point out any passage in any canon, rescript or bull, from which it could be collected that the Pope does not think he possesses as much power in that respect with regard to a country circumstanced like Ireland, as he does with respect to France or Spain?—I know of no bull declaratory of that principle; however, I can show from the principles laid down by all canonists, he cannot claim any right of interference in this country, and I am moreover sure that he does not; I have already explained those principles on the authority of two canonists who may be considered to express the sentiments of the whole; the one I mentioned is the Class Book of Canon Law in Rome; the other, the Class Book in Salamanca. I have shown from them both the origin and nature of ecclesiastical property; that it is in its nature, according to their principles, transferable as well as any other property, and that it is subject to the laws of the state in the same manner. Though there be no bull of any Pope declaratory of this, still it is clear from the principles of our canon law. It is not necessary that the king should declare that he has no interference in spiritual matters; we know from the principles of religion and of reason that he has not, though he has never declared it. The Pope therefore, though he has never I believe declared any thing on the subject, cannot possibly possess any power over property in a country where the Roman Catholic church has none, and where the state grants him no powers; I have however no doubt, if it were called for, that the Pope would consent to give the declaration specified in the question.

You consider that the alienation of ecclesiastical property in the case of France, referred to, would have been good without any consent, such as that given by the bull in 1801?—I consider, that the transfer would have been valid without any such bull; and I do not think that the French government applied to the Pope, because his approbation was considered necessary to give validity to the transfer already made. The Pope is generally allowed in Catholic countries an interference in ecclesiastical property. In ordinary cases he has a right of being consulted, when there is a question of transferring property of that description; at least complaisance to the Pope required they should call for his approbation. There is also another motive and a very strong one, why it should be called for, namely, for the purpose of tranquillising the consciences of those who possessed that property. There generally prevails a confusion of ideas with regard to the Pope's power over ecclesiastical property; it is very natural, that the devout, though perhaps ignorant members of the church, conscious of possessing ecclesiastical property, without the sanction of the Pope, might on that account suffer some remorse to quiet their consciences, and remove all doubt with regard to the validity of their title, it was very prudent to call for the Pope's sanction; and on that account his sanction on all similar occasions has been called for in Catholic countries, as the Pope in the clause which I have mentioned expressly states.

Do you consider that the parties acquiring the property could not have been in possession bonâ fide previous to this consent of the Pope being given?—I consider that some of them might consider their title valid, and entertain no scruples concerning it; but I consider that many of the devout faithful, who naturally look up with respect to the Pope's power, as all Catholics do, might entertain scruples on the subject. Among the titles by which I consider the present possessors of church property in France hold it, I did not mention prescription, because the time that had elapsed since the settlement by the lawful government of France, was very short, and not sufficient, as I conceive, to establish the right of prescription according to any law.

The statement which you made yesterday, as to such parts only of the Corpus juris Canonici, being binding in different countries as have been received there, is considerably confirmed by a note in Burn's Ecclesiastical Law, who refers for it to Calvin's Lexicon, voc. Canon. Jus. The note which refers to authorities, and which gives the rules stated by the author in this paragraph, says, "that the canon law is acknowledged and taught in the states of those princes, who adopt it, not because it is enacted by the Roman Pontiff, but as a law of their own, received by consent, and acquiring the force of custom, in matters which are agreeable to reason and piety, and not contradictory to the divine law." "Illud (jus) in provinciis principum ac statuum evangelicorum usurpatur ac docetur, non ut a pontifice Romano profectum, sed ut jus proprium libero consensu receptum in vim consuetudinis, iisque in rebus quæ rationi ac pietati conveniunt nec divino juri adversantur." He adds two other rules; first, "That in matters of a feudal nature, the civil is preferred to the canon law; second, That in forensic causes, the canon law is not presumed to differ from the civil." By statutes passed both in England and in Ireland, at the period of the Reformation, the canon law which existed in England and Ireland before the Reformation, formation, is expressly confirmed, so far as it be not contrary to the law of the country. There have been decisions in England upon the English statutes which go to show, that only part of the canon law of the Corpus Juris had been received in England before the Reformation, and were thus left as so established by those statutes; so that it appears that part only of the foreign canon law had been received in England before the Reformation; and so much as was then received in England, now continues to be operative and binding in England, upon the whole body of the people, clergy and laity, in like manner as it was binding upon the Roman Catholics before the Reformation, with a saving, that there is nothing therein contrary to the prerogative of the Crown and the laws of the country; and those and those only now constitute the canon law of England, binding upon the laity of the country. It having been settled particularly by the decision of the court of King's Bench, when Lord Hardwicke was Chief Justice, that a canon of 1703, not having received the sanction of Parliament, could not bind the laity; does it therefore appear to you from the statement now made, that the canon law, taken from the Corpus Juris, which is binding upon the Roman Catholic church, as that part which is binding also upon the Protestant church in this country?—I consider, that according to the extract now read, and according to what I have already quoted from Blackstone's Commentaries, the Corpus Juris Canonici is binding in this country on Protestants, in the very same manner as it is binding in Catholic countries, with this difference, that in this country, I conceive it is considered binding on Protestants, only inasmuch as it is sanctioned by the municipal laws, whereas in Catholic countries, the Pope being considered to possess universal spiritual jurisdiction, it is not only considered binding, because it is sanctioned by the municipal law, but also, because it emanates from the Pope. However, the parts of the canon law that bind in Protestant states, and also in Catholic countries, are not the same, for the general principle with both is, that the body of the canon law is to be received and acted upon in all cases, in which it is compatible with the established laws, discipline and usages of each country; now, as the positive laws and usages of each country, Protestant as well as Catholic, differ, so also the canon laws received in different countries, must also be different, always proceeding on the general principle which I have laid down. This principle is laid down generally by our canonists, but particularly by Van Espen, already quoted, who distinctly affirms, that the body of the canon law constitutes what may be called the common canon law of the universal church; he says, that it is binding in the different churches, in the same manner as the Justinian code may have been considered binding in the different states, where it was received as the common law, as it was for many centuries throughout Europe, and is still in many countries. The Justinian code formed in those states the common law, but still every law contained in that code did not bind in each state; because several had been repealed by recent enactments, by the usages of the country, or had fallen into desuetude, but still it was true to say, it was the common law of those different countries. In the same manner, the Corpus Juris Canonici constitutes the canon law, but it binds in every country no farther than it is consistent with the laws and usages of each country; hence, I see no difference between the principle on which the canon law binds in this and other Protestant countries, and in Catholic countries, but this, that the Pope is considered by the former to possess no spiritual jurisdiction in their territories, but in Catholic countries his spiritual power is acknowledged, and the decrees emanating from him, are considered to derive efficacy from his authority, after their promulgation and acceptance in the particular states.

Are you aware, that the Catholics of England, before the Reformation, firmly and steadfastly resisted the principle, that any part of the foreign canon law, the rescripts of Popes, &c., were binding in England, so as to produce any civil effect, without the assent of the state, testified either by statute or by practice?—I am not sufficiently acquainted with the English law, in particular, to be enabled to state that such was the case; but I can state in general, that the different states throughout Europe have claimed that right, and that the canon law has been considered binding in foro externo, only so far as it was sanctioned by the state, and compatible with the respective laws and discipline. The Corpus Juris Canonici having been generally received in all Catholic countries, and having at least, the tacit approbation of the different governments, it follows that it is generally binding in each country, so far as it is consistent with the existing laws, church discipline and usages.

Are you not aware, that when the bishops attempted to introduce that part of the canon law, which legitimizes issue born before marriage, into England, the body of the Catholic barons of England answered, "Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari?"—I was not before acquainted with that fact.

Are you aware that Burn, in the preface to his work on ecclesiastical law, after mentioning the statutes passed at the time of the Reformation, with respect to the canons which have been already referred to, and discussing the subject, states this; "By this statute, until such Reformation as aforesaid shall take effect, the canon law, so far as the same was received here before the said statutes, and is not contrariant to the common law, nor to the statute law, nor to the prerogative royal, is recognized and enacted to be in force by authority of Parliament. Therefore, the business upon this head must be to inquire first, what is the canon law upon any point, and then to find out how far the same was received here, before the said statute, and then to compare the same with the common law, and with the statute law, and with the law concerning the king's prerogative (which is also a part of the common law), and from thence will come out the genuine law of the church?"—I perceive, by referring to the book, that he does so lay it down; and I may add, that this same principle, as I have repeatedly stated, is applicable to Catholic countries*.

But did not the statutes which established the Reformation in England, at once sweep away the authority of the decretals of the Roman Pontiffs with respect to matters inconsistent with the Protestant religion, for instance, did they not annihilate all those canons which regulate the Pope's authority in dispensations, all relating to appeals to Rome, all relating to the Inquisition, and all those canons relating to different sects, denominated Wickliffites, Lollards, Calvinists, Lutherans, and Hugonots; all respecting the obedience of bishops to the Pope, all respecting the authority of the Pope's legates, and all that are expositions of the doctrines of transubstantiation, purgatory, indulgences and masses, and all other matters upon which doctrinal differences exist between Protestants and Roman Catholics?—I cannot pretend to specify the different points in which the canon law may have been abrogated at the time of the Reformation, or subsequently in England by contrariant statutes. I can only state the general principle as given by Blackstone, and also by Burn, just quoted, by which we may decide whether any particular canon law be or be not binding in England.

Are we to understand that there is any particle of doubt in your mind, as to whether the Roman Catholic canon laws, that is, the Corpus Juris Canonici, respecting the several matters contained in the preceding question, are of binding validity among Protestants in the British Islands?—I must decline entering into particulars on the subject, as I am not well versed in the English law. I can only repeat what I have already said, that there is a general principle laid down by Blackstone and by Burn, by which in every particular case, we can decide whether a canon law is or is not binding in this country.

But does not the canon law of Rome, upon the several points contained in the preceding question, continue to be the Roman Catholic canon law of Ireland?—The question is very vague, and does not admit of a definite answer; if the Commissioners will be kind enough to particularize any law, I will give a particular answer. However, I will state in general, that all canons of the church, issued against the above-mentioned sects, that regard faith and morals, are received by the Roman Catholics of Ireland, as they are in every Catholic country; with regard to any particular laws which may have been issued against them by Popes, if they in any way regard temporal matters, or temporal punishments, they are not received in Ireland, if they be not still the law of the land, as they were in the reign of Henry the Eighth, and some, as the one "De Heretico Comburendo," till that of Charles the Second. With regard to any spiritual punishment, that is, to censures that were pronounced against them or their doctrines, by Popes or councils,—if personal, they died with them; if general against their doctrine and those who profess it, they still prevail in Ireland, and in every Catholic country; I think I have already sufficiently explained the nature of the censures pronounced.

Your answer relates merely to the canons that respect heretics; but the question put to you embraces a great variety of other points?—I conceive that the question proposed may be reduced to two general heads.—one regarding doctrine and the other positive law; with regard to doctrinal matters, I have said, that all definitions of the church, condemning the errors of the said sects, or establishing the Catholic tenets, specified in the question, constitute a matter of faith, and therefore are received in Ireland. With regard to the positive laws that may have been issued against those heretics, they may be of two kinds, either of a temporal or of a purely spiritual nature; those of a purely spiritual nature must be reduced to censures, and those censures that are contained in the body of the canon law, are considered still to have force where they apply. With regard to any laws that might partake, in any way of a temporal character, or inflict temporal punishment, these do not bind in Ireland, nor do I think they would be considered binding in any Catholic country, further than they may be supported by the law of the land†.

Are you not aware, that if the ecclesiastical courts in England were to attempt to execute any portion of the canon law, which still remains in force in England, in any manner inconsistent with the common law, that they are restrained by a writ of prohibition from the Court of King's Bench?—I am not well versed in the English law, but I have already stated the general principle laid down by Blackstone and Burn, and according to it, of course it follows, that if any ecclesiastical court attempted to enforce a canon law contrary to any statute law, the Judge would violate the law of the land and be subject to an inhibition.

Do you still think there is no difference in the situation of Protestants or Catholics in the British Isles respectively, with regard to the obedience due to the canon law of the church of Rome?—I conceive that there is a difference, and I never said there was not, between the Protestants and Roman Catholics of these countries, with regard to the obedience due to the canon law; for according to the principle laid down, no canon law is considered binding on Protestants, but such as are not found inconsistent with the law of the land, or the doctrines of the established church founded thereupon; now Roman Catholics

[Subsequently added by the Witness.]

* I am completely borne out, even by English canonists, in what I before stated, that our canon law is received in Protestant states, even in England, in the same way as it is in Catholic states; the only difference lies in the source to which its obligation is attributed, and in the extent of the same.

† With regard to the Pope's power in spirituals, the principle is, that not only the canon law, but the faith of Ireland, the details of that power, and the exercise of it, as laid down in the corpus juris, is received in Ireland among Catholics, so far as consistent with the usages and circumstances of their church.

Catholics consider many precepts of the canon law that are opposed to the doctrines of the Established Church, as binding on them, therefore the Catholics consider that they owe obedience to many laws which are not considered binding on Protestants. The canons that are sanctioned by the law of the land, or not inconsistent with any statute law, or any principle of the established religion, are of course binding on Protestants and also on Catholics, not only as canons, but also as sanctioned by the legislature. But all this leaves my statement untouched, nay, places it in a clearer point of view, that the difference between the Catholic and the Protestant in Ireland, with regard to the canon law, lies not in the principle of the obligation, but the degree; more laws binding the Roman Catholic than the Protestant, but both being subject to it, as far as it is compatible with the municipal laws, and the laws and usages of their respective churches.

You were asked in the preceding question, whether the canons of Rome, which related to the Inquisition, did not still continue binding in these countries; did you ever hear of the Inquisition existing in England or Ireland?—The Inquisition is a civil not an ecclesiastical tribunal, and the canons relating to it are only binding in Rome, where the Inquisition exists, and in such countries as have sanctioned or authorised that tribunal, and adopted the laws issued for its direction. As no such tribunal ever existed in England or Ireland, nor in many other countries, as in modern France for instance, of course such laws never could apply to them.

You were asked a question with respect to the writ of prohibition, which issues to prevent the ecclesiastical court from outstepping its due authority; are you aware that that writ had its origin with the Roman Catholic churches, at a time when the Roman Catholic church was the Established Church of this country?—I have already mentioned that I am very little versed in the English law, but I have no doubt but such writs might have been issued in England before the Reformation; and am certain that they would also be issued at this day in Catholic countries, if any canons should be enforced that would be found inconsistent with the established laws of the land, or the particular discipline of the church.

Will you have the goodness to look at the document now put into your hands, entitled, "Report from Select Committee on, &c. Roman Catholic Subjects in Foreign States, page 258;" does it not appear from that, that the Gallican church did not admit all canons and decretals indifferently, but confined itself chiefly to those in an ancient collection called Corpus Canonum, even with regard to the decretals, down to the time of Pope Gregory II. You will observe, that the paper in which that passage is found, appears to be transmitted from the late Lord Londonderry by Sir Charles Stewart, His Majesty's then ambassador at the court of Paris?—I find the following passage in that Report, "Hence the Gallican church has not admitted all canons and decretals indifferently, but confined itself chiefly to those contained in that ancient collection called Corpus Canonum, even with regard to the decretals, down to the time of Pope Gregory II."

Have the goodness to read the two following paragraphs?—They are as follows: "The Pope cannot grant any dispensation in whatever pertains to the divine law, or to the law of nature, nor in cases where general councils do not permit him to pardon." "The regulations of the Apostolic chancery are not followed in France, unless when they are voluntarily and expressly admitted."

Do you agree in those two positions?—I agree in them so far as they regard France, and they confirm the general principle which I have laid down in my former answers, that the decretals contained in the canon law are no further binding than they are found to be consistent with the laws of the land, and the established discipline and usages of each particular church.

The question is, whether the specific state of the canon law, as there described as applicable to France, is also applicable to Ireland?—I have often mentioned that the canon law differs in different countries, in the same manner as the municipal law differs. I have also repeatedly specified, that any part of the canon law which regards ecclesiastical property cannot extend to Ireland, because our church possesses none; therefore, that portion of the canon law that extends to the Irish church in its present state, is reduced to those laws that purely regard spiritual matters, and general outlines of church government.

The question is, whether what is there stated to be the canon law of France, is also the canon law of Ireland; are the canon laws of the two countries the same or different, so far as those points have been brought under your consideration by the preceding question?—I beg to refer the Commissioners to the preceding answers.

It is a matter of fact, and not a matter of principle, about which we are inquiring, whether in point of fact the canon law of Ireland, of which you are a Professor, is the same with, or different from that which has been stated to you in the preceding question as being the canon law of France?—I have already stated, agreeably to the principle laid down, that the canon law is not the same in any two countries in the universe, because the canon law is always relative to the laws and customs of each country; as the positive laws, discipline and usages of countries differ, so consequently the canon law received in each country must differ. I again repeat what I have so often affirmed, that all that portion of the canon law that regards church property, can have no reference to Ireland, where we have none; hence none of the canons contained in the Corpus Juris Canonici can affect Ireland, except those which merely relate to spiritual concerns. Our doctrine on the Pope's dispensing power, agrees perfectly with the principle laid down in the extract as adopted in France, but that is a point of doctrine rather than of canon law. With regard to the rules of the Roman chancery, there are certain rules that are revived by each succeeding Pope, they regard benefices, a subject in which we have little to do, having no church establishment; but the principle laid down in the extract is generally received, and these rules are considered to bind to the extent and no more in which they are received and acted upon.

Examination of
Rev.

N. Slevin, D. D.

14 December 1826.

THE examination in which we were engaged, of the Pope's bull or rescript to the Archbishop of Antiochia, has been interrupted by the introduction of a great deal of intervening matter; we would beg now to direct your attention to the 19th section of that bull, in which it is stated "After the decrees of the year 1630, subsequent authors wrote, making express mention of them. Verjuys differs from the opinion of Lessius as far as regards the restitution of produce, but agrees with him as far as pertains to the restitution of the land, even though the owner may not repay the purchaser the price paid by him. His reason for so thinking, he assigns to the pre-supposed good faith, which, if it be really present, may exempt the possessor from the restitution of the produce, though by no means from the restitution of the land. That Catholics possessing with good faith monasteries, houses, temples, or in like manner immoveable property, can peacefully retain them so long as they cannot be occupied by the proper owners, nor are they in the mean time bound to interest, or to pay any thing for the produce. Arsdekinus in sua Theologia tripartita, tom. 2. part 2. tract. 6. quæst. 10. asks whether Catholics can purchase the property of other Catholics seized by heretics in unjust war, and he answers that they can. I.—if the will of the owners consent. II.—if the Pontiff give his assent, to support which he adduces the decrees published in the year 1630. III.—if it be provided by conventions entered into between Catholic and heretic princes, that heretics may retain the property of Catholics and freely dispose of them, all which are beside the present question. But there the scrupulous author speaks no doubt of immoveable goods, for among the other arguments in support of his opinion, he weighs the interest and advantage of the Catholic faith; to which he asserts, that it would be more advantageous that the property should be in the possession of orthodox persons, than in the hands of heretics, and no doubt it appears for many reasons much more expedient that this property should by such purchase devolve to the possession of Catholics, who can with so much more effect protect the interest of faith and propagate it, than if it remained in the perpetual possession of heretics, which reasoning is indeed applicable to immoveables but not to moveables. But those arguments advanced by the author and stated a little before by us, are of no weight, or at least very inconsiderable. For when orthodox persons purchase from heretics immoveable property formerly belonging to Catholics and taken from them in an unjust war, the presumed will of the owners cannot be present, as has been stated above; but the decrees published in the year 1630, which refer to moveables, cannot by a forced application be referred to immoveables; in a word conventions and agreements entered into between Catholic lay princes and heterodox persons concerning the possession and detention of ecclesiastical property, are disapproved of by the Apostolic see, as is proved at full length by P. Schmalzgrueber concil. tom. 2. concil. 15. quæst. 1. and these are the conventions to which the author cited above alludes. Concerning this matter La Croix likewise speaks, Presbyter of the Society of Jesus, in sua Theologia Morali. tom. 1. lib. 3. part 2. num. 972; and he shews that he was well aware of the decrees of the year 1630, but as he does nothing more than state what has been said by the authors above cited, he cannot be brought forward or referred to on either side." You will observe, that the Pope after reciting the opinion of Arsdekinus, comes however to his own conclusion, that when orthodox persons purchase from heretics immoveable property, formerly belonging to Catholics, and taken from them in an unjust war; the presumed will of the owners cannot be present. The question we would wish to ask you is, whether this is canon law in Ireland?—In one of my former answers I mentioned, that Pope Paul II. had issued a bull, asserting the right of the Holy See to interfere in the alienation of all ecclesiastical property. I mentioned at the same time, that this bull was received in some countries and rejected in others, particularly in France and Belgium. Since that period the Popes claimed the right of being consulted on the alienation of ecclesiastical property; this right however has not always been granted them; however, the Pope still claims it. It is on this principle that Benedict XIV. approves, in the rescript, the opinion of the German canonist, setting forth that the See of Rome did not always approve of the transfers of ecclesiastical property, made without her interference and sanction, in the conventions of princes with heretics. I consider therefore that the opinion which the Pope would seem inclined to adopt, does not form a portion of the canon law in general, and therefore does not affect Ireland.

Does not the Pope state that principle as forming part of the canon law; have not we his authority for supposing it does?—The Pope merely states that the see of Rome disapproves of transfers of ecclesiastical property, made without consulting the Pope; and he quotes, not the canon law, but the opinion of a canonist, who supports the same principle; but he does not assert positively that such transfer is in direct opposition to the canon law. Archdekin, a learned divine and canonist, quoted in the rescript, held the contrary opinion; the Pope differs with him but does not condemn him.

Does he not however in the 20th section, which immediately follows, lay down that proposition distinctly:—the section is as follows, "Father Charles Francis a Breno of the order of Minimi, in suo Manuali Missionariorum Orientalium. tom. 2. lib. 1. cap. 3. quæst. 21. proposes the following question, Whether ecclesiastical property purchased from infidels ought necessarily to be restored, or at least a composition be entered into; and his answer is, that they should be restored, both because a Christian knowing that this property belonged to the church, incurred the guilt of fraud in possessing that which belonged to another; and also because an infidel plunderer could not transfer to a Christian purchaser a right greater than than that which he himself possessed over the property sold by him. And therefore if the seller by reason of the crime of plunder, had no right at all over property which had been taken by violence, seized on, and afterwards sold; in like manner he who bought it, cannot be said to have acquired any right over the same property. And also in fine, because it is a general rule that even he, who not being aware of theft, purchases any thing from a thief, is bound in the court of conscience to restitution, as soon as the true and lawful owner presents himself. He afterwards inveighs against those who, when they have purchased any thing belonging to the church, think that they fully discharge their debt if they invite the parish priests, to whose churches the purchased property belongs, to banquets and entertainments. Father a Breno does not omit to cite the decrees of the year 1630, so frequently mentioned, but he considers that they appertain only to moveable effects taken by pirates and then sold to Christians, the right owner of which cannot be expected to come forward to redeem them. Finally he objects to himself his own opinion, that he who buys from infidels the property of the church, has done an act useful to the church and consequently that he ought not only to suffer no injury from thence, but even to derive some advantage if possible. To this objection he replies, that the purchasers who have redeemed property from infidels, derive this advantage from the purchase, that they may demand back the price, or come to some composition with it; the purchasers of church property from infidel usurpers are bound to make restitution, since the property is not theirs, receiving back, however, the price paid by them, or some other composition being entered into with the prelates. But when the author advances from the first question to another; viz. whether the buyer is bound to restore the property, even though the prelate may not feel disposed, either to pay back the price, or to make any composition, and when he answers such question in the affirmative, he undoubtedly appears to overturn that which he had before affirmed, and not to argue coherently. But if the prelate were not willing to refund the price to the buyers, or to make any arrangement or composition, still the purchasers would be by all means bound to make restitution to him, inasmuch as the property belonged in reality to the church; and they should attribute it to their misfortune, that they bought what belonged to another, precisely as we have already stated with respect to those who buy any thing from a thief, as often as they cannot demand back the money from him. In this section the Pope seems to come to this conclusion that "The purchasers of church property from infidels and usurpers, are bound to make restitution, since the property is not theirs;" does not the Pope throughout his whole argument, place heretics acquiring the property of the church, and the infidel usurpers here spoken of, precisely upon the same footing?—The moralist quoted by the Pope, would place heretics or Catholics on the same footing as often as their title is equally frail; he supposes the infidels who transferred the property, to be pirates, who, therefore, having no legal title to the property, could give none to the purchaser. In the cases in which heretics unjustly invade ecclesiastical property, of course they are just in the same circumstances, that is, they have no legal title, and can give none. The passage quoted is the opinion of a private divine, on a case of church property plundered by infidels and purchased from them, which the Pope applies to the question before him.

Are we not to understand from the former part of your evidence, that precisely the same principle would apply to an unjust possession of property by Roman Catholics?—Exactly so; Italian moralists, wishing to exemplify their doctrine on restitution, usually took their cases from the Turks, who very commonly plundered their coasts, and afterwards sold the booty to Christian merchants in Tunis or Algiers.

It is not the character of the individual, but the act that stamps legality or illegality upon the transaction?—Just so; the Pope lays down general principles, and applies them to the question before him, illustrating the application by the decisions of canonists and moralists, on similar cases.

Pray, however, attend to the 27th and 28th sections of the bull, and say whether they are not intended to establish the direct converse of that proposition, and to go this length, that a Catholic possessor, or one abjuring heresy, may acquire and secure a title from the court of Rome, but that no other description of person can by possibility do so; the sections are as follow—§ 27. "P. Schmalzgrueber in citato concilio, 15. tom. 2. considers the case of a heretic prince, who forsaking the Augustan confession, embraces the Catholic religion, and he asks, how he ought to act with regard to the ecclesiastical property, which he possessed on the authority of the peace of Westphalia, which had been reprobated by the church; and in quæst. 2. num. 22. of the same council, he concludes, that he is either bound to restore them or to solicit a dispensation from the Apostolic see in order to retain them, bringing forward the example of Wolfgang Wilhelmer Duke of Neuburg, and that of his son Wilhelm, Elector Palatine, and asserting that towards converts to the Catholic faith, the Apostolic see is wont to be so indulgent, that, even though the cause be just it grants to them by a dispensation the retention of those, i. e. of the immoveable property of the church." § 28. "Finally our predecessor Pope Clement XI. in a letter to Augustus II. King of Poland, dated Nov. 10, an. 1712, in tom. 2, of his published briefs, page 243, in order to excite him to promote the propagation of the Catholic faith in his dominions of Saxony, wrote as follows: We assure your Majesty, that neither from you nor from your Catholic successors, nor from any one who may have embraced our holy religion, shall we demand a restitution of the property which belonged to the churches through Saxony—nay, more to appease the consciences of those who possess them, if having abjured heresy they determine to return to the Catholic faith, we shall make over for ever to them all the aforesaid property, and this we shall execute in such form that no demand can be made against them even by our successors in time to come. And Clement XII. fulfilling this promise in his con-
